For man cannot regenerate himself. He must have help and inspiration from a higher Being. Just in proportion as he brings himself into close relationship with that higher Being does he attain greater capacity for usefulness to his fellowmen.—Henry C. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

the great multitude outside which interferes with their contented and sterile orthodoxy. Where at such times is that authority of the Voice of God which makes us know that our business is the building in the midst of life of the Holy City of the Presence of God, and that be the hazards what they may, we dare not falter from attempting it?

I believe that the world today is hungry for such an overcoming faith. It is not much interested in a Church that is a mere spiritual nursery for a certain group of sheltered souls. It is not interested in a Church that merely recites with verbal veneration the stories of what men attempted for God long ago. It wants a Church that can speak today with the fearlessness of a great authority because it has listened to the one authority which is supreme. It wants a prophetic Church which will not stand with finger on lip until it has been taught by all sorts of worldly wisdom what it is prudent to say, but facing all the tremendous realities of its world, dares say to its present problems, "Thus saith the Lord." Such a Church will not grow cold and cringe simply because men, mouthing the phrases at which weak servants of God have come to heal, say that there must be no meddling with definite economic issues, no mixing in politics, no presumption of Christian prophets to leave their own sphere of vague principles and dare touch upon the practical problems where the interests of men who do not want to be completely Christian are rubbed on the raw. It is true that the Church must be wise. It is true that no vociferous good intention can clothe the fool with the right to speak to earnest men, even though he speak from the pulpit. But it is equally true that all the glory of the Church, and all the consciousness of her supreme authority, is lost when for an instant she admits that her work is anything less than to build the city of the Presence of God in the midst of every province of our actual life.

It is needless, I think, to multiply illustrations, or to enlarge this point of the message which I seek to bring. What I plead for here is a larger boldness in our thought of the mission of the Church. We must listen less to the voices that would make us consider religion as a timid, prudent thing. Looking back into the heroic history of other days, we can imagine how great a venture it was when men set out to build the actual city which represented to them the Presence of God. They did it because they confessed the authority of that instinct which bade them undertake an all but impossible achievement in the Name of God. And across the centuries they would hand down to us the torch of their high and valorous imagination.

2. Pass we on now to a second consideration which flows from the first. We have hinted it already. We need to develop it somewhat fully.

What Nehemiah and the men who builded with him set themselves to do was not simply to erect a temple, but to restore a civilization. In their thought, and, indeed, in all the highest thought of Israel, the shrine of the Presence of God was not simply in the Holy of Holies, shut within a sacred court. The shrine of God's Presence was the life of His people. Everything that they did must have a religious connection. All the details of their living were to be shaped with reference to their relationship to God. We can see this in the Mosaic law, which had to do not only with methods of worship, but with the laws of daily conduct, with the way men were to keep themselves in health and to fight contagion for their neighbors, with the spirit in which the master was to treat his servant and the community treat the offender—with every relationship as far as they could foresee it of man to man, in order that justice and mercy might be made real. So with the prophets, also, the burden of their message was that God's supreme concern was not with the ordinances of the temple and the minutiae of sacrifice. It was with their interpretation of God's purpose into every problem of their human adjustment, as men who looked to God for guidance and grace. * * *

What, then, does this ideal infer for us in definite conception? It is obvious that here and now we cannot answer that question exhaustively, but at least we can illustrate what we mean.

There are, for example, the relationships of industry which have got to be Christianized, and that never will be Christianized until we begin to think them through in Christian terms. No one is wise enough to know all the steps toward the solution of the present unrest and bitterness, the clash of selfishness with selfishness, the hard antagonism of mutual covetousness which may endanger the very life of a nation in the tremendous strife of one class with another. But this, at least, we know: that the Church, if it be faithful to its ideal, must insist upon certain guiding motives. It must insist that human life is more important than any amount of profit, though that profit may happen to come to the group of people who occupy our pews. It must insist that the real motive in all industry must be service, and that any business or trade or industry whatsoever that is creating something which hurts the whole of human life, or which by its conduct exploits a multitude of men unjustly for the benefit of a few, is condemned by every measuring-rod of God. We must believe, as Christ did, in the essential dignity of every human soul, and that means increasing our interest in the desire of the man who labors, not simply to be handed out a certain wage which employers choose to assign him, but to have more and more a voice in creating the conditions under which he works. We must believe and proclaim, no matter how much the cynicism of old selfishness may laugh at it, that God's motives, as revealed in Jesus, are true and workable, that men are here, as He was here, not to be ministered unto, but to minister, that honor ought to belong, and joy will belong, to him who serves most, and that the whole power of organized Christian principles must be thrown toward the creation of a social and industrial order in which there shall be no room for idlers and parasites, and in which none shall win the recognition of his fellowmen unless he has tried to make all life richer and better, not for himself alone, but for all.

And to pass from the relationship of man to man within the nation, let us take our final illustration of what it means to build the city of God from the relationship of nations one with another. * * *

We have only a little while ago come out of the immediate shadow of the latest and most dreadful war. When it began, men who felt the glory of a great ideal said that it was a war to end war. We should slay the gigantic evil which had brought it on. We should make the earth safe for freedom, and in justice we should guarantee its peace. But already those voices begin to sound dim and far away. The chaos of the old derisions, so ready always to cry down ideals which rise above the common motives of men, is growing louder. Men shrug their shoulders at the simplicity of those who imagine that there can really be a world peace. They talk already of the next war and having to get ready for it. The great ideal we thought we fought for, and for which we paid the bitter price of blood and tears, is flouted as a senseless thing.

It is not strange that non-religious men should think thus and act thus in the face of the ugly facts of our cruel and unregenerate world. They argue simply from the things they see. They have no consciousness of the unseen reliance. They have no power of faith in those invincible purposes of God which can create the things that to men alone are unimaginable. But what of us as Christians? Do we dare think and talk with the mean cynicism of those to whom God is nothing but a phrase? Shall we, too, dismiss as the poor fancy of a crucified dreamer the ideal of the kingdom of a world redeemed into a better brotherhood? Shall we have no program to tie to, no ideal to believe in, no insistence which we, with the tremendous power of the Church, might press, that men shall seek, and in their very seeking for it make real the hope of a world that has exercised itself from the insanity of war? * * *

Today my thought goes back across the sea to a little field beside a broken wall, next to which was a garden that some French peasant had planted in the springtime, and off to the west the hills and the melancholy light of the setting sun. Day by day into that field were dug the graves for men whose broken bodies came there from battlefield and hospital. Month by month the long rows lengthened, and the graves reached out like the maw of fate to nibble at the garden, consuming there, like death itself, the life and beauty and substance of the world. And remembering all the pitifulness of that field of sacrifice with its wooden crosses, and remembering, too, the pitifulness, yet the mighty triumph of Him Who hung upon another cross on Calvary that out of its hates and brutal ignorance the world might be redeemed into the life and love of God, I know that the ideal of better things is not in vain if men will only dare the faith in Jesus.

"The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another: in what place, therefore, ye hear the sound of the trumpet resort ye thither unto us" Tomorrow we shall go back to our scattered places. God grant we shall go with faith and vision for every least regarded task. But before we go, and when we go, may we keep the consciousness of that which alone can dignify all the little tasks we do. In the Church-at-large today there must be the trumpet call of great beliefs. We must set ourselves to make the purpose of God authoritative in that public opinion and that public will which the power of the Church, if it choose, can create. We must believe that in the midst of the earth there can be built the spiritual city of the Presence of God, and here and now we must shape the unseen, yet irresistible, influences that shall enter as living stones into its walls.

Conference on Reduction of Armament
AND
THE SIXTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE WORLD ALLIANCE FOR INTERNATIONAL FRIENDSHIP THROUGH THE CHURCHES.

The leading churches and religious organizations of America were represented in the Congress on Reduction of Armaments that recently convened in Chicago. The meeting was planned by the American Branch of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches in connection with its sixth annual meeting. There were 350 regularly accredited delegates, representing twenty-three religious organizations and coming from twenty States in the Union. The topics discussed were those which relate to the life of the Church in relation to present world needs, and all centered upon the one purpose of securing immediately an international conference of Japan, Great Britain and America to bring about a reduction in the huge expenditures for armaments in these three nations. The belief was expressed in several speeches that if such a conference can be arranged other nations will also wish to join, and the result will be that a long step forward will be taken toward disarmament through international agreement.

Prominent among the speakers were: Dr. Arthur J. Brown, Dr. Samuel Eliot, Dr. Edward Cummings, of Boston; Mr. E. A. Filene, Rev. William P. Merrill, D. D., pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, and President of the American Branch of the World Alliance; Rev. Nehemiah Boynton, D. D., chairman of the International Committee of the World Alliance; Mr. Matthew Woll, representing the American Federation of Labor; Miss Jane Addams, and Hon. William Jennings Bryan.

Whereas, this Congress of the religious forces of America, called by the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, cannot see the nations of the world, in the face of universal misery and suffering, continue to concentrate on armaments the money and thought so deeply needed for reconstruction, without asserting afresh our faith that civilization must rest on confidence and co-operation rather than on suspicion and rivalry. It is our conviction that the immediate duty of governments is to find some practical way of substituting for suicidal competition of increasing armaments a policy of justice and brotherhood.

Whereas, those nations that ratified the treaty of Versailles obligated themselves to a limitation of armaments by expressly stating that the disarmament of Germany was the first step to render possible the "initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations"; and

Whereas, the government of Japan has indicated its willingness to confer with Great Britain and the United States for the limitation of naval armaments by agreement; and

Whereas, our honored President, Warren G. Harding, has stated in his message to Congress that we "stand ready at all times to co-operate with other nations to approximate disarmament, though prudence forbids us to disarm alone."

Now therefore be it resolved, that this Congress urge President Harding immediately to invite Great Britain and Japan to a conference to arrange a limitation of naval armaments by agreement; and

Be it further resolved, that this Congress, for itself and for those that it represents, pledge support by every possible means to the policy of reduction of armaments by agreement.

A strong committee was appointed to draft an appropriate resolution, of which committee the Rev. C. B. Wilmer, D. D., of Atlanta, Ga., was chairman. Mr. Raymond Robbins, one of its most active members, presented the accompanying resolution which was adopted unanimously at the final mass meeting, at which there were 3,000 people in attendance.

A copy of this resolution was sent to President Harding, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the President of the Senate.

The churches are dead in earnest in this matter. The Conference of United Brethren at Indianapolis passed a strong resolution, also the Presbyterians, in session at Winona Lake, Ind.; the Lutherans and many other bodies have joined, as well as the Christian Endeavor Society and many other important organizations within the Church itself. The Church is meeting the challenge that has been put up to it by the present situation, and on June 5 this matter will be presented in a united way in every community in America by the churches and religious organizations

Our Soldier Dead

(A Protest.)

Come toll
  For the dead;
Not for their soul—
  That has not fled!
Chant dole
  For him who said
Death's toll
  And our nation's dread
Were paid for a poor and selfish fear,
And not for mankind before Freedom's bier!

What! Did we send
  Our stalwart sons
Paid help to lend
  Greed's myrmidons
Did we defend Against the Huns
Some baser end
  That knighthood shuns?
Today are weeping kin bereft,
With such poor solace cheated, left?

If so,
  Bow down the head;
Bend low,
  And fresh tears shed!—
Oh, woe!
  Less for the dead
They flow
  Than those base-bred,
Who doomed them for aught lesser gain
Than rescue for a world in pain!

Nay, nay,
  It is not true!
None may Bid us to rue
That day
  When Freedom's residue
Through sacrificial clay
  Again to power grew!
O'er these, our offspring's hallowed remains,
We bless them for redemption's bitter pains.

Then ring
  The muffled bells
That bring
  Calm to the breast that swells
At slander's uttering.
  Strike dumb the tongue that tells
So vile a thing
  As that her children's lives Columbia sells!
We, their survivors, know these were her gift
That prostrate Liberty again her brow might lift!

So this Memorial Day,
Above their moldering clay
We rise to call them blest
In their eternal rest.
Their mortal part heroic bled o'er seas;
Their spirits light the Immortal Verities!

Toll, toll
  A proud and solemn knell;
Each soul
  Acclaim with reverential bell;
With iron tongues unroll
In mankind's ears,
Adown the years,
The inspiring rune these dead may no more tell!

—Herman Montagu Donner, in the New York Times.

The design of religion being to lead men to God—how He is to be served, appeased, attained—the business of a preacher should be to show how all the parts of religion contribute to these ends He that reads the Scriptures, and understands the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the way of conducting men thither, need not complain for want of learning. In preaching we must speak to the heart, as well as to the understanding and the ear. The end of preaching is to turn men from sin unto God, that they may be saved. He that has not this in his view will do little good. A preacher should accustom himself to give a practical turn to everything. He that leaves it to his hearers to apply what he has said, leaves to them the greatest part of his own duty. To be heartily in love with the truth one commands, is the great secret of becoming a good preacher. A good preacher's sermons must be instructions, not declamations.—Bishop Thomas Wilson

Church Intelligence

Disarmament.

The Presiding Bishop and the President of the Council desire to call attention to the fact that twenty-nine Christian denominations in this country have agreed upon Sunday, June 5, as a day when the clergy should speak to their people on the subject of the disarmament of the nations and offer special prayers for peace to the world. Such action on the part of American Christians has been urged by General Bliss, late chief of staff, and other leaders in military affairs, and commends itself to all Americans who believe that the government of the United States is the proper power to initiate such a movement.

Therefore, we feel justified in asking the bishops and clergy of the Episcopal Church to have special sermons and prayers on the day designated, Sunday, June 5.

Daniel S. Tuttle,
Presiding Bishop.
Thos. F. Gailor,
President of the Council.

Summer School, Charlottesville, Va.

The three Virginia Dioceses are cooperating in the Summer School for Sunday School Teachers, Clergy and Church Workers, to be held at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va., August 1 to August 12. Its scope has been greatly enlarged. The Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Virginia will pay the full expenses of one delegate from each Sunday school. and it is hoped that the schools will send additional delegates. Make your arrangements now and elect your delegates. Programs will be sent at once to the rectors of each parish. For special information write the Rev. J. F. Ribble, D. D., 1009 Floyd Avenue, Richmond, Va.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. Dr. Lee.

The Rev. Henry Bedinger Lee, D. D., a retired minister of the Diocese, died very suddenly at his home in Culpeper on Saturday night, May 21. Dr. Lee was sitting on his front porch with his family when he passed away. His funeral took place in Culpeper on the following Monday.

A scion of the distinguished family which has given so many sterling men not only to the State, but to the service of the Church, Dr. Lee was true to its traditions of character and consecration. He was a native of Shepherdstown, now in West Virginia, and as a youth enjoyed the friendship and pastoral training of the late Rev. Dr. Andrews, so prominent in the affairs of the Church in his day. After several years at Washington and Lee University, from which institution he afterwards received his doctor's degree, he entered the Theological Seminary in Virginia, graduating and receiving deacon's orders in June, 1875. His charges were successively in Goochland County, as assistant in St. James' Church, Richmond; Leeds Parish, Fauquier; Ridley Parish, Culpeper, and Christ Church, Charlottesville, all in the present Diocese of Virginia. He served the important church in Charlottesville for about twenty-seven years, during which time the present handsome church building was erected and the present work at St. Paul's Chapel at the University was founded with his hearty co-operation. Since his retirement several years ago he has lived in Culpeper, giving such occasional ministrations as he was able to the rural churches in the vicinity. He was a man of singular oneness of purpose, conspicuous for his devotion to the Church in the Diocese, and especially for his zeal for the upbuilding of its country work, an earnest evangelical preacher and pastor whose godly walk and conversation were patent to all observers.

Dr. Lee gave two sons to the ministry of the Church, the Rev. H. B. Lee, Jr., and the Rev J. K. M. Lee. Another son, Dr. Claude M. Lee, is a prominent medical missionary in China.

Ground Broken for New Church at Highland Springs.

On Monday afternoon, May 25, an impressive service took place when ground was broken for the construction of the new church at Highland Springs, which is to be called the Church of the Messiah. Bishop Brown turned the first spade of earth, and was followed by the minister in charge, the Rev. William Shacklett. Colonel Eugene C. Massie made a forcible address, and the choir from St. Paul's Church rendered appropriate selections. A number of the clergymen and laymen from Richmond were present, and all of the Episcopalians of Highland Springs, East Richmond and other adjacent places formed a large gathering, great interest being manifested by every one.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

An Unusual Service.

A service of unusual interest was held in St. Luke's Church, Isle of Wight County, on Tuesday, May 24. This was the annual historical and commemorative service. Bishop Tucker preached an historical sermon on the old church, and Bishop Thomson, assisted by the Rev. H. H. Covington, and the Rev. F. S. Cartwright, rector of the parish, celebrated the communion. Hundreds of people were present, coming from Norfolk, Suffolk and the surrounding country.

After the luncheon, which was served in the tower of the church. on account of the rain, a meeting of the Old Brick Church Association was called to order by the Executive President, the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D. .Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D. Executive officers, President, the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D.; First Vice-President, the Rev. H. H. Covington, D. D.; Second Vice-President, the Rev. John F. Coleman; Secretary, the Rev. Floyd Cartwright; Treasurer, Mr. E. H. Cofer. The officers reported that the Endowment Association had been perfected and that a charter had been issued and registered, and that there was now, including the gifts received at this service, about $1,500 endowment, of which $1,000 was given last year by Mrs. T. T. Spratley, of Smithfield, as a nucleus of an endowment which should continue forever and which should be for the preservation and maintenance of the church.

St. Luke's, known as "the Old Brick Church," is the oldest Episcopal Church, and with one exception the oldest church in the country. It was built in 1632, five years before the church at Jamestown, whose tower still stands, and only twenty-five years after the coming of the first settlers in 1607. It is a beautiful old brick church, and regular services are held there.

Commencement Exercises at St. Paul's School, Lawrenceville.

Commencement exercises of St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School were held in the chapel Wednesday, May 25. There were twenty-five graduates in the academic department, seventeen in the trades departments, and thirty-five from the grammar school. The Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., of Epiphany Church, Washington, delivered the address. Bishop Tucker gave out the diplomas. A scholarship was presented to the school by alumni in memory of Archdeacon Russell's wife. There was a truly splendid program of music, including several of the old darky hymn melodies.

Although terribly hampered by lack of money, the school has completed one of its most successful years. There were 577 students enrolled in all departments. Bishop Tucker recently visited the school and confirmed a class of twenty-two.

St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, Destroyed by Fire.

St. Luke's Church, Norfolk, the Rev. D. W. Howard, rector, was struck by lightning on May 23 and the interior and greater part of the roof were practically destroyed. It is reported the loss is estimated at $100,000.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Laymen's Meeting.

A meeting of the laymen of the Diocese was held just before the Council. Under the inspiration of Mr. W. D. Mount, of Lynchburg, and Mr. D. P. Sites, of Roanoke, almost seventy-five men assembled from all parts of the Diocese. The clergy were tolerated and the ladies were silent guests. A short service of prayer was conducted by Mr. A. D. W. Walton, and the meeting was in charge of Mr. C. E. Michael. In his opening remarks Mr. Michael emphasized three conspicuous blessings Southwestern Virginia had enjoyed in the past year: The establishment of Diocesan independence, the election of Bishop Jett as Diocesan, and the Nation-Wide Campaign. Mr. T. M. Terry, of Lynchburg, followed with an admirable talk on "The Church as an Asset in Business." Other interesting addresses were made by Colonel S. K. Fulkerson, of Bristol, on "The Church an Asset in Civic Life," and Mr. K. C. Whittle. of Martinsville, on "The Educational Need Which the Church Alone Can Meet."

During the evening a fine men's quartette, under the leadership of Mr. G. H. Baker, of Roanoke, sang inspiringly. Mr. S. V. Kemp, of Lynchburg, in the name of the laymen of the Diocese, presented the Bishop with a simple but beautiful amethyst ring. The gift was so entirely a surprise and the token of affection so evidently sincere, that the Bishop was profoundly stirred. Thus the Council was inaugurated in a spirit of affection and brotherly love, with the laymen taking their place by the side of the Bishop, of the clergy in addressing themselves to the Church's mission and responsibility in the present day.

K. M. B.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Gloria Dei Celebrates Two Hundred and Twenty-first Anniversary.

Gloria Dei (Old Swedes' Church) celebrated the two hundred and twenty-first anniversary of the consecration of the present edifice on the first Sunday after Trinity, May 29. The special speakers included the Rev. J. G. Hammarskold, of the Department of Americanization, and the Rev. Frank P. Parkin, of the American Bible Society. Services were first conducted on this site two hundred and forty-four years ago.

At the morning service the vestry and congregation joined in naming a sitting in what has been termed the pioneer's pew. The policy of the church is to endow a sitting each year on the occasion of the anniversary. The sitting this year was endowed in the name of Swan Swanson, one of the original Swedish settlers, who occupied a cottage near the site of the present church, and whose family gave the first piece of land toward the property of the present church in the locality then known as Wicaco. The presence of the Rev. Dr. Parkin, a Methodist pastor in the city, is one of the many growing evidences of the spirit of Church unity.

Commencement, Philadelphia Divinity School.

The fifty-sixth annual commencement of the Philadelphia Divinity School was held May 26 at St. Philip's Church, West Philadelphia. A class of five men graduated.

The Rev. Fred Ingley, Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Colorado, was the preacher. The Seminary, of which he is an alumnus of the class of 1906, conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology.

The members of the senior class are the Rev. Messrs. Wallace E. Conkling, Stanley V. Wilcox, Jacob A. Winterstein, W. Oliver Bellia and Cornelius Dawson. The choir of old St. Peter's Church furnished the music.

Dean Bartlett announced that work will soon be begun on the first unit of the new Divinity School at Forty-second and Spruce Streets, which will include class-rooms, a library, a chapel and a dining-room. To date more than $500,000 has been received in donations and pledges.

A memorial service commemorative of the life and work of the late Lieutenant Colonel Charles C. Pierce, U. S. A., was held in St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia, the Rev. C. Herbert Reese, rector, Sunday evening, May 29. The speaker was the Rev. H. Percy Silver, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, New York City, formerly chaplain of West Point, and an intimate friend of Dr. Pierce.

The bodies of Colonel and Mrs. Pierce, both of whom died in France, left Antwerp on the steamship Cambria and are due at Hoboken about June 4. They will be buried in Arlington National Cemetery, Washington.

The spring meeting of the Philadelphia Association of the students of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, was held at the City Club, Philadelphia, May 18. After luncheon was served the Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, D. D., rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, delivered the address on "Theological Education." The Rev. Richard W. Trapnell was elected president and Rev. R. R. Windley secretary and treasurer, and the Rev. Messrs. H. Teller Cocke, Henry J. Beagen and William T. Snead were appointed members of the Executive Committee. The greetings of the members were sent to the Rev. Dr. Carl E. Grammer in France, and a resolution of sympathy to Mrs. Stroup, widow of the Rev. Theodore Stroup, a member who had died since the last meeting.

The next meeting will be held in St. Andrew's Parish House, Wilmington, Del.

The annual meeting of the Daughters of the King of the Diocese was held Wednesday, May 25, in the parish house of Christ Church, Germantown, the members and guests being welcomed by the rector, the Rev. Charles H. Arndt. Represented in the gathering were members of the Girls' Friendly Society, the mothers' meeting, Woman's Auxiliary, the Altar Guild and the Girl Scouts. Addresses were delivered by Miss Jane Welte and the Rev. Sidney W. Creasy. The following officers were elected: Mrs. Charles H. Arndt, president; Mrs. J. C. Beatty, vice-president; Miss Gertrude W. Clay, secretary, and Miss Earl Beryl Jones, treasurer. At the close of the business session supper was served in the gymnasium for more than a hundred, and a church service followed, when the Bishop preached.

Old Trinity Church (Oxford), Philadelphia, observed its two hundred and twenty-third anniversary on Trinity Sunday. The rector, the Rev. Waldemar Jansen, Jr., preached in the morning, and the Rev. Sydney Goodman, rector of Emmanuel Church, Holmesburg, in the evening. The Church of England services were started there in 1698.

The Rev. A. R. Van Meter became rector of Calvary Church, Germantown, on Trinity Sunday, and Bishop Rhinelander preached at the institution service Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. All the clergy of Germantown, Mount Airy and Chestnut Hill were invited to the service, and a large number of the laymen from these neighboring churches attended.

The Rev. George H. Richardson, D. D., vicar of the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary, Philadelphia, is forming an auxiliary choir of men's voices for open-air preaching services to be conducted on Sunday evenings from June 1 to September 1 under the auspices of the Diocese.

By the will of the Rev. George F. Breed, D. D., who died April 17 in Mt. Airy, Philadelphia, the most of his estate, worth $78,500, will revert to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society. The will leaves $1,000 to the Berkeley Divinity School and the residue to be held in trust for two beneficiaries. After their decease the principle will go to the Missionary Society.

The annual presentation of the Bishop's Bricks Fund was held this year at Grace Church, Mt. Airy, the Rev. Thomas S. Cline, rector. Bishop Rhinelander officiated and received the "bricks" and "churches" made by the children. This fund is used by the Bishop for the erection of new churches in the Diocese.

A table for the alms basin given by the former Red Cross Chapter in memory of the boys of the parish who served in the world war was dedicated Sunday morning, May 29, at the Free Church of St. John, Kensington, Rev. Frank Goostray, rector.

R. R. W.

WEST VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Convention.

The forty-fourth annual convention of the Diocese was held in Trinity Church, Moundsville, the Rev. William Meade, rector, May 25-29. The opening service was held on Wednesday morning at 10:45, when the Rev. C. H. Goodwin, rector of Zion Church, Charlestown, preached the convention sermon, which was followed by celebration of Holy Communion, the Bishop and the Rev. R. E. L. Strider, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, being the celebrants. Immediately after the service the Bishop called the convention to order, and after roll call and organization he appointed the Committee on Credentials.

The reading of the Bishop's diary showed not only an increase in work and interest, but the largest increase in communicants that was ever made in the Diocese in one year. In his address, the Bishop spoke of the wonderful influence of the Nation-Wide Campaign and the interest it has created.

Recognizing the fact, generally known, that there is a great shortage of men offering for the ministry, the Diocese is particularly fortunate in having nearly every parish and mission filled. The Bishop also spoke of the good work being done by the Sheltering Arms and the Reynolds Memorial Hospitals, the latter being entirely under the supervision of Archdeacon B. M. Spurr.

The Rev. S. Roger Tyler, rector Trinity Church, Huntington, presented the report of the Advisory Board, in which recommendation was made for the appointment of a salaried Diocesan Religious Education Secretary. The suggestion was referred to the Committee on Religious Education, with the request that they report later.

Archdeacon W. P. Chrisman presented his report, which showed that the past year was the most active since his election to the office ten years ago. The elections were as follows:

The Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. Dudley Boogher, C. H. Goodwin, A. B. Mitchell; Judge Frank Beckwith, Mr. James Grantham, Mr. A. C. Miller.

Board of Diocesan Missions—The Rev. Messrs. S. S. Moore, D. D., A. N. Slayton, Dudley Boogher, W. Talor Willis, J. T. Carter; Messrs. W. G. Peterkin, Robert L. Boyd and D. E. Thoenen.

Almost the whole of Thursday was occupied with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Constitution and Canons. The convention as a committee of the whole took up the consideration of the various changes suggested by the committee that had been appointed, the chair being taken by Mr. W. G. Peterkin. Some of the changes proposed provoked much discussion, and the greater part of the day was thus occupied.

The Nation-Wide Campaign was represented by Dr. Patton on Friday afternoon, when he presented the aims and purposes of the campaign in a very forcible address.

The chairman of the Board of Finance made his report, and the quotas assessed the various parishes were adopted by the convention.

Proposed Election of a Bishop-Coadjutor. The date for holding the annual convention was changed from May or June, as heretofore, to the fourth Wednesday in January in each year, and it was resolved that at the convention to be held in Watson in January, 1922, the convention shall proceed to the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor, that notice of the said election shall be sent out with the notice of meeting of convention, and that the Diocesan Board of Finance be instructed to provide means for the support of proposed Bishop-Coadjutor.

On Wednesday evening the Rev. Lester Bradner, Ph. D., addressed the congregation on Religious Education. On Thursday evening the Rev. Ilbert de L. Brayshaw, rector Church of the Good Shepherd, Parkersburg, gave an address on Diocesan Missions. On Friday evening the Rev. Henry A. McNulty, missionary from China, spoke on Missions.

The business of the convention closed on Saturday morning. On Sunday morning Rev. John Gass, of Trinity Church, Parkersburg, was the preacher. The evening service was in charge of Bishop Gravatt, and Dr. L. W. Glazebrook. Washington, D. C., gave an address on a Layman's Message to Men.

The thanks of the members of the convention were given to the vestry and members of Trinity Church for their splendid hospitality. The ladies served lunch each day, which was all that could be desired by the most fastidious.

The Woman's Auxiliary held their meetings at St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling. Meetings were held on Thursday at 9:30 A. M., 2:30 P. M. and 7:30 P. M., and on Friday at 9:30 A. M. and 2:30 P. M. Lunch was served each day at noon in the lecture room of the church.

J. L. F.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

Commencement at the General Theological Seminary.

Heavy rain dampened the ardor and affected the program of the commencement at the General Seminary this year. Only twelve men were graduated, the smallest class in many years, and far below demands for men in many dioceses. Bishop Lines, of Newark, the only Bishop present, presided, and degrees were conferred by the dean. The address was given by the Rev. John W. Nichols, dean of St. John's, Shanghai, and contained sound advice to ministers, young and old, concerning their own life and conduct as examples of the faith.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Horace Percy Silver, rector of the Incarnation Parish, New York, and Master of Divinity upon the Rev. Donald F. Forrester, instructor and fellow at the Seminary. The baccalaureate sermon was given by Bishop Cook, of Delaware, and the alumni essayist this year was the Rev. Robert Philip Kreittler, of Scranton.

Those graduated were Louis Hunton Berry, St. Louis, Mo.; Walter Charles Bihler, Chicago, Ill.; Herbert Edgar Catlin, Ridgefield Park, N. J.; Henry Hamblin Chapman, Ferrisburg, Va.; Robert Cornell, Flushing, L. I.; Harold Peter Kaulfuss, Glens Falls, N. Y.; Frank Lambert, Baltimore, Md.; John Reardon McGrory, Philadelphia, Pa.; Vincent Fowler Pottle, Farmington, Me.; Rush Wiley Smith, Baltimore, Md.; Leonard Clark Wolcott, Highland Park, Ill., and Gustav Adolph Zeltner, the Bronx.

The Greek alumni prize was won by Mr. Hamblin. Prizes for meritorious work were presented as follows: Ward and Gary prize for seniors, to Albert Henry C. Ohse, of New York; Gary prize for middlers, Robert Stanley Lambert, New York; Gary prize for juniors, Harold Leslie Gibbs, of Westfield, Mass.

Colored Chapel Consecrated.

St. Michael's Parish, the Rev. Thomas McCandless, rector, has permanently established St. Jude's Chapel for colored Church people, and it was consecrated on May 26 by Bishop Manning. It is an interesting bit of history that the first child Bishop Manning baptized was a colored one years ago in Tennessee, the first class he confirmed was in St. David's in the Bronx, and the first chapel he consecrates is St. Jude's. The location is quite near to Central Park and in St. Michael's Parish. Besides the land the chapel has cost $110,000. On a lot only twenty-five feet front an auditorium seating three hundred has been provided, with handsome choir stalls, robing room and office for the vicar, the Rev. Florda Howard. Above are class-room and gymnasium, which can be thrown together for exhibitions. Next come guild rooms and above still is a complete day nursery, with fine appointments of examination, isolation and rest-rooms, with open porches, one for infants and one for children. Still higher up are apartments for the vicar, and on the roof is a playground. In the basement is a store. The work of St. Jude's was carried on for some years by the City Mission Society, and it has done much for the social and spiritual uplift of the neighborhood.

Historic old All Saints' has a Netherlands Museum, and last year it conducted a fellowship research. Results of this research were presented on May 27, when the ninety-seventh anniversary of the parish was observed by the vicar, the Rev. Dr. Kenneth S. Guthrie, and sermon by the Rev. Frank M. Townley, of Brooklyn. There were shown diplomas of the graduates of the first Woman's College in the United States, the Rutgers Female Institute, and there was put in place for use hereafter the old "wineglass" pulpit which was taken out of St. John's Chapel in Varick Street in 1860. The pulpit is at least two hundred years old.

C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial Day and "Music Week" claimed at least a part of the services in many of the churches on the first Sunday after Trinity, May 29. In accordance with a request by those in charge of "Music Week," special music and organ recitals were heard in a large number of the churches. Special sermons in honor of Memorial Day were preached, and at Trinity Church, Takoma Park, a patriotic service was held, when the service flag was lowered in the presence of a large congregation, including the "veterans of foreign wars," Boy Scouts and other organizations.

A special confirmation service was held in the Bethlehem Chapel of the Washington Cathedral on Thursday, June 2, at 5 P. M., by Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, Bishop of the Diocese. This service is held every year, especially for the sake of those who, on account of illness or some other reason, were not able to be confirmed in their parish churches at the time of the Bishop's regular visitations.

President C. B. D. King, the President of the Republic of Liberia, addressed the Episcopal League at its recent meeting at St. Monica's Church. The Episcopal League is an organization of colored churchmen of the Diocese.

The regular open air service around the Peace Cross at the Washington Cathedral was given over as the baccalaureate service for St. Alban's School for Boys on Sunday, May 29, when the preacher was the Rt. Rev. Frederick Foote Johnson, D .D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Missouri.

M. M. W.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop observed the thirteenth anniversary of his consecration with a celebration of the Holy Communion at Christ Church, Savannah, on Friday, May 20. All of the clergy in the city were present.

Mission of Gypsy Smith, Jr.: Augusta has been greatly stirred by the mission of Gypsy Smith, Jr., who spent the month of April in that city, speaking nightly in a tent that held over 5,000 people, many going four hours before the time set for the meeting in order to get good seats. Results are being shown in a cleaner and better city, the organization of a men's club to do personal and evangelistic work in the city and country, and several union Bible classes. The rector of St. Paul's Church, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, co-operated with the Protestant ministers in holding union prayer meetings in preparation for the mission, and one result that has accrued for this parish is an extra confirmation class presented to the Bishop on May 26. The Bishop confirmed a class on April 17, and the rector asked for a second visitation for the purpose of administering the rite again to a number who had been led into the church by the teaching of Gypsy Smith.

Christ Church Mission: Since the removal of the Rev. P. T. Prentiss to the Diocese of Florida, the Diocesan Board of Missions has placed Christ Church Mission, Augusta, under the care of the Rev. G. S. Whitney, rector of St. Paul's Church. The population of that neighborhood is composed largely of people employed in the cotton mills. The mission was started thirty-five years ago by the Bishop of Florida, when he was rector of the Good Shepherd, Augusta. About July 1 the Bishop will ordain to the deaconate Mr. Manning M. Patillo, who will take up the work under the oversight of the Rev. Mr. Whitney. In the interim services are being kept up with the assistance of lay readers, members of St. Paul's Parish, which has just pledged $600 towards the support of the mission, doubling what it has given in the past.

E. D. J.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop.

Recruiting for the Ministry.

In an effort to secure candidates for the ministry, a commission has been appointed by Bishop Charles D. Williams, composed of the Rev. J. B. Pengelly, Flint, as chairman, and with the Rev. W. M. Washington, Detroit; Archdeacon H. K. Bartow, Detroit; Archdeacon C. L. Ramsay, Detroit, and Archdeacon E. B. Jermin, Bay City.

This commission is to go into the subject of recruiting for the ministry, and to consult with other dioceses as to methods which are being used. It is expected that a special effort will be made through the medium of preaching services, conferences, etc., to swell the ranks of ministerial students.

It is also likely that the commission will take special steps in trying to interest some of the Episcopal students at the University of Michigan.

In his address to the annual Diocesan Convention, Bishop Williams stated that the great dirth of candidates for Holy Orders seemed to be among the ranks of young men of high school and university age who are just finishing their education and planning to go into some form of professional or business life work. He said that there come to him from time to time men of middle age who feel the call to go into the ministry, but who, because of lack of proper training and preparation, will always be handicapped, even if they are ordained.

The commission for securing candidates will confine its efforts largely to recruiting from the ranks of older boys and young men in the church.

Grace Church, one of the latest churches to be organized by the Anglican Communion, has already outgrown its parish building, which was constructed about a year ago, and during the past week more than $18,000 has been pledged to put an addition on the existing building. The addition will provide for increased auditorium space for the holding of church services as well as janitor's quarters, a study for the rector, etc. Construction is to be begun in the immediate future. The Rev. B. W. Pullinger, formerly a chaplain in the Canadian Army, is the rector of the Church.

I. C. J.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Women to Serve on Vestries and in Convention.

The fiftieth annual convention of the Diocese was held at the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, May 18 and 19, with pre-convention events beginning on Tuesday evening, May 17, with a mass meeting in the high school auditorium. The Bethlehem Steel Company male chorus, under the direction of Mr. John T. Watkins, of Scranton, furnished the music for the mass meeting, the speakers being the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, Bishop of Delaware; the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Presiding Bishop of the Council; the Hon. Henry A. Fuller, Presiding Judge of Luzerne County; Mr. Charles M. Schwab, of the Bethlehem Steel Company, and Bishop Talbot. Wednesday morning was taken up by Conferences on Christian Social Service, Missions and Church Extension, Service and Stewardship and Religious Education. There was also a conference for lay delegates only, on Increased Lay Activity. Wednesday afternoon was devoted to recreation.

The chief business of the convention was to observe appropriately the fiftieth anniversary of the Diocese of Bethlehem, formerly known as the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania, the thirty-fourth anniversary of Bishop Talbot's consecration, and the Bishop's twenty-third anniversary as the Bishop of this Diocese. The most interesting accomplishment was the extension to women of the right to serve as members of vestries, delegates to the Diocesan Convention, and to hold any office other than member of the Standing Committee, Secretary, Treasurer or Chancellor of the Diocese. There was, of course, no extension of the right to receive Holy Orders. It was whispered that the news was received by Woman's Auxiliary with little show of enthusiasm, although a resolution of thanks was passed. The most important action was the reorganization of the "Bishop and Executive Council" established by the preceding convention, and the erection of two "convocations" to take the place of the Archdeaconries existent before the convention of 1920.

The convention proper opened with a service in the Pro-Cathedral on Wednesday evening. Bishop Talbot, in a short address, called attention to his annual address, which had been printed and was distributed at the close of the service. Two remarkably inspiring addresses were made by Mr. George Wharton Pepper, of Philadelphia, and Dr. James E. Freeman, of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington.

Mr. Ira W. Stratton, of Reading, who had served efficiently as Secretary since the decease of Mr. David Jarvis Fearsall, requested that he be not re-elected, and Mr. Trembath, of Grace Church, Dorranceton, was elected Secretary.

As the Bishop in his address had announced his intention to call a special convention in November for the purpose of electing a Bishop-Coadjutor, having had reliable assurances that the support of such a Coadjutor would be provided for without increasing the Diocesan assessments and without drawing on the resources of the Nation-Wide Campaign, on motion of the Chancellor, it was decided that this convention adjourn to meet at the call of the Bishop for the election of a Coadjutor-Bishop, and an invitation from St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, to hold the adjourned session in that parish was accepted.

At 11 o'clock the members of the Woman's Auxiliary entered the convention hall, and in a very graceful address expressive of the loyalty, affection and devotion of all the people of the Diocese, Mr. Horace de Y. Lentz presented to the Bishop, as from "the plain people of the Diocese," a purse of $2,200, with the hope that it would be used in the purchase of a new automobile. The Rt. Rev. James H. Darlington, Bishop of the Daughter-Diocese of Harrisburg, addressed the convention, bringing the greetings of his people and their congratulations upon the fiftieth anniversary of the Mother-Diocese and the thirty-fourth anniversary of Bishop Talbot's consecration and his twenty-third year as Bishop of this Diocese.

The elections resulted as follows:

Standing Committee — The Rev. Messrs. J. A. Glasier, S. U. Mitman, J. P. Ware, J. H. Griffith, W. N. Weir; Messrs. A. N. Cleaver, C. J. Smith, E. G. Mercur, F. M. Kirby and R. H. Patterson.

Executive Council—The Rev. Messrs. F. W. Sterrett, R. P. Kreitler, J. I. B. Larned, A. E. Clattenburg, W. B. Beach, S. E. Neikirk; Messrs. T. W. Brown, Leonard Peckitt, W. A. Wilbur, N. H. Hiller, J. P. Jones and W. R. Coyle.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod at Wilmington—The Rev. Messrs. J. P. Briggs, G. N. Holmes, R. N. Merriman, S. E. Neikirk; Messrs. William Hutchinson, Ira W. Stratton, H. W. Kingsbury and W. R. Coyle.

The convention accepted an invitation from St. Luke's Church, Scranton, for the next annual meeting.

Mr. Rodney A. Mercur, chairman of the Finance Committee, in presenting his report, called attention to the fact that the fiscal year had closed with a balance of $4,298.52 in the hands of the treasurer.

Mr. W. A. Wilbur, Treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign, reported that the total pledges had amounted to $108,414.85; the amount actually paid in was $99,025.28, of which $3,098.66 had been over-payments. The balance due from parishes and unpaid April 30, four months after the close of the fiscal year, was $12,488.23.

The Rev. R. W. Patton, campaign director of the Nation-Wide Campaign, made addresses on Wednesday and Thursday mornings.

W. M.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

Report of Convention (Continued).

In the Bishop's address to the convention there were many things to bring joy to the hearts of the Church people of Kansas. Five hundred and twenty-nine persons were confirmed since the last convention, which is the largest number on record in the Diocese, and the per capita given has advanced from 82 cents to $4.01. Among the things he stressed was the better observance of Lent in order that the world may learn the spiritual truths the season means to teach. He also asked that a committee be appointed to provide a fitting memorial to Bishop Vail—the prophet—who saw the opportunity for the Church in Kansas and proceeded to secure valuable pieces of lands throughout the Diocese. It has been suggested that the memorial be a bronze statue which will be placed in the front of Bethany College.

Monday of the convention was largely given up to reports from the various departments of the Bishop and Council, all of which showed good progress in spite of the newness of the machinery. The best report came from the N.-W. C. Department. The Board of Religious Education also had a most interesting report.

A canon was adopted establishing the Bishop and his Council. The Bishop's salary was increased to $5,000, and he was given a little larger expense fund. The Standing Committee was re-elected. Delegates to the General Convention are: Clerical—The Rev. Messrs. J. P. deB. Kaye, E. A. Edwards, H. C. Attwater and Otis E. Gray. Lay—Seth J. Bailey, O. B. Hardcastle, John McE. Ames and Charles Magil.

All of the organizations of the women met at the same time, and their reports showed a most healthy condition. The United Thank Offering is considerably ahead to date. The box secretary reported over $1,000 sent out last year by her department. Mrs. H. C. Attwater was elected president of the Auxiliary.

The closing event of the convention was the dinner at which all visitors were the guests of the Cathedral. It was an occasion of song and cheer, punctured with short speeches, and everybody went home feeling in the best of spirits because of the fine things done last year.

R. Y. B.

NEW JERSEY

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

In Trinity Church, Swedesboro, N. J., on Sunday, May 1, there were used for the first time the memorials which have been in the process of erection for some time. The first was a set of altar lights given in memory of Helen Mitchell, wife of James J. Davidson, Jr.; a pulpit of white paneled columns with mahogany rail and brass trimmings in memory of Isaac H. Vanneman and Marietta Hewes, his wife. Mr. Vanne-

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

GOOD WORDS FOR COVINGTON.

We are using this week a letter from Dr. Hastings Hart about the Covington School.

We give this matter an unusual amount of space for several reasons; first, because Dr. Hart is a recognized authority on institutions throughout the country; second, because the school at Covington, Va., is one of the very few of its character supported by the Protestant Episcopal Church; third, because all institutions of this sort are liable to adverse and unfair criticism at times from persons who do not know the conditions and difficulties under which they operate, and lastly, because the suggestions to trustees offered in this letter are equally applicable and useful to trustees of other institutions.

Dr. Hart writes as follows:

Rev. George Floyd Rogers, President,
Home for Boys, City:

Dear Mr. Rogers:

"In accordance with your request, I offer the following suggestions with reference to the Home for Boys, based upon two visits to the Home. I have made no formal or intensive study of the Home, and my suggestions will therefore be general and informal.

I desire at the outset to congratulate you upon the extraordinary progress which you have made in the short period of about ten years. You have already an investment of nearly $300,000 in lands, buildings and endowments. If you take into account the increased value of farming land and the present replacement of cost of such buildings as you have erected, I suppose that $350,000 would not be an extravagant estimate of the present value of your investment; and this estimate takes no account of the goodwill represented in annual contributions of more than $30,000 for current expenses. (If capitalized at 5 per cent., this would be the interest on $600,000.) Nor does it take account of the potential value of bequests in wills already written, which may easily amount to more than $200,000.

I congratulate you, in the second place, upon the style and quality of your plant, as far as you have gone. You have wisely adopted the cottage unit of twenty boys. Your cottages are conveniently planned, well lighted, cheerful and attractive.

I would earnestly advise that the members of your board avail themselves of every opportunity to visit schools and homes similar to yours—such places as the New Jersey State Industrial School at Jamesburg, the New York Orphanage, the Hawthorne School, Lincondale, and many others.

I congratulate you upon the adoption of a budget. It will be a matter of two or three years of study and experiment to adjust it to your needs, but in the long run it will enable you to plan your work more intelligently and to manage it more economically. Your estimate of about $375 per year per boy seems large at first sight, but it is not excessive for so small a number as 130 or 140. Formerly such schools as yours ran on a budget of $175 or $200, but today the necessary expenses are practically doubled. The State of New Jersey is appropriating this year for its two State industrial schools at the rate of $540 per child.

In common with most of the institutions for children in the United States, the Home has suffered in its personnel because of the war. The army, the navy, the Y. M. C. A., the war camp activities, etc., drew heavily upon the material needed for this kind of work, and the higher salaries offered for competent people competed actively with institutions which could not meet these high rates. Many good workers were drawn away by these opportunities, but many, inspired by a true missionary spirit, made a large pecuniary sacrifice to stay by the work. This self-sacrificing spirit is seen among your staff. You have, on the whole, an exceptionally high class of house mothers, and you are greatly favored in the devoted spirit of your director of boy activities, who is your superintendent, Dr. Rogers.

I do not doubt but that the Board of Directors realize the high quality of your superintendent. I am personally acquainted with many of the leading superintendents of children's institutions in the United States, and I do not hesitate to place your superintendent in the front rank. He is a gentleman and a scholar and a teacher of high renown. He loves boys, and they love him. He has the highest ideals of unselfish devotion, as is proven by his abandonment of an honorable and congenial place in order to devote himself to the development of unfortunate and neglected boys.

The early years of such an institution as yours necessarily involves incessant heart-breaking work, with primitive equipment, inadequate staff and insufficient funds. It involves a long and tedious course of pioneering and experiments, from which there is no escape, and which must be patiently carried through. These pioneer labors are never appreciated by the public, and, indeed, it is difficult for the trustees who visit the Home from time to time to realize what a daily grind it is. The search for competent employees, and the effort to hold them when found, on meagre salaries; the effort to train and educate incompetent people, only to have the disagreeable task of dismissing them as hopeless at last when they depart with a deep sense of injury; daily attention to a hundred business details for lack of competent lieutenants; the incessant struggle to hold expenses down to available finds; the mortification of a monthly array of bills past due to merchants and contractors who have generously worked without profit.

I doubt not that the trustees, after the manner of trustees, exhort him to keep down expenses and improve the dietary; to get rid of incompetent employees, but not to increase the salary budget; to keep his boys looking neater in that second-hand clothing; to take a holiday and not to worry.

At the same time very likely somebody is bidding for his secretary or his best teacher; the head cook has given notice; a house-mother is sick in bed; the boys and the employees are forbidden to visit the town because of an epidemic of scarlet fever; a couple of boys are quarantined on suspicion of mumps; and three boys have run away, necessitating telephone notice to all neighboring towns around and an automobile trip for their recovery. Practically all of these things and more happened in the three days of my stay at the school last week.

Meantime, the superintendent is working on a budget for next year, planning and painting with his own hands a most ingenious chart for a graphic record of the social and educational record of each boy; planning with the County Highway Commissioner an important road improvement and a scheme for pumping soil from the river bottom to grade his playground; working with two auditors on a reclassification of accounts and a new bookkeeping system; coaching the baseball nine for Saturday's game; dealing kindly, yet severely, with some returned runaways and entertaining hospitably a couple of guests.

From my own personal observation, I think it is no exaggeration to say that the superintendent is 'on the job' from twelve to fourteen hours a day (sometimes more), and that much of his time is employed upon details which might be well performed by competent subordinates if you had them.

How does he keep up? Well, he loves his work; he is enlisted in it heart and soul. Then he realizes that he is working at a constructive job. It is a human work, making real men and good citizens out of the waste material of society. Perhaps the chief secret of his endurance and his success is that he has a wife, who, though not on the pay roll, is yet on the job. She can run a cottage or take charge of the kitchen and dining-room. Indeed, she has more than once acted as superintendent in her husband's absence. She does much of the buying, and she works with a squad of boys in beautifying the grounds. She is a helpmate for her husband, an inspiration, a dynamo, a balance wheel. She regulates his diet, nurses his headaches, cheers his blues, makes him laugh, sends him fishing, plays the diplomat with the employees and visitors. She renders the Home a thousand dollars' worth of service each year as a free gift with the utmost joy and cheerfulness.

The best thing at the Boys' Home is not its beautiful site, with its noble mountain view; not its fertile river bottom lands, nor its valuable water-power; not its fine dairy barn; not its well-planned cottages or its domestic buildings or its power-house; not its achievements in accumulating property and legacies. The outstanding thing about the Home is the fine spirit that pervades the place from top to bottom—the spirit of the trustees, with its audacious president, who stops at nothing for the upbuilding of the Home; the spirit of the superintendent and his wife, which is a leaven through the entire place; the spirit of most of the employees, unselfish and devoted to the development of the boys into real men; the spirit of the boys' ambitions to grow into real men, earnest, patriotic, clean and wholesome.

I believe that the Home has a real mission for the development of the neglected boys into real manhood. I hope that you may be able to continue and prosper without calling on the State Treasury for aid, in order that you may preserve your independence and maintain the high ideals which have characterized the Home thus far.

Yours sincerely,

Hastings H. Hart,
Director Department of Child Helping Russell Sage Foundation, New York."

Family Department

JUNE.

1. Wednesday.
5. Second Sunday after Trinity.
11. Saturday. S. Barnabas.
12. Third Sunday after Trinity.
19. Fourth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Friday. Nativity S. John Baptist.
26. Fifth Sunday after Trinity.
29. Wednesday. S. Peter.
30. Thursday.

Collect for Second Sunday After Trinity.

O Lord, Who never failest to help and govern those whom Thou dost bring up in Thy steadfast fear and love; Keep us, we beseech Thee, under the protection of Thy good providence, and make us to have a perpetual fear and love of Thy holy Name; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Source.

Eleanor E. Mitchell.

We seek for wealth,
Our very souls grow faint with dread,
Fearing 'twill not be found;
And yet, oh man! What are life's riches, after all,
Compared with the wealth of God.

We seek for knowledge,
We would know all, nor leave one earthly mystery unexplained,
Fail not, ye wise of earth, to learn of God!
We nothing know of heaven or earth or men,
Who know not Him.

We long for power;
And on life's page of fame would have our names outshine all others,
What profit when the world's applause be won,
Should we not hear, in loving praise,
The Master's own "Well done."

We say we love;
And call this little flickering flame within our hearts, devotion,
Yet love not God.
Oh selfish human heart! blind not thyself, all that endures is from above
For God is love, and love is God.

'Tis only from the Realm of Many Mansions,
Can come the riches of our soul's long quest,
Seek first that kingdom.
Then when wealth and knowledge pall, when power grows dim,
And what we thought was perfect love, looks up for something higher,
The Everlasting Arms will close around us
And bear us, as a weary, trusting child,
Into that kingdom.

Poor Mr. Van Horn.

PART II.

In less than a week the two girls were the best of friends, and together they reduced the house to beautiful order. The minister never dreamed that the repose of the clean, orderly rooms, the meals on time, the simple food that was all his sister could master, and the freedom from interruptions, had anything to do with the matter, but certainly for some reason he never felt so deeply moved to write a sermon that would touch hearts, nor did he ever have so much freedom for calls. If he had known that people found his lively sister uninteresting and inattentive, as they termed it, and they would not come in to call as they had done when the mistress of the house was at home, he would probably have worried about it all, but of this he was unconscious. They simply pitied him because he had such a rattle-brained housekeeper, and gave the house a wide berth.

"Now you can entertain the Young People's Society with a clear conscience," said Mary Bentley the following week. "I'll help you with the refreshments and—"

"They've changed the meeting place," said Betty, quickly. "Mrs. Forbes is going to take the meeting."

"Mrs. Forbes! She'll make a great president," groaned Mary. "Oh, dear! We miss Mrs. Vanhorn at every turn. We all depended upon her so. If I thought I could ever help my James as much as she has helped Mr. Vanhorn I'd die content. Really, Betty, we know her better than you do, for she has belonged to us all this time, while you've only seen her a few times. She's a wonderful woman. Such good, common sense, and such talent combined. You know there are plenty of good people, excellent people and Christians besides, who are not properly balanced, but Mrs. Vanhorn could and did fit in anywhere. We'll never get another minister's wife like her. The whole congregation is praying that she may be returned to us, for we are helpless without her. The other day at the Missionary Society Mrs. Croft didn't know that a motion had to be seconded before she put it before the house. Everything was in confusion, and will be until Mrs. Vanhorn gets home to straighten out the tangles."

For four months Miss Betty Vanhorn ruled over the household of her brother and then the specialist said that perhaps in a month or two more Mrs. Vanhorn might return to Greendale. The time had gone rapidly for all concerned, and the entire congregation united in rejoicing that their beloved minister's troubles were almost at an end, and once more he would have his family with him. But they also said that the affliction had worked wonders for the young minister, for never before had they heard such sermons as he had preached since sickness had broken up his family and brought him financial and mental difficulties.

"And I suppose you'll be glad to get back home again, Miss Betty," said Mrs. Lake graciously, as she gave Betty a seam to baste at the meeting of the Aid Society. "No, not that way! Hold the two pieces firmly together and don't let them slip. Perhaps I had better give you these dish towels to hem, as this child's nightgown is a bit too hard for you. Greendale is rather a quiet place for a young lady used to a larger city."

"Why, yes, of course it will be pleasant to be at home again," said Betty, thankfully accepting the heavy dish towel, "but I have enjoyed my stay in Greendale very much. The people have all been so kind and considerate to me, and I have learned to love them. They recognized the fact that I never could be like Mrs. Vanhorn, and they have not asked impossibilities. Through their kindness I have been able to have Arthur's meals on time and give him every opportunity to study. Do you know that for the past six weeks my mornings have been absolutely free from interruptions? That is a wonderful thing and one that will work well for Evelyn when she gets home. Arthur has made more calls in less time and has done more real work, he says, than for a long time, but it is only because his people have been so lovely to him."

There was not the slightest suspicion of guile in her innocent tones, and she looked at Mrs. Lake with child-like frankness. That lady gasped a few times, which might have been due to the lint from the outing-flannel nightgown she was ripping to pieces to correct Betty's errors, and then she said calmly: "We have always had the reputation of being kind to our pastors, and, of course, we feel specially sorry for poor Mr. Vanhorn in his affliction."

"And I assure you Arthur appreciates your sympathy," said Betty warmly. "Only yesterday he was telling Dr. Butterfield how you ladies had taken up the work Mrs. Vanhorn had been forced to lay down, and how efficiently you have been doing it. In fact, he thinks every organization is in better shape now than for years past. Evelyn did her best, of course, but she was taken up with too many things, and not physically able to do justice to her home and all the societies. Arthur was saying that the finances in every society are getting on a firmer basis, and it is all due to the loyal support the ladies have given the work. I wish I could be half so good as Arthur and so full of faith. All I can see is Evelyn, delicate and broken down, needing months of rest and care, but Arthur can look right through his troubles to the time when she will be able to be assured of normal health and sound nerves. It has been a great experience to me to be here all this time, and I'll never forget all your kindness to me." It was a long speech for Betty, and she had to break off to wop her eyes, but five minutes later she was all smiles and dimples again, and Mrs. Lake was trying to show her how to keep the hem even and firm. Finally that lady took the work into her own capable hand and Betty went to the kitchen to help Mary Bentley with the refreshments.

But out in the corner of the pantry Mary Bentley was giving Betty a rapturous hug as she whispered excitedly: "You did it, didn't you? I was afraid your courage would leak out. My dear child, you have revolutionized all my ideas of what a minister's wife should be and do, and I'll never cease to be thankful for you. And to think, we all felt sorry for Mr. Vanhorn because you had to come and look after him! Well, it all turned out right, and that is all that is necessary. And now let's go in and serve the refreshments, for I rather imagine the shock has made them hungry. Yes, we're coming, Mrs. Blake. Everything is ready now."—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Hunger for the Gospel.

A missioonary was traveling in a distant part of Nyassaland, where no European preacher had yet been. One afternoon he reached a native village, soon the headman of the village and several others came to greet him, offering a hearty welcome. The missionary told them the purpose of his journey, stating that he was a messenger of the great God and that he came to tell them of His salvation.

"Oh, yes," replied the headman, "we know about Him."

"What do you mean?" asked the missionary. "What do you know about Him, and from whom have you heard?"

"Some time back," was the answer, "one of the boys from your mission passed this way. He carried a book with him, and when we asked him what it was, he said it was the Word of God in our language. We asked him to read to us out of it, and when we had heard we wanted to hear more, so we persuaded him to stay with us a little while.

"Then he told us that if we wanted to worship the great God, out of whose book he was reading to us, we must rest one day out of seven, and next, we must build a house in which to pray to Him. We agreed to do so, and went to the forest to cut poles, while our wives cut grass for the roof. And so we built the house that you see there, which is the house of God.

"Well, the youth remained with us for some weeks, reading to us out of the Word of God and praying for us. Afterwards he had to proceed on his journey. But, although we have no one to teach us, we still worship God in His house."

"And how do you worship Him now?" asked the missionary.

"We just come together on every seventh day, and sit down in the house of God, and there we wait before Him and are quite silent. We have no one to read to us or teach us, and we do not know how to pray, so we just sit still, and we think that the great God will see us, and He will say, 'There are some people who have no one to teach them and who want the word,' and perhaps He will send us a teacher."—Andrew Murray.

Reliance.

Not to the swift the race;
Not to the strong the fight;
Not to the righteous perfect grace;
Not the wise the light.

But often faltering feet
Come surest to the goal;
And they who walk in darkness meet
The sunrise of the soul.

A thousand times by night
The Syrian hosts have died;
A thousand times the vanquished right
Hath risen glorified.

The truth the wise men sought
Was spoken by a child;
The alabaster box was brought
In trembling hands defiled.

Not from my torch the gleam,
But from the stars above;
Not from my heart life's crystal stream,
But from the depths of love.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Music in the Home.

If you should ask the average mother of a family to play for you even a simple folk song or a waltz, what would her answer be This is a conundrum which should interest all parents, and why? Because so much musical education is impractical.

I once heard a father complain that he had spent a thousand dollars in order to have Anita learn "Pussy's Waltz"—and that she soon forgot it!

Josef Hoffman says that music is a spiritual influence, and we all admit that it is a social asset as well. Imagine a party without music! Why have young girls "taken" so many lessons, if they do not make use of them when a need arises?

Music is a language of sound. Every home needs music. Children are happier and healthier when they go to sleep or wake up singing. The ancient Greeks gave music the first place in the education of little children, and modern educators are beginning to do the same. Musical games, folk dancing and good songs add to the happiness of little children, and every mother should be able to play simple songs.

The reason why so much money has been spent without results is because many musicians teach children noisy, rapid "pieces" with which to impress the listener. Parents have wanted to "show off" their children, and teachers have catered to parents. The children were bored—and stopped this artificial process as soon as they could.

A young girl, if she is not forced to "perform," can learn to apply the principles of melody, rhythm and harmony in a few years. The woman who can sing, play and harmonize simple music has a means of expression which soothes the irritants of life, both for herseelf and others. Who cares whether she ever plays difficult music, if she can play some beautiful ballads and folk songs and perhaps some of the simpler classics? Her father, her husband and her children will feel the spiritualizing influence of music every day. The music that fills the minds of children in a more or less unconscious way makes for continual joy and harmony. I know a family of five children who were brought up with music as a natural environment. There was no talk of special performances, but music was substituted for the small discussions and irritating household arguments common in most homes. "Let's sing," was the natural exclamation when they were gathered together, or, "Mother is going to play for us that Beethoven Minuet. Let's all keep quiet."

In this whirling civilization of ours, when scarcely any one stops to think, to say nothing of actually listening to the still, small voice, music enters as an angel that stands ready to serve us in making life more harmonious.—Harriet A. Seymour.

Nothing's New to China.

Young women who insist upon tacking their maiden name over that of their husband's on the front door-bell are not as modern as they think. For centuries in China a woman has had the choice of keeping her maiden name after marriage. Even her husband often adopts the habit.

"Only friends made after marriage usually call a woman by her new name," writes Miss Elizabeth Durfee, Y. W. C. A. Secretary in Nanking, China. "Her maiden name is used by her friends who knew her before marriage. Our Chinese teacher always calls his wife Miss Chang."

Lending a Hand.

The man ahead of me at the savings department window seemed an interminable time finishing his business. Apparently all his family had intrusted him with its precious bank books, and he was in no haste. He was a rough-looking man, and his heavy clothing and big boots showed him a worker at some outdoor occupation. Finally the last bank book was returned, the last dividend given him, and I was about to step to the window, when he addressed the clerk again.

"I'd like to take out a bank book for George Blank," he said. "Make it out to him, and here's five dollars to his credit. He's just out o' jail—and I want to give him a little start." As he took the new bank book, replaced his shabby pocketbook in his old coat pocket, and moved away from the window, I did not regret my time of waiting.

It is doubtful if that teamster had ever heard of Dr. Edward Everett Hale and his famous four maxims, but he certainly understood what it means to "lend a hand," and had exemplified, to at least one interested listener, the great principle of human brotherhood. —Congregationalist.

The Twilight Falls.

The twilight falls, the night is near,
I fold my work away,
And kneel to One who bends to hear
The story of a day.
The old, old story; yet I kneel
To tell it at Thy call;
And cares grow lighter as I feel
That Jesus knows them all

Yes, all! The morning, and the light,
The joy, the grief, the loss;
The roughened path, the sunbeam bright,
The hourly thorn and cross.
Thou knowest all—I lean my head,
My weary eyelids close;
Content and glad awhile to tread
This path, since Jesus knows.

And He has loved me! All my heart
With answering love is stirred,
And every anguished pain and smart
Find healing in the word,
For here I lay me down to rest,
As nightly shadows fall,
And lean, confiding, on His breast,
Who knows and pities all.

—Selected.

The Warning.

A clear-headed farmer in a rural church gave a unique definition of conscience not long ago.

"I've often noticed," he said, "when driving my mowing-machine, that when there's something gone wrong with it there's pretty sure to be a warning. If the gear is getting dry or out of place, and doesn't run right, it gives a hard, squeaky crunch that lets me know there's trouble coming, and if I'm wise I stop and investigate.

"Now it seems to me conscience is a good deal like that. It's the crunch my spiritual nature gives to warn me, when there's a wrong in front of it. It isn't a pleasant thing to hear, perhaps, but it's very valuable as a reminder of danger ahead."

Let us heed the warning as soon as we hear it, and so prevent danger and damage.—Exchange.

A beautiful story is told of Francis Xavier. He was engaged in his missionary work, and hundreds kept coming until he was literally worn out. "I must have sleep," he said to his servant, "or I shall die. No matter who comes, do not disturb me; I must sleep." Hastening to his tent, he left his faithful attendant to watch. In a little while, however, the servant saw Xavier's white face at the tent door. Answering his call, he saw on his countenance a look of awe, as if he had seen a vision. "I made a mistake," said the missionary. "I made a mistake. If a little child comes, waken me."—J. R. Miller.

We have each of us work to do in the world; but if the inner life is real, it must be done in a spirit and temper which belong to eternity; and the fear and love of "Him Who is invisible" are to be carried unflinchingly into the little matters of every day.—Canon Knox-Little.

For the Young Folks

The Rose and the Clay.

A Persian fable says: One day
A wanderer found a lump of clay
So redolent of sweet perfume,
Its fragrance scented all the room.
"What are thou?" was his quick demand,
"Art thou some gem from Samarcand,
Or spikenard in this rude disguise,
Or other costly merchandise?"
"Nay, I am but a lump of clay."
"Then whence this wondrous perfume, say!"
"Friend, if the secret I disclose—
I have been dwelling with the rose."
—Selected.

A Little Peacemaker.

Once upon a time there was a pretty little cottage out in the country. There were lovely vines growing over the porch and bright flowers blooming in the garden. In the little cottage lived a sweet woman and her husband and they wanted just one thing to make them perfectly happy. Can you guess what that was? Yes, they longed for a child.

At last God sent them a little baby girl, and it seemed as if the sun had never shone so brightly nor the birds sung so sweetly as on that happy day. The papa and mamma decided to call their little daughter Gladys, to show how glad she had made them by coming from heaven to stay in their home. It was such a delight to them to watch her cunning baby ways. She laughed and crowed and was just the happiest little child one could find. As she grew older, it seemed to her mamma and papa that she became sweeter and dearer every day. She loved the flowers and used to help her mamma care for them by bringing water for the thirsty ones, and picking off the withered leaves and blossoms. Such pretty plays as she had with them! The petunias made such nice dollies; she would put one over another, so they seemed to have different bright colored petticoats and the stem, turned upside down, made the head. Then she made long chains of dandelions or daisies, and wreaths of leaves.

She liked to sew the leaves also, and make pretty pictures. She would put one down on a card, draw carefully around its edge, then prick this line and sew it with bright green worsted. Afterwards she would color the inside with a green pencil or with green crayons.

When the seeds of the lady's slippers were ripe she loved to pop them, for they sounded just like torpedoes. Her mamma told her that these flowers were called "touch-me-nots" when she was a little girl, because they popped when touched.

When Gladys was tired of play mamma would tell her stories, and oh, how she loved to hear them! On Sunday they would be from the Bible, and after she had heard them she would often learn a little verse to say to papa.

One day mamma gave her this verse to learn: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

"Who are peacemakers, mamma?" asked Gladys. "They are those who make peace, dear," said mamma, "and peace means quiet and happiness. If a little child should see two others quarreling and should try to stop them and get them to be kind to each other, she would be a peacemaker. But a peacemaker isn't only one who stops quarrels; I think it means, also, one who tries to make every one feel comfortable and happy."

As Gladys learned the little verse she kept thinking, "I'd like to be a little peacemaker."

The next week some of her mother's friends came to make a visit and they brought their two little girls with them. Gladys was glad to have some playmates, and the three children had happy times together.

One day Gladys had gone on an errand for mother, and when she returned she heard screams from the play-room. She ran to the door and there she saw Katie and Dora holding on to a dolly and each trying to pull it away from the other.

"It's mine," said Katie. "Uncle Fred gave it to me."

"He did not," said Dora, "he gave it to me and you shan't have it!"

Just then Katie gave a big jerk, the poor dolly's arm came off and over fell both little girls on the floor.

Gladys ran in and said, "Oh, what is the matter?"

The little girls sobbed out that their Uncle Fred had given them both dollies and each was sure this was hers.

Gladys said: "Why, let's hunt for the other one; it must be near, as I am sure I saw two this morning."

They began to look, and soon the missing doll was found under the bed. Then Gladys got a needle, and as she was older than her little friends and had learned to sew quite nicely, she sewed the dolly's arm on very firmly. The little girls were soon happy again with their two dollies.

The Magic Word.

The manager of a certain department in a big store said to one of his aisle managers: "I like the way you keep things running smoothly in your section, Parker. It sets a good standard for those who might not be so particular if your good results didn't keep them keyed up to their own best efforts."

Warmed with these words, the man went about his work with new zest. It wasn't long before he was saying to an alert little salesgirl: "You have a very successful way of handling hard customers, Miss Belle. I'm going to see what can be done for you by way of rewarding such real merit."

Miss Belle flushed with pleasure. She was so happy that she was more successful than ever with the next troublesome, cranky buyer; and when she went out to lunch she just couldn't help saving to the deft girl who served her order: "It's awfully good of you to be so prompt. You must have guessed that I want to take a walk this nice noon hour."

The deft waitress carried the cheer of the friendly words in her heart all the rest of the day. It spoke out when her younger brother settled down to his studies that evening: "It's not every girl who has a brother who stays in at nights and studies and gets ready to make something of himself, instead of running the streets and getting into bad company. I'm proud of you, Jimmy-boy. You're my heart's comfort." And Jimmy dug into his work all the harder and put away for good a certain "What's the use, after all," feeling that had been trying to get foothold in his heart of late.

The next day Jimmy said to the teacher, who had patiently explained a hard point: "You certainly know how to make it clear to a fellow. I wish I knew as much as you do." And a little nagging imp of discouragement fled from the tired teacher's heart at once.

On her way home the teacher paused to say to a small boy who sold her a paper: "It's nice to know I can depend on finding you here every afternoon, Billy. You'll make a good business man some day." And she smiled as she paid him.

Billy went home in such a glow of good feeling that he fairly shouted at sight and smell of the homely, substantial dish of hash for supper. "Say, mother, but you're the dandy cook. A fellow can put in his best licks with a supper and a mother like this at home waiting for him." And the word—the magic word of praise—there vanished endless baskets of clothes to be washed and office floors to be scrubbed; and the world was a good place to live in, after all, when one had a fine boy like Billy coming home at nights with his bit of money and his blarney.

Nor did she dream—nor do we dream often—how that magic word had been traveling from heart to heart, touching each with the joy of sincere appreciation, inspiring each to better work and living, before it passed on to repeat its good work.—East and West.

Pearls and Smiles.

There was a scowl on May's face, a scowl so deep you had to look twice to see that her eyes were blue and her face really pretty. "I don't want to wear this woolen dress," she complained; "it's too scratchy. And these old stockings scratch, too."

Aunt Lila looked up from her sewing and smiled.

"I guess if you were an oyster we'd have plenty of pearls to wear in our rings and pins, wouldn't we?" she asked.

May looked at her aunt in surprise. "What do you mean?" she questioned, climbing into the sewing-chair and cuddling close to her aunt. "Are you going to tell me a story? And is it about oysters?"

"Yes, it is about oysters," answered Aunt Lila, "and the oyster is like a little girl I know; he doesn't like anything to scratch his tender skin, and that is why we have pearls."

May's eyes were growing wider all the whole.

"It's this way," Aunt Lila went on. "Inside the oyster's outer shell he has a very tender skin that doesn't like to be scratched or irritated any more than your skin likes it. But sometimes a tiny grain of sand works its way inside the oyster, and this tiny grain scratches and makes the oyster feel as uncomfortable as your woolen makes you feel. But the oyster doesn't scowl or fret. He goes to work forming a liquid which surrounds the grain of sand so it can't scratch any more. By and by this liquid hardens, and after a few years, sometimes many years, a perfect pearl is formed. And so we have pearls because the oyster doesn't like to have his tender skin scratched or irritated."

"But, Aunt Lila," interrupted May, "I can't make pearls just because my woolens scratch. What can I do?"

"That's just it," answered Aunt Lila.

"Of course you can't make pearls, but you can smile, can't you? Just smile at the scratchy woolens—smile so hard that you forget they scratch. Smiles, you know, are precious, as precious as pearls."

May clapped her hands for joy, and the scowl was all gone.

"Anyhow, I'm going to try," she answered. "If the oyster can forget his scratches by making pearls, then I'll forget mine by making smiles."—Child's Gem.

Grandma's Story.

"Oh, dear," sighed little Elsie, as she leaned against the window, "Uncle Fred thinks cows are the only things amusing on the place. I just hate the old things. I don't believe there ever was a cow who did anything really wonderful."

It had suddenly started to rain just as Elsie was ready to go down to the big meadow for hay with grandpa. She saw Uncle Fred bringing the cows home and she vented her angry thoughts on him.

Grandma, who was in the kitchen, heard her and said, "I wonder what little girl would like to hear a story about a cow who one time saved my life."

Elsie immediately forgot the rain. Running to grandma and climbing up into her lap, she begged for the story. And this is what grandma told her:

"When I was a little girl, about ten years old, we lived on a farm close beside the shore. A river ran by the place, and when the tide was in the water was very deep. When the tide was out one could easily walk across. Our cows were pastured on the other side of this river, and the only way to get to them at high water was by going a mile up stream, where the tide didn't reach.

"One fine afternoon, when all our men folk were busy in the hayfield, mother said to me, 'Susan, do you think you can bring the cows home to-day? If you go now you can easily get back again before the tide.' Of course, I was delighted with the idea of going alone after the cows, so calling Rover, I started.

"I reached the pasture all right, but the cows didn't want to come home so early, and it took me quite awhile to get them together and started on the way home. When we reached the river the tide was coming. But I thought the water would not be very deep and we would soon be across, so I started in after the cows. When we got half way over, the cows had to swim. I lost my footing and fell. Fortunately, I fell near old Brindle. Reaching up, I caught hold of her tail. She swam ashore with me. I was terribly frightened, but soon got over that. The water was warm, so I did not take cold. After that you may be sure old Brindle got the nicest turnips and carrots that I could carry to her. We kept her for a long time."

Elsie, who had been listening very earnestly, discovered that the rain was over and the sun was shining. Kissing grandma and thanking her for the story, she ran out of doors to tell Uncle Fred that she had changed her opinion of cows.—Lillian York, in Canadian Churchman.

To Save a Life in China.

Every day, after each meal, little Audrey Warner, six years old, of Grand Rapids, Minn., puts a penny in a rice cup for an unknown, unseen baby six thousand miles away in some famine village of North China.

Those pennies are saving the life of the far-off baby, and with her rice cup and her daily savings Audrey has started, among the children of the United States, the movement to "pick a pal in China," which the American Committee for China Famine Fund looks upon as a valuable aid in its effort to relieve the suffering of "the last 5,000,000" famine victims who are now entirely dependent on help from this country.

Audrey has not only "adopted" the little girl in China as her sister, but has given her a name—"Junie." Very soon after the pennies began to go into the rice cup Audrey feared that "Junie" might starve before they grew into a whole dollar and went to swell the famine fund; so she borrowed a dollar and sent it to Vernon Munroe, Treasurer of the American Committee, Bible House, New York City, along with a most interesting letter. Since then she has been paying back what she borrowed at the rate of three pennies a day.

The story of her sacrifice got abroad, with the result that thousands of small children are now following Audrey's example, and thousands of lives of little unfortunates in China are being saved by the pennies that go into the rice cups all over the country.

Envy.

I have a yellow jumping-jack
And Billy has his brother;
My jumping-jack he kicks one leg
Before he kicks the other.

But Billy's yellow jumping-jack
I think is better fun,
Because he kicks the other leg
Before he kicks the one!
—Arthur Guitarman, in St. Nicholas.

The House With the Golden Windows.

There was once a farmer who, having had a prosperous season, promised his son that at the end of the season he could have a holiday, or go wherever he wanted to. When the time came the boy said he wanted to go to the house with the golden windows, which stood on a hill not far from his own home.

His father granted the wish, and the boy set out on his journey. He went down the hill to the valley, crossed the river by a bridge, and climbed up the other hill till he came to the house. In answer to his knock the lady of the house asked him what he wanted.

"Please," said he, "I've come to see the house with the golden windows."

"Come in—come in," replied the lady, "and glad I am to see you."

He was taken into a room, and presently a little girl came in.

When her mother told her what the boy wanted, she said, "I am so glad he has come to be my companion."

She showed him the cows, horses, geese, pigs, etc., but at the end of it all what the boy asked to see was the golden windows.

"Oh, there is the house with the golden windows," said the lady, pointing to his own house, where the golden rays of the setting sun shone upon the windows.

The boy then started off homeward, down the hill, down the hill, across the valley, and up the hill, up the hill, till he reached home.

"Well, my son, what have you learned?" said the father.

"Father," replied the boy, "I have learned the greatest lesson of my life—that the house with the golden windows is home."—Selected.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

School Desks
Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS
FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG
S. T. Beveridge & Co.
Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

XANTHINE!
Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM
R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

NICK BULL'S MARKET,
Richmond's Leading Dealer in
FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME
112 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.
Phone Randolph 1680
WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS.

Mrs. J. P. Wickham, Lorraine, Va....$5.00
Annie Withers, Greensboro, Ala.... 5.50
Eliza H. Miller, Sandy Springs, Md.. 3.00
Mrs. B..... 5.00
St. James' Church, Alexandria, La... 9.08

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms $18 and up. Leaflet.

SLIGHTLY USED SASH WITH 8x10 glass, six lights to sash, twelve lights to pair, plain rail at $1 per pair. Slightly used panel doors, $1. New window frames at $1 each. F. O. B. Hopewell, Va. Cash with order, please. Harrison Construction Co., Petersburg, Va.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse abd veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth Street N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—A REFINED AND CAPABLE Churchwoman with small capital to join a lady in an established "apartment house business" in Miami, Fla. Highest references given and required. Address "M. C.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A WORKING HOUSEKEEPER in a family of three adults. Must be a good, plain cook, quiet and pleasant. References. Good home and good wages. Address Mrs. J. J., 1626 Twenty-ninth Street, Washington, D. C.

WANTED—A HOUSEKEEPER FOR A Church Institution. Address "T. O." care of Southern Churchman.

SITUATION WANTED.

ORGANIST.

ENERGETIC ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, married, churchman, cathedral training; great experience leading large choirs, recitalist, wishes permanent position with good field for teaching. Address "Progressive," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

CHURCHWOMAN DESIRES POSITION AS companion to aged couple, country preferred. Address "G.," care of Southern Churchman.

CHURCHWOMAN DESIRES POSITION AS companion, mother's helper or housekeeper for the summer; country or seashore preferred. Address "C.," care of Southern Churchman.

CLERGYMAN DESIRES PARISH IN town or country; is a Southerner; earnworkers; small family; good visitor. Address "K. J.," care Southern Churchman.

COMPANION—WIDOW OF ARMY OFFICER, and daughter of Episcopal clergyman, desires position as companion to lady, or to teach small children in their home. Address Mrs. Wood, 1319 Laurel Street, Columbia, S. C.

WANTED—BY A CLERGYMAN, A SMALL parish. Correspondence solicited. Address "Presbyter," care of Southern Churchman.

LADY OF REFINEMENT AND EDUCATION desires a position as matron or housekeeper in some school, or would accept place in refined home. Address "Z." "Times Register," Salem, Va.

WANTED—A TRAINED NURSE WISHES a position to care for an invalid through the summer, either in the country or to travel. Address "Miss R. N," 519 Penn. Ave., Norfolk, Va

REFINED CAPABLE TEACHER WISHES position for summer. Preferably out of town. Address "S." care of Southern Churchman.

A REFINED LADY WISHES A POSITION a matron in a college, or school; to enter fall session. Address "G," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—POSITION AS MOTHER'S helper, or assistant in home. Address "E. A. P.," care of Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Moody: Died at his home, "Maymount," Fayetteville, N. C., on May 26, 1921, the REV. JOHN STIRLING MOODY, A. M., Priest of the diocese of East Carolina, in his 70th year.

A close student, clear teacher, forceful preacher, kind friend.

Jones: Entered into life eternal, April 27, 1921, at his home, V. M. I., Lexington, Va., COL. THOMAS ARCHER JONES, son of Mrs. C. J. Jones, Norfolk, Va.

"The strife is o'er, the battle done,
The victory of life is won,
The song of triumph has begun,
Alleluia!

HABERSHAM.

Died, April 15th, in Sao Paulo, Brazil, ROBERT, son of the late Rev. Bernard Elliott Habersham, of Georgia, aged 82 years, 7 months. An invalid, he with his loving wife was detained there throughout the world war by her affectionate and hospitable relatives. The Episcopal funeral service was read by the Presbyterian missionary of that field,—a field which has long elicited the warm friendship of Episcopalians of the South.

ERNLE GEORGE MONEY.

At a meetng of the Vestry of Grace Church, Walker's Parish, Albemarle County, Virginia, held May 22, 1921, we were appointed a committee to express the Vestry's sympathy for his family, and also our great loss, in one of our most valued members whom it has pleased an all wise Providence to take from us in the person of ERNLE GEORGE MONEY; a most pleasant, genial and wise counsellor; a man of untiring interest and aid in the welfare of his Church and community; and one widely known, loved and valued by a host of friends extending many, many miles from his home.

Be it resolved therefore, that a copy of this expression of love and appreciation be spread upon our records; that a copy be sent to his bereaved family; and to "The Southern Churchman" for publication.

H. E. MAGRUDER,
A. L. EVERETT,
F. L. ROBINSON.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.
INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

BUSINESS MANAGER WANTED

A competent and experienced business man of thorough reliability wanted as Business Manager for the Industrial School and Farm for Homeless Boys, near Covington, Va. Salary, $1,500, home and expenses.

Also combination Bookkeeper and Stenographer.

Apply to George Floyd Rogers, Lynchburg, Va.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

man was for almost fifty years a vestryman of the parish and grandson of Isaac Vanneman, who in 1784 was the master mason who built the church, and he was a grandson of Eli Vanneman, who lies buried in the old church yard, with a headstone dated 1721. A new eagle lectern, all of cast brass, a memorial to Revilla H. Ponsett, wife of William R. Poinsett, and an altar rail of white enameled spindles with mahogany top, given in memory of George Z. and Anna F. Mitchell, completes the list. The old church is of colonial design, and extreme care was used to have the new memorials harmonize with the general scheme of architecture, and the work has been well carried out, so that in all there is no clash of the old with the new. The church, which is an old colonial landmark, was built in 1784 and took the place of an earlier building erected by the Swedes in 1703, and is visited yearly by hundreds who come to admire the beauty so carefully preserved.

The Rev. Edgar Campbell has for nine years been rector of the parish.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The annual rally of the Sunday schools of York and Lancaster Counties took place this year in St. John's Church, Lancaster. More than eight hundred scholars participated. Their united offering amounted to $1,624.21. St. John's, York, led with the largest total—$704.40—a per capita rate of $2.33. Next came St. James', Lancaster, with a total of $355.28, a per capita of $1.78. The highest per capita, but third in total, was St. John's, Lancaster, with a per capita of $2.60, and to this school was awarded the banner, which had been held by St. John's, York, for the past two years. In the schools with less than one hundred pupils All Saints', Paradise, was chief with a total of $23.92. The rector of St. John's, York, the Rev. Paul S. Atkins, was the principal speaker.

L. F. B.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

ERIE.

Rev. Jno. C. Ward, Bishop-Elect.

The Women's Auxiliary of the Diocese convened in St. John's Church, Franklin, for its annual meeting on Tuesday, May 10, with a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10 o'clock, at which the rector was the celebrant. The offering was devoted to General Missions. The Auxiliary was called to order immediately after the service in the Parish House, Mrs. John E. Reilly presiding, and Mrs. Byles acting as Secretary. Most interesting reports were made by the Diocesan officers, and an illuminating address by Miss Grace Lindley, of New York, representing the Presiding Bishop and Council. The election of officers resulted as follows: Mrs. Mary Prentice Miller, President; Mrs. Martin Aigner, Vice-President; Mrs. J. D. Bolton, Secretary, and Miss Miles, Treasurer.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Sunday Schools Make Large Mite Box Offering.

The annual rally of the Sunday schools of the Diocese for the presentation of the Lenten Mite Box Offerings took place on the afternoon of Whitsunday, at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, and was the largest and most successful gathering of the sort in the history of the Diocese. The spacious church was filled to overflowing with representatives from Church schools from all parts of the Diocese. The Auxiliary choirs of various parishes furnished the music. The schools gathered in the parish house and marched into the church with their banners, making an imposing appearance. The service was under the direction of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education. The address to the children was made by the Rev. Fred Ingley, Bishop Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Colorado, who was raised in Pittsburgh, and admitted deacon and priest in this Diocese. The testimonials and prizes were awarded to the several schools by the Bishop of the Diocese. The offerings were received by the Rev. R. N. Meade, chairman of the Board of Religious Education, and amounted to almost ten thousand dollars, an increase of almost two thousand dollars over that of 1920, and the largest offering ever given by the Church schools.

The Pittsburgh Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary held one of the most successful meetings in its history on Friday, May 20, at St. Stephen's Church, Sewickley. The occasion marked the semi-annual meeting and the third ingathering of the United Thank Offering of 1922. The service was a celebration of the Holy Communion, with address, by the Bishop of the Diocese, assisted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Dr. Howell. The music was furnished by the St. Cecilia choir of St. Stephen's, with Mr. Jennings as organist. The United Thank Offering amounted to a little over $1,400, and now stands at almost $4,000 for the first half of the triennium. The Rev. E. M. Bonnell, of Greeley, Col., made a stirring and impassioned appeal in behalf of St. John's Missionary College at that place, of which he has charge. In the afternoon addresses were made by the Rev. F. Victor Hoag, of Batavia, Ill., and Miss Templeton, of Oklahoma.

J. C.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Devall Langhorn Gwathmey has been called to become rector of St. John's Church, Wytheville, and has accepted. It is understood that Mr. Gwathmey will assume his new duties as soon as the present session of the Virginia Episcopal School is ended.

The honorary degree of D. C. L. was conferred upon the Rev. Robert W. Norwood, rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church, Overbrook, Philadelphia, May 12, by Kings College, Windsor, Ont.

The Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson has accepted a call to St. John's Church, Marietta, and will be in residence there about June 1.

The Rev. George Locke, who has been for some years rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Detroit, Mich., has been given a three months' vacation by his congregation and has left for the Pacific Coast, where he will recuperate from a severe attack of grip from which he has suffered during the past winter. In his absence his services will be taken by the Rev. John H. Lever, Social Service Superintendent of the Diocese of Michigan.

The Rev. W. Shiers, assistant minister of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, Va., has accepted the call to become rector of Emmanuel Church, Franklin, Va. He will assume charge July 1.

The Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl, dean of the Cathedral of Washington, delivered a lecture May 25 in St. Simeon's Church, Philadelphia, on American and foreign cathedrals. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Cathedral League.

The Rev. P. S. Gilman, rector of St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem, N. C., has accepted a call to St. Ann's Church, Nashville, Tenn., and takes charge July 1.

The Rev. H. H. Covington, D. D., of Old St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, delivered the baccalaureate sermon at Stuart Hall, Staunton, Va., on Sunday, May 29. At the annual Conference of Church Workers to be held in St. Mary's School, Raleigh, N. C., during the week of May 30, Dr. Covington delivered a series of four lectures.

On Wednesday, May 25, the Rt. Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead, S. T. D., instituted the Rev. Louis Norman Tucker into the rectorship of St. James' Memorial Church, Pittsburgh, the sermon being preached by the Rev. E. J. Van Etten, of Calvary Parish.

The Rev. Henry P. Manning, formerly rector of Trinity Church, Danville, Ky., may be addressed at Grace Church, Jefferson City, Mo.

On Thursday, May 26, the Rev. James Albert Midgley was instituted rector of St. Mark's Church, South Side, Pittsburgh, by Bishop Whitehead. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Budlong, of the Church of the Ascension.

The Rev. Stewart McQueen, rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Montgomery, Ala., has returned to his parish after a brief vacation trip and visit to New York.

The Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, of the Church of the Epiphany, Washing-ten, spent Sunday, May 29, in Boston, where he addressed the American Legion in Fenway Park, under the auspices of the Federation of Boston Churches.

Ordinations.

In the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, on Trinity Sunday, Bishop Manning advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. Francis A. Sanborn, Charles W. Manzer and John M. Furman, and ordered deacons the Messrs. Gustav A. Zeltner, Wilbur F. Browne, Jr., and Andrew Van de B. Vos. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters, of the University of the South. Mr. Sanborn began as a lay reader in Atonement Mission, Bronx, and is now priest in charge of Good Shepherd Mission, Bronx. The Rev. Mr. Vos was formerly a Reformed Church minister, and as working layman has long been in charge of Emmanuel Mission, Bronx. All three missions were founded by volunteer laymen, under Archdeacon Nelson.

Following the ordinations, Bishop, priests and deacons went to Blackwell's Island, where thirty-five crippled inmates were confirmed, and where visits were paid by the company to the wards containing some 3,000 unfortunates. The work is in charge of the City Mission Society, in all of whose institution chapels attendance last year exceeded 84,000.

Ordizations.

Bishop Rhinelander officiated Trinity Sunday at the ordination service in the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary, Philadelphia. The Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., rector of St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane, preached the ordination sermon.

Archie W. Hensel, John Kuhms and John R. McGrory were ordained to the diaconate, and the Rev. Joseph McC. Brownlee, the Rev. Stanley V. Wilcox and the Rev. Edward E. Durant were ordained to the priesthood.

In St. Angustine's Church, Fort Smith, Ark., on April 25, John Herbert Jones was ordered to the diaconate by Bishop Demby. He was presented by Rev. M. W. Lockhart, the Litany was read by the Rev. J. W. Thompson, and the sermon preached by the Bishop. Mr. Jones will be vicar of St. Augustine's Mission, which he has served as catechist for the past sixteen months.

In the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, on May 18, the Rev. Frank W. Moore was advanced to the priesthood and Messrs. Henry C. Thomas and F. C. Miller were ordered deacons.

Deaths.

The Rev. Dan Russ Judd, since 1893 rector of St. Andrew's Church, Thompsonville, and St. Mary's Church, Hazardville, Conn., died at his home in Thompsonville on May 8. The funeral services were held in St. Andrew's Church, Thompsonville, on Tuesday afternoon, May 10.

The Rev. J. C. Munson, minister in charge of the parishes in Chittenango and Canastota, N. Y., died suddenly on May 16, after sixteen years' service in these places. The funeral was held on Wednesday, the Archdeacon of the Diocese taking charge of the service, and the Rev. Messrs. Theodore Haydn and F. C. Smith and the Rev. Dr. Karl Schwartz assisting.

Jesus was never in a hurry, never flurried, never worried; and yet He never wasted a minute.

God could not properly be worshipped except He were holy. Worship mere power, and it demoralizes and demonizes. Worship intellect, and it degrades the moral nature. Worship can only be offered to absolute and sovereign purity of character; and that must be God's character, or else let every harp on high be silent and every heart on earth be dumb. God's holiness shines upon us through His law in our own reason and conscience and in the person of Christ. But then, with this holiness is united tenderness; and it is that which it seems harder still to recognize, for we associate with absolute justice, absolute sovereignty, rather than absolute tenderness: and yet there is in His Word the declaration of His tenderness. There is a reflection of that tenderness in our own hearts. Whence did these tender loves within us spring? It is idle to say they are transmitted. From whence did they come to our parents? We see them illustrated most perfectly in Christ, Whose mission it was to reveal the Father that we might not be afraid of His holiness.—R. S. Storrs.

"I thank my God upon every remembrance of you, always in every prayer of mine making request." Every time the apostle remembered them, he prayed for them. His remembrance was turned into supplication. And he has made it abundantly plain to us how the transformation was effected. The apostle never saw anybody alone. He always saw them in relationship to Christ, and all perilous bitterness was checked. If he thought of any one who had ministered unto him, he saw them in relationship to Christ, and his thanksgiving was heightened into praise. Everything was done for Christ's sake, and therefore everything was seen in association with Christ. Therefore did remembrance become thanksgiving, and thought was changed into intercession.—J. H. Jowett.

Jesus Christ never made anything of His miracles. Other people were surprised at them; He was never amazed. Beholders exclaimed, What a wonder of wonders! Jesus went out that He might pray. To pray is the greatest wonder of all; to touch heaven by right of love and faith is the supreme token of filial fellowship with God. As to quieting storms, and soothing seas, and raising dead bones, these are infantalities, trifles, things hardly to be accounted of at all; but to hold God by the violence of prayer is the great end and aim of spiritual education, to be consummated in the other world by an exchange of prayer for the delight and the satisfaction of praise.—Joseph Parker.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms 18 and up. Leaflet.

Highlands, North Carolina

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Session Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

CHURCH PEWS

PULPIT FURNITURE

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAIRS, BLACKBOARDS, ETC.

Virginia School Supply Company

2010-12 West Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. | Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. | General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

Unwise Handling of Money

There are still some people who either thoughtlessly or deliberately keep their money in secret places of their own, trying to protect it themselves instead of keeping it where money belongs, namely, in a strong bank.

The National State and City Bank—for over half a century a progressive Bank of the South—invites your accounts, small or large.

National State and City Bank

1111 E. Main Street, - - Richmond, Va.

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

Girls! Girls!! Save Your Hair With Cuticura

Soap and Ointment to clear Dandruff and itching, 25c. each. Samples free of Cuticura, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

O. Luetke's Art Works

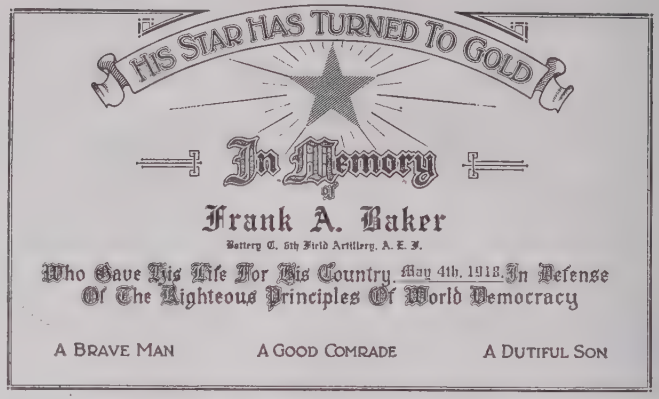
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.



Stevens Anti-Ameb'c Dentifrice
For Prevention and Treatment of
PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE
Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac
Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid
Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.
17 Kent Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y

Central National Bank
Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.
3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Leake Printing Co.
ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va

Johnson's Foot Soap
(On market for over fifty years)
Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning
FEET
that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.
Thomas Gill Soap Co.
711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

(Actual size, 7½x11½ inches.)

A BEAUTIFUL PHOTO ENGRAVING IN BLACK, WHITE AND GOLD. Furnished with name of soldier, Company and Date in place of the one shown. Ready for Framing. Sent postpaid for $1.50; delivery in one week.

LEAKE PRINTING CO.,
412 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 11, 1921. No. 24.

God's Spirit falls on me
as dewdrops on a rose,
If I but like a rose
my heart to Him unclose

In all eternity
no tone can be as sweet
As where man's heart with God's in unison doth beat.

Whate'er thou lovest, man, like that become thou must
God, if thou lovest God, dust, if thou lovest dust.

Immeasurable is the Highest;
who but knows it?
And yet a human heart can perfectly enclose it.

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.
A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.
Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address
REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

Rockford College

A Standard College
For Modern Women

A college of distinguished graduates, seventy years of fine traditions and high standards of scholarship. A. B., B. S., A. M. degrees.

Reservations Limited
Send for Catalog

Wm. A. Maddox, Ph. D., Pres.
Box 478, Rockford, Illinois

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"No man can become a saint in his sleep."

The only greatness is unselfish love.

"The immortal soul must give itself to something that is immortal."

Our Lord has promised that if we make His interests our sole concern, He will look after our interests, great and small.—I. D. Lyttle.

It is not hard to give up our rights. They are often external. The difficult thing is to give up ourselves.—Drummond.

Talent develops itself in solitude; character in the stream of life.—Goethe.

I step, I mount where He has led;
Men count my halting o'er;
I know them; yet, though self I dread,
I love His precepts more
—Newman.

"Coming nearer and nearer to Christ," we say; that does not mean creeping into a refuge where we can be safe. It means becoming better and better men; repeating His character more and more in ours. The only true danger is sin, and so the only true safety is holiness.—Phillips Brooks.

Evil came on earth when first man said, "That is not the best I can do, but it will answer."

Let us not despair when we are troubled by the prospect of death; for Christ was troubled by it.—Bishop Wordsworth.

Anxiety is the enemy of peace. Fret is the opposite of faith. Therefore trust in God! If Christ be yours, all things are yours.—D. J. Burrell.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls
1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va

EDUCATIONAL

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5001 Woodland Avenue.

He that can have patience can have what he will.—Benjamin Franklin.

There is a saying, "He begins the fight who strikes the second blow." That is true of the tongue as well as of the hand.—J. H. Wilson.

It is the gracious purpose of our Lord that our religious life should be a certain and continuous possession. He wants it to be a ceaseless "abiding," and not a few detached and uncertain seasons.—J. H. Jowett.

Humility is the thing which is forever renewing the earth and the stars. To the humble man, and to the humble man alone, the sun is really a sun; to the humble man, and to the humble man alone, the sea is really a sea.—Chesterton.

The truth in God's breast
Lies trace upon trace on ours impressed:
Though He is so bright, and we so dim,
We are made in His image to witness Him.

—Browning.

When a Christian is derelict, that dereliction is not a fruit of his Christianity, but of his want of it. The defection of Christians cannot legitimately condemn the Church and Christianity because Christianity and the Church first condemned the defection.—Trumbull.

Sir James Simpson was once asked, near the close of his life, what was his greatest discovery. Every one supposed that the famous Edinburgh professor would say that it was the application of chloroform which had made him world-renowned. He replied, "My greatest discovery was when I found that Jesus Christ was my personal friend."—Selected.

Jesus touched the hand of the child, and addressed her in words that have been handed down without change—"Talitha Cumi": "Damsel, arise." Our English translation of the Aramaic phrase conveys but little of the depth of tenderness of the original. If it were rendered "My little pet lamb, awake," it would come much nearer the meaning of the original. And its beauty is greatly enhanced when we know that it was the common term of endearment with which loving Syrian mothers awoke their children from an unusually prolonged sleep. It was therefore a household word—a term belonging to the nursery—to the innermost circle of home. By this endearing appellation the Good Shepherd aroused the sleeping soul.—St. Stephen's Chronicle.

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH Presidnet

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms 18 and up. Leaflet.

Highlands, North Carolina

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Season Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Work

(Established 55 years)
254-258 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 11, 1921. No. 24.

WRITE TO PRESIDENT HARDING TODAY

Last Sunday, from thousands of pulpits in the land there was sounded the appeal that Christian people should throw their influence toward the calling by the President of the United States of the proposed conference on naval disarmament between the United States and Great Britain and Japan. Undoubtedly great multitudes of Christian people were moved by the feeling that something ought to be done. And equally without doubt there is danger that most of them will go away without doing anything.

No matter how eloquent sermons on this subject may have seemed, they are useless unless they lead to results. No matter how much interested people may have felt in the idea of this conference as a step toward conciliation and rationality, their vague good intentions will be perfectly futile unless they result in immediate and practical expression.

This editorial is meant as a direct challenge to every person, man or woman, who may read it. Are you interested in the disarmament conference? Do you want it to be held? Then do the one simple thing which can help to make your wish effective.

Sit down—not tomorrow, or at some dim "more convenient season," but today—and write to the President of the United States. Direct your letter simply to the President, White House, Washington, D. C. You do not need to write any elaborate letter. Simply say, "I want to add my name to the names of those who are deeply desirous that the proposed conference on naval disarmament shall be called at the earliest possible moment, and entered into by the United States with the full purpose to make the conference lead to practical results."

The President will not ponder the particular manner of expression of every letter he receives. He may not even see a great many of them. But if his secretary tells him that 100,000 or 500,000 or 1,000,000 letters have poured into the White House offices this week on the subject of the disarmament conference, the President will sit up and take notice. He will have to. If we Christian individuals want the disarmament conference called, we can get it.

EDUCATION UNDER CHRISTIAN AUSPICES

A significant feature of the Church's life of today is found in the stress that is being laid upon the religious education of our children. Far too much has heretofore been taken for granted in this connection, and changes have gradually taken place which have but slowly forced themselves upon the serious attention of the Church. Time was when it was assumed that the children of Church families would receive in their homes at least the rudiments of Christian instruction. The Sunday school was primarily intended for the children of the poor—of ignorant and irreligious folk. It was merely patronized by the more cultivated and used to supplement the normal teachings of the household. Further, it was understood that, normally, any person offering as a school teacher, whether of a public or a private school, would be qualified and would consider it an essential part of his or her duty to instruct the children not only in moral deportment, but to a considerable extent also in the fundamentals of religion. This was a tradition inherited from our English forebears. It came down almost unimpaired through colonial days and persisted until the modern public school system was far toward its present stage of development. The same presumption held good as regarded the academy, the college, and even the university. These institutions were for the favored few, being far out of reach of the multitudes, and it was again assumed that those who could attend them would find an atmosphere certainly not unfavorable to the growth of whatever religious impulses they had received.

It is needless to point out how time has brought changes or by what means these have come about. There are still many Christian homes, thank God, where the best of religious training is given at the parent's knee, but they are growing more and more exceptional and old-fashioned. There are still teachers with such a high estimate of their calling and of the value and capacities of the souls given them to educate that they will seek to implant or cultivate some elements of religious truth in their pupils, but their own training for what has become a highly technical profession has not fitted them for this, nor is it demanded or usually expected by those who employ them for a well-defined secular duty. Education used to be the acknowledged handmaid of religion, but has long since set up her independent establishment. But religion can hardly keep house without her aid.

So the Church is realizing the need of schools conducted under her own supervision, where at their most impressionable age her boys and girls may receive the best educational advantages under influences wisely ordered for the development of Christian character. Her seed corn must be carefully cultivated. To these young people she must look for leadership and ministries of service in the future, and it is unfair to them and the hazard is too great to leave them so early without moral safeguard or spiritual counsel. It is hers to provide for this as far as possible, and not to leave issues of such paramount importance to the unguided determination of strangers or to the venture of a happy chance.

Already we have many excellent Church schools, and others not distinctively such, but under the mastership of conscientious Christian men and women, where religious teaching is not wholly neglected and where Christian influences and the Church's ministrations are thrown around their pupils. Offering educational advantages equal to the best of their class, they offer also that training and guardianship, hardly to be defined but so quickly felt, which make for simplicity of life, purity and stability of character, worthiness of ambition and singleness of aim. The value of these schools cannot be estimated. They need to be greatly multiplied, for the enrichment of human life and the salvation of society.

Meanwhile, parents seeking the best for their children will find it in choosing their schools from among these. The advertising columns of the Southern Churchman alone during the summer months will offer a wide diversity of choice. We would plead for our boys and girls that they be given the privilege of schools where the influence and ministrations of the Church shall meet them and the refinements of a distinct and wholesome Christian atmosphere shall surround them. A wise decision here is of the utmost importance and can hardly be reached without sound advice and serious consideration of factors which are sometimes sadly disregarded.

THE TRAGEDY IN THE NEAR EAST

America's Unfinished Task

In all its different stages of development, the Near East Relief has aimed at one object only, namely, to save from death the hundreds of thousands of refugees—men, women and children—in the Near East. The response on the part of philanthropic America, and even of the entire world, to this call for help for a stricken people, has been prompt and generous.

For five years this work of life saving has continued and one million human beings at least are living today who otherwise would have perished. In this benevolent work some sixty million dollars have been used by the Near East Relief in the form of money, clothing, supplies, shelter, food, medicines, medical care and supervision.

For obvious reasons we have refrained from utterance and effort that could possibly be called political. Our officers and agents have dealt amicably with the existing governments under which their wards, for the time being, lived—whether English, French, Arab, Turk, Nationalists, Georgian, Russian, Koord, Greek or Soviet. We have assumed that we had but one aim and purpose, and that to save life, which is our sole aim today. Our representatives have been everywhere recognized as neutral in all local affairs and so have been acceptable to all parties. They have frequently been the medium of negotiation between contending forces for cessation of hostilities and the agents for consummating peace.

This relief was begun five years ago in response to urgent appeals from the American Ambassador at Constantinople in the hope and belief that it would terminate within a year or, at the latest, as soon as the European war should cease. Contrary to expectations, national conditions in the Near East remained so threatening that it has been impossible to return the hundreds of thousands of exiled refugees to their homes where they could become self-supporting or to gather the vast number of dependent orphans into anything but temporary orphanages. On the contrary, renewed atrocities have created additional hordes of refugees and added to the number of dependent children faster than their needs can be met.

This statement covers the entire present area of our relief operations, in the country reaching from the Dardanelles to the Caspian Sea, and south across Asia Minor, Syria and Mesopotamia eastward into Persia. Political conditions at the present time in most sections are chaotic, and in many parts new disasters threaten. Anatolia, Armenia, Kurdistan and Asia Minor are under the government of Mustapha Kemel Pasha, the leader of the Turkish Nationalist party with his capital at Angora. He has not agreed to the Treaty of Sevres. Mustapha had representatives at the Premiers' Conference in London in March, but they did not at that time commit the Nationalists to any policy of protection for the minority populations in his domain.

The French, who with the English have occupied Cilicia for more than two years, are now reported to be withdrawing their military forces and turning the large Armenian populations, assembled there under allied protection, over to the control of the Nationalist Turks. Armenians constitute the large proportion of the population of that area. The French used Armenians as soldiers to help them subject the country. These Armenian troops are now being disarmed before giving back the control to the Turks. The Turks are greatly incensed at the Armenians because of the aid they have given to the French, and are now boasting of the revenge they will take upon the Christian populations in Cilicia when they return to power.

Women and children declare that they would choose death, in whatever form it might come, to such a state of distress, of hopelessness and of perpetual terror, and yet no way of escape opens before them. Among these distracted Christian peoples a state of panic prevails. Their safety seems to lie only in flight. There appears to be no protection for them in territory controlled by the Turkish Nationalists and the French protest their going into French Syria. They cannot emigrate to a foreign country, for the most of them are absolutely destitute, and no country will receive them as refugees. They seem condemned by circumstances beyond their control to certain death.

This fairly represents the conditions throughout Cilicia, while in all the territory controlled by the Nationalists there is no assurance that the life of Christian minorities will be protected and they be allowed to reoccupy the homes and lands from which they have been driven and there become self-supporting.

As conditions now are it would seem that the giving of food and shelter alone will not suffice for future protection. What seems to be impending disaster to the unprotected Christian minorities under the control of the Nationalist Turks, must be averted or the wards of our philanthropy and care may be destroyed under conditions of surpassing cruelty.

If the contributions of past years are not to be wasted and our sacrificial work come to nothing, we must take the next step of appealing to our own and Allied governments to protect these threatened people. America is in a position to secure the protection required if it acts promptly and decisively. To achieve this she must act promptly and take the leadership in this matter. She alone can act with absolute political disinterestedness.

We can insist that England, France and Italy, who have it largely in their power to control the Turkish situation, shall now demand, and enforce the demand, that exiled and menaced peoples be restored to their homes and protected there.

All Europe and the Turk know that the United States neither seeks nor desires territorial acquisitions or control in any part of the Turkish Empire; but they should all be convinced that the people of America cannot and will not remain indifferent when inhumanities of such a character are openly practiced upon a helpless and unprotected people.

Official Washington and members of Congress must be made to realize that the brain and heart of America expect that prompt and effective steps will be taken in the direction here indicated. Washington desires and needs to know the judgment of the people of the country upon this subject. The only way for her to know is by hearing the voice of the country. Responsibility rests permanently on those who have so generously given to the Near East Relief. They constitute at least twenty million of the people of the United States. They must follow their gifts by action and by personal expression of determination that something decisive and effective be done by our government.

This can be done without partisanship since the recent platforms of the two great political parties declared in favor of readiness to render every possible help to the suffering Armenians. There has never been a time when that aid was more imperative than it is today. Delay is perilous.

Charity may bind up wounds and pour in the oil of consolation, but has not the time arrived when the systematic creation of wounds be made to cease? True Christian charity can demand no less than this. In the name of that charity which knows no bounds of race or creed we urge every one who reads these lines to write at once to his Senator and member of Congress, urging that early action be taken at Washington. No political emergency can serve as an excuse for inaction on the part of our own government and the Allied governments. Each one should regard himself as an agent to get others also to write that Washington may know and feel the true heart of America.

We do not assume to dictate to the President and to Congress what shall be their method of attaining the end in view. We are certain that the means are at their command to make it known to the Allied powers that the people of the United States look to them to end the Turkish destruction of Christian peoples under their control, and we are equally sure of the good will and humanity of the high officers of our government; but if they are assured that the public is back of them, their hands will be strengthened. What we ask is that they bring home to the European powers a realizing sense of the fact that the American people are in earnest in their demands that these people shall be saved from utter destruction.

James L. Barton,
Walter George Smith,
Stanley White,

Special Committee Appointed by Executive Committee Near East Relief.

1 Madison Avenue, New York, May 25, 1921.

Editorial Note: It is with the sense of shame which must fill the heart of all Christian America that we publish the above statement and appeal. Only a few months ago this great and victorious nation had it in their power to lay the hand of their protection over these suffering peoples and to undertake the mandate that would secure for them life and liberty. We were urged to do so by the still bleeding nations of Europe, our late Allies, and by our own President. The proposition was met with selfish indifference or open scorn, for already the reaction from the noble idealism which inspired our people during the great war had set in and the motives which had actuated them in the hour of stress were being denied or repudiated.

The very humiliation we must feel in now appealing to the nations of Europe to do the righteous act which we declined to do will be good for our souls. The supreme demands of righteousness and Christian charity must impel us to speak the one word we may for the lives of these sufferers and to avert this threatened horror and disgrace, if not for the sake of our fellow-creatures who are in such desperate straits, then for the sake of that law of Christian civilization which we fought to save, but which is being scorned and openly trampled under foot by the most impudent and despicable of its foes. Whatever can be done should be done quickly and emphatically to arouse the conscience of our people and to compel the action of our government.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION AND THE ADULT

By the Rev. Lester Bradner, Ph. D.

By virtue of prevalent practice religious education in the systematic sense stops with adolescence—that is, in the Episcopal Church. In most of our sister communions the Sunday school has no age limits. Classes of adults are the rule. The grown-ups often outnumber the youngsters. With us adult classes are few and far between, and seldom large. There is a general sense that the adult has completed his education religiously and needs no further amplification of spiritual knowledge.

This at least was true yesterday—but today there are new voices calling.

In the first place, the Church is doing new things in a new way, and many sincerely want to know about them. The field of group study is widening. The Nation-Wide Campaign has introduced a new type of adult education in religious things. It is not education in the old sense, not a study of Bible or Prayer Book, but a consideration of the life of the Church, with its aims and its methods. One does not exactly study. He reads or listens, thinks and joins in a general discussion. The result is not so much knowledge, as interest and intelligent co-operation. It is keeping abreast of the times in the religious sense.

In the second place, there is a fresh interest in the consideration of the mystical and devotional elements in religion. Here again it is hardly a question of elaborate study or research, but an opening up of the living experience of religion on its inner side. There may be, for instance, a presentation of the idea of prayer, accompanied by actual exercises of prayer. Again, the subject of group work is not a document out of the past, but a real present activity.

Thirdly, there is a return to the consideration of the Bible, not so much because of the special character of the Book, but for the sake of discovering anew what its attitude is toward present activities or interests. What did our Lord teach about the future life? What were the social ideals of the prophets? What was the attitude of St. Paul towards missions? There is a very large amount of real ignorance among adults on these points, and a growing desire to get back to the sources and see for oneself what is there to be found. It is really a case of rediscovering the Scriptures from a new angle.

Finally, there is the constant questioning of older ideas caused by the new theories of psychology, or physics, or biology. How are we to interpret the former standards, and the traditional phrases of theology in the light of these new teachings from without? Here again there is a fresh interest in many honest and earnest minds, who want to see the old faith carried over into the new terms, and secure among the new theories.

From all these points of view, and perhaps from others as well, there is a genuine desire on the part of a considerable number of adults, to pursue a process which may truly be called religious education. It is not a desire which would lead to week after week of continuous study, like the old-fashioned Bible class. Yet it is the index of a real interest, and offers a hope of still greater things.

How shall the Church reach out to nurture and stimulate these many-sided desires? It is not an easy question to answer.

Shall we push upwards from the present graduation point in the Sunday school a series of courses for adults with some regular order and completeness, together with abundant freedom of choice? It hardly seems as if this would meet the situation. The new desire is not yet for a systematic course of study. Nor do the interested persons feel themselves closely identified with the processes of the school.

Shall we select or produce a considerable range of adult courses which may prove attractive, and make it widely known that such and such subjects are available for use in discussion classes? The difficulties of this plan are many. It is vague. Some one has to venture a guess as to what might be desired. And there is little to go by. Or it is expensive. For time and money may be spent in producing courses without any certainty as to whether they would be used, and the greater the variety the larger the total cost. Add to this the fact that there is no agreement as to the length of such courses.

There has been some consideraion of a plan which would give breadth to some regular scheme of discussion classes, a suggestion that short courses be inaugurated twice or even three times a year by the parish group method, and that such courses progress through a fixed list of general Church interests, or else be chosen out of a brief selected list under several heads. There seems to be a consensus of opinion that such courses should be distinctly short, five to seven topics or sessions.

There is an interesting attempt on the part of a representative committee from the Province of New York and New Jersey to arrange a list of co-ordinated adult courses representing the three main activities of the Church Missions, Social Service and Education. It will take some time to complete this comprehensive scheme, and to ascertain its acceptability.

Our conclusions are in general as follows:

1. We should maintain as many classes of young people and adults in the Sunday school as possible. But there will always be other adult groups who will prefer meeting at other times and places. Every effort along either line will help the work in the other line. Both should be pushed.

2. More effort should be made to present a broad choice of topics in systematic form, so that every encouragement may be offered parish groups to undertake a wider range of religious discussion than has been possible in the past.

3. We need more experimentation in parish situations on particular points, viz.:

(a) The topics which create most general interest.
(b) The most desirable length of a course.
(c) The season or seasons of the year when such groups may best be gathered.

Clergy who are working with adult groups could be of great service if they would report their experience on the above items to the Department of Religious Education.

4. We assume that recent efforts indicate that shorter courses and the discussion method produce the most fruitful results.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION AND THE HOME

The Rev. Elmer C. Pedrick

Before setting out on a journey it is usually wise to know where one is going. One ought also to be prepared for the journey. This profound observation on journeys applies with equal force to movements of all kinds, even to endeavorers in religious work. One always hesitates to speak or write on any subject in these times without being an expert on the subject considered. Yet there are many things which come to our observation and suggest themselves to us as we go about our daily tasks.

Today there is one thing which comes sharply to our attention; and that is the question and problem of Christian education. I say Christian education because the much used phrase "religious education" is ofttimes found narrow and distorted, as compared with the aims and bigness of Christian education.

One of the vitally important factors in determining the character of civilization is the home. The good home is the best of schools. It receives the child fresh from the hand of God and has almost entire control of him during those years in which he is most susceptible to formative influences of every kind. Such is the relation between parent and child that the educational efficiency which is possible to parents in relation to their children is the highest that is known on earth. The home, therefore, is the best place to impress ideals, to implant lasting convictions, and to develop respect for rightful authority. It is also the best place to establish in the mind of the young social attitudes based on mutual respect and confidence and on the spirit of service, and to prepare them for those wider social relations into which they are to come later.

There are no greater enemies to society than those whose teaching or conduct tend either to destroy the home or to render it incapable of properly performing its functions. Herein lies one of the fatal objections to radical Socialism. Those who believe in the primacy of those spiritual values which the good home helps so immensely in creating will always look with loathing and horror upon any plan for social reconstruction which seeks to overcome economic difficulties by herding and feeding human beings after the manner of beasts.

Houses and furniture do not make homes. And yet the problem of the home is partly a material problem. Real homes cannot be maintained in dark and crowded tenements nor under such conditions of poverty as make it impossible for parents to provide the material needs of their children or to give personal attention to their training. It is needless for us to expect to see a high type of manhood and womanhood developed in a home in which the children are insufficiently nourished, and the father and mother are so taken up with the task of keeping the wolf from the door that they have neither time nor strength nor heart for their higher responsibilities. Perhaps as we advance towards a condition of real civilization, the State will learn that, for the sake of its own welfare and stability as well as out of consideration of justice and humanity, it must seek to make possible the maintenance by every wedded pair of a home that is fit for boys and girls to live and grow in.

The Church, by her teaching, must seek to counteract the influences that make for the destruction of the home, whether these influences come from false social conceptions or from vicious economic conditions. Our friends of the business world have been reminding us recently that it is very unwise for religious leaders to undertake to give advice in regard to the solution of economic problems. Perhaps there is a sense in which they are right. The matter of working out definite plans for so adjusting economic affairs that every child born into the world may be insured a square deal calls for the co-operation of many experts. But it is the business of the Christian leaders to point out existing evils, to proclaim the fundamental principles of social living as set forth in the teaching of Jesus, and to insist upon the practical application of these principles in all our human relations.

The time has come when the Sunday school should relate itself in the closest and most vital way to the home, when it should seek to help parents to understand and fit themselves for their responsibilities and co-operate with them in the training of their children. It requires the co-operation of home and Church and God to work this great miracle.

If education itself must be a continuous part of individual life, if it begins with conscious existence and in different forms moulds every human career toward better and higher aims, religious education means the constant cumulative effect of Christian truth on human character. Religion is the most serious, the most permanent and inclusive interest of human beings. It is the central and abiding factor in man's progress and man's destiny. It comes from inner experience and is not imposed from without. External impressions reinforce it, but do not create it. There is generally a sense of incompleteness in facing the problems of existence; the realization that the power to overcome difficulties must come from a source not under our own control. This is what William James refers to when he speaks of "the profound uneasiness of the race, the sense of there being something wrong about us as we naturally stand." The answer to such questionings is given in the Christian faith, and when Christian education is made a necessary part of man's training to prepare him for taking his place in the world, we mean first and last the moral power, the spiritual force that is brought to us through the personality and experience of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Therefore any "crusade" or great movement launched today to rectify the existing conditions of our civilization must begin in the home; and not until we all feel the great responsibility which has devolved upon us as preachers, teachers and parents, will we see a tendency to better things. Back to the home!

From Bishop Lines Convention Address

One always expects good counsel and wise judgment from the Bishop of Newark. Here are some extracts from his Episcopal Address to his late Diocesan Convention:

"We are hearing much now of the danger lest the churches should demand such rigid laws as encroach upon personal liberty in respect to the use of Sunday and the operation of what are called by people who have scant knowledge of the subject 'blue laws.' The discussion shows lack of honesty and intelligence and does not deserve respect. There will be localities in which, and by certain people, agitation for a stricter observance of the Lord's day, by invoking the civil law, will go on. There surely, however, is no danger of the widespread adoption of a severer tone in religion, or of measures to compel people to be religious.

"The motive back of the agitation against the so-called 'blue laws' is the commercializing of Sunday. The greed for gain and not regard for the needs of hard-worked people make this agitation.

"We must all recognize that recreation must have a larger place on Sunday than in the days when work was less exacting and monotonous and injurious to mind and body. Whoever is the enemy of the day of rest is the enemy of mankind. We are warranted not because the Church wishes the day as a day of worship, but because all men and women need a weekly day of rest to stand against commercialization of the day and its use for gain by selfish men. The loss of the day of rest, especially through the persistence of greedy men, would be a calamity for any nation. What I wish to say here is that the reproach of the Church and religion because of a supposed hostility to reasonable recreation on Sunday and the desire to bring back what are called 'blue laws' is not honest and is worthy only of contempt."

Declaring that the remedy for the ills of the time and hope for the making of a new world of righteousness depend upon good religion, a sense of dependence upon Almighty God, and of duty toward our fellowmen, Bishop Lines went on to say in his address:

"National selfishness and forgetfulness that nations as well as individuals must be guided by high moral principles have involved us in all the horrors of the years just gone and in all the anxiety of the years that are passing, and it is not certain that the world has learned the lesson taught by its terrible experience. Our public men and writers who appeal to the public are saying much about the preservation of our rights as a nation and little about our duties. No man ever made out a noble life by putting the emphasis upon his rights rather than his duties, and no nation will make out a noble record by so doing.

"We wrote the noblest pages in our history when we pledged our millions of men in army and navy and all our resources to save the cause of civilization, and to declare that might shall not make right in this world. From that high plane, commanding the respect and gratitude of the whole civilized world, we have fallen, and now our leaders seem to be talking altogether about the assertion and maintenance of our rights, and it is a position to be deplored. It is an appeal to selfish interest, and the crowd of thoughtless people respond to it, but it is not worthy of us.

"More than the defense of the world because of our great resources and material wealth we need the respect and good will, yes, and love, of the world because we do not forget in making national claims of humanity.

'There is nothing fine in the talk of '100 per cent. Americanism,' 'everything for America,' which appeals to the crowd, nor in the note of arrogance because of our material wealth and the deference which the war-stricken nations pay to us. Our ills may not be as apparent as those of some other nations, but we have full enough to make us anxious, to keep us modest and to demand all the resources of wisdom and self-sacrifice and of moral obligation that we can command.

"We do well to make an end of the abominable political conditions and corruptions in the great cities, of lynching and mob violence, of selfish profiteering, the lost sense of sanctity of marriage and the family, of shameful luxury and extravagance on the part of the rich, of the miserable streets and houses into which we drive our poor, the way in which demagogues and corrupt politicians thrive, before we invite comparisons with other nations. The Church is called down to the battle against national evils, to stand for the weak as against the strong, to denounce corruption and evil doings in high places as well as low places, and the messages of the old prophets and the words of our blessed Lord are our warrant. Let churches be made beautiful and services attractive, but let the house of God be made the place where God's poor can be comfortable where the denunciation of wickedness and oppression and forgetfulness and regard for those in hard places in life and the championship of the weak never ceases. A good deal passes for Christianity among us which for its selfishness or hardness will not stand the test of the gospel, and it is time that judgment begin at the house of God."

Speaking of the tendency toward increasing extravagance in living and dress and of the large amounts of money spent on pleasure and amusement, Bishop Lines said:

"Every example of plain living and high thinking, of limited personal expenditure and larger support of good causes, every refusal to heed the demands of fashion, helps to make the community life better. The testimony of one of the great social leaders in England that waste and extravagance seemed a passport to social recognition may be not forget in making national claims, claims of humanity.

"Have regard for the weaker man. The war was largely fought to give the small nation a place in the world, and the civilized world passed judgment upon the question. Give the small dealer a chance, not trying to save a few pennies by turning your trade over to some great combination which destroys the small dealer and then charges you more than he did. Give to the man or woman in the lower forms of service good wages, and in the case of young people let honesty, good manners, trustworthiness, interest in your business go before shrewdness, keenness, aggressiveness and smartness. Have regard for the man who without his fault only gets out of the market place into work at the eleventh hour or the man who has only one talent to use."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE CHINESE FAMINE: LETTER FROM BISHOP ROOTS.

Mr. Editor: Will you publish the inclosed letter from Bishop Roots, which I send as one way of expressing the thanks we all feel to you and your readers for the steady stream of generous gifts that has come from them to aid China in this time of her distress?

John W. Wood.

Bishop Roots says:

"I want to acknowledge for my part the generosity of our people in replying so promptly to the appeal for famine relief funds as referred to in your letter of February 25, quoting the cablegram which we three Bishops sent to the Board and which was acted upon at the meeting of the Department of Missions on February 15.

"The work of famine relief is occupying a great deal of our attention. Not only is Littell giving practically all of his time to it here in Hankow, while Miss Couch and I are giving also a large part of our time, but we have at the present moment Mr. Miller, Mr. Thacher Souder, Mr. Frank A. Gray, Mr. Kemp and Deaconess Hart actually in the famine area hard at work in famine relief, while I have just received word from Ichang that in response to another appeal for two Mandarin speaking women to go into the country to work for women refugees, that Deaconess Ridgely has volunteered to come and will be on her way to the field very shortly.

"I have just seen Bishop Norris, who comes from the station where Miller is working. He reports that our people have done splendidly well all the way round. He saw and heard a good deal more about the work of Dr. Wassell and of Mr. Miller than of others, and reports that their work has been simply admirable, while our Chinese workers also have done splendid work. He says that the most difficult thing for him to face in the famine region was the little groups of people who could not get relief and who waited around after the day's distribution was over, with no prospect of getting anything. He had to pass by them, as he knew it would ruin the work which was already being done if he should not observe the customary routine in distributing relief. Doubtless there will be many thousands who get insufficient relief or none at all, but the amount of good being done by money which has come out from China or has been contributed here in China is certainly exceedingly great and something to be very thankful for. The part which the missionary community has played in distributing this relief has also been an essential and very gratifying piece of work, showing that the missionary body is united when it comes to this kind of work in a way which is not characteristic of any other community of people in China or any other organization in China."

Logan H. Roots, Bishop of Hankow.

Hankow, April 19, 1921.

BISHOP ROWE LEAVES FOR INTERIOR OF ALASKA: IN NEED OF FUNDS.

Mr. Editor: Bishop Rowe left Seattle on May 27 for a long journey in the interior of Alaska. He will endeavor to visit all the stations on the Yukon, Tanana and Koyokuk Rivers.

For the greater part of the summer, and possibly for the entire summer, he will be deprived of the use of the Pelican, our missionary motor-boat. The engine of the Pelican is worn out and the hull is badly in need of repairs.

The Bishop says, "I am anticipating a small boat and hard work on a part of this trip."

That means drifting with the current in an open skiff. This was the Bishop's method of travel when he made his first journey down the Yukon in 1896. It involves exposure, hardship and danger. Serious as this is, it is only an incident in the summer's journeyings.

The thing that is causing Bishop Rowe the most anxiety is the needs he will find among the missionaries and the Indians and his own inability to relieve them because, as he has frequently stated during the past year, he is receiving very few specials these days.

On the eve of sailing he wrote to the Church Missions House: "I cannot get along without some specials on this long trip. Among Indians needy on every hand, I will have many demands. I almost dread the visit. I fear I shall come out of it exhausted physically, mentally, financially. Please send whatever balance there may be in my specials account, to my bank in Seattle, at once."

Unfortunately, Bishop Rowe's specials account has been entirely exhausted by drafts already made upon it, and there is notification of further drafts to come. If any of Bishop Rowe's friends can help him in this emergency, I know they will be glad to do it. Gifts sent to me or to our Treasurer, Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, will be promptly credited to Bishop Rowe's account. He will be notified of them and can make drafts on them as needed during the summer.

JOHN W. WOOD.

281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

SERVICE IN A NEW TOWN.

Mr. Editor: Last Sunday I was in Jena, La., by invitation of the faculty and principal of the high school to deliver the commencement sermon. Taking advantage of the opportunity to present the service of the Church to the good people of that little county seat, by special permission of the minister of the Baptist Church, I held service there in the Baptist Church that night. The commencement sermon had been preached in the morning at the Methodist Church.

I asked if any one of the three hundred present that night could recall any service of the Episcopal Church being held in Jena, and not one said they could. I took with me a hundred copies of the Evening Prayer leaflet, and had them distributed in the congregation, and before beginning the service I explained to them that we had a regular form of devotion, which was in the nature of a program which we followed, and that I was certain they were familiar with such forms, as many of them were Masons, Pythians, Red Men or W. O. W.'s, and they used formal services on special occasions where they wished everything to "go off" smoothly. I then explained the use of the vestments, and put each one on as I explained its significance. I never have seen a more reverential congregation, even if several little folks stood up the better to see my handsomely embroidered stole. After the service was over, and before the sermon, I took the occasion to thank them for their liberal responses in the Psalter, for I have frequently been in a congregation in our own church buildings and heard no more than from those who had never before heard such a service. The Baptist minister read the Lessons, and as the congregation was departing came to me and said, "We don't wear the same sort of clothes, but we preach the same gospel." So I felt that I had not preached heresy, though I did say that our Church taught that wherever we could take Jesus with us there we could go, and made no restrictions upon our amusements by forbidding this or that, but that being the general line or principle, she left the pleasure to the individual.

The offering was for the famine sufferers in China, and I enclose New York Exchange for $9.08, which is the amount collected.

W. S. SLACK.

Alexandria, La., May 24, 1921.

PERHAPS AN UNCONSCIOUS PLAGIARISM.

Mr. Editor: Stanza 2 of Lyte's beautiful hymn, "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken" (No. 358 of Hymnal), has the lines, "Oh, 'tis not in grief to harm me, While Thy love is left to me: Oh, 'twere not in joy to charm me, Were that joy unmixed with Thee."

Lyte wrote this in 1824. In a song of Moore's Irish Melodies, beginning, "I'd mourn the hopes that leave me," written about 1808, are the lines, "'Tis not in fate to harm me, While fate leaves Thy love to me: 'Tis not in joy to charm me, Unless joy be shared with Thee."

What is the explanation? It is impossible that Lyte could plagiarize; yet it could not be accidental. Moore's melodies were so popular then that it must have attracted attention, when Lyte's hymn came out in 1824, and explanation may have been given; but this writer is not well enough read to know it. Can some reader explain?

BERKELEY MINOR.

Charlottesville, Va.

The Great Commission.

WORK OF ARCHDEACON CABRAL IN SOUTHERN BRAZIL.

I wish to send my friends some notes with regard to the work in my care, at the same time notifying them that my address is no longer Porto Alegre, but Viamao, Rio Grande do Sol, Brazil.

The following will give an idea of the work which is under the pastoral care of the Archdeacon:

Places.	Preachings.	Attendance.
Viamao	46	970
S. Leopoldo	11	264
S. Francisco	13	1,311
Total of the Northeastern Mission.	70	2,545
In aid of other parishes—
S. Gabriel	5	432
Porto Alegre and Theresopolis	6	940
Bage	5	1,470
Rosario, Livramento and Rivera	16	4,210
Total	32	7,052
Total of all the places	102	9,597

S. Francisco de Pault. Two Sunday schools have been lately established, one in the Villa under the superintendence of our devoted lay reader, Snr. Oliveiros Muniz dos Reis, and the other in Boa Vista, directed by the no less earnest brother, Snr. Antonio de Lima e Silva, long the faithful treasurer of our vestry. The congregation numbers about seventy confirmed members, scattered among the townships of Caxias, S. Francisco and Taquara.

The number of families receiving religious influence from our Church in that region is, however, incalculable, an attendance of two hundred and fifty on divine service not being uncommon. At the last Episcopal visitation, among other persons, four sons of one of the most highly thought of men in the place were confirmed. There are three preaching places, one of which is Lageado, ten leagues distant from the Villa, where the Church of the Divine Blessing is situated. This spacious church, built of wood, shows the need of some supplementary work on the exterior. It is on one of the principal streets. A wall and steps of stone with iron grating and gate would much improve the present building and add to its dignity.

S. Leopoldo. On May 9 of last year this work was given to the Archdeacon's care. The removal of our chapel, which is still in a rented house, was accomplished. The Sunday school was reopened under the care of Dona Lucilia Weber Sperb, who is also giving her services as organist of our chapel. The Woman's Auxiliary was reorganized and a vestry elected. The congregation greatly desires to build a chapel, and already own a fine lot on one of the principal streets.

Viamao. The most encouraging feature of this work is the Sunday school. In this little village of one thousand inhabitants we have every Sunday a good number of children receiving religious instruction in our church. This Sunday school was reopened after the removal of the Archdeacon to this place, and is at present under the direction of Mrs. Cabral, aided by her children, Eunice and Gamaliel. Divine service is usually well attended. We are prevented from aggressive work by the smallness of the church, which was built for the needs of twenty-five years ago. Adding some meters at the back of the building would meet the needs of the work at present.

I do not wish to end this little report without mentioning particularly the work which the Rev. C. Sergel is doing in a part of the frontier of our State. There the Bishop confirmed recently forty-eight persons.

When I visited the zone in which the Rev. Mr. Sergel works, I had to speak several times in the theatre and once in the public square, since our chapel could not hold those attending. On that occasion I preached for the first time in the territory of the neighboring Republic of Uruguay, making use of the theatre of Rivera, a Uruguayan town separated by only one street from the Brazilian town of Livramento. In the last named many offerings have already been made to the Rev. Mr. Sergel for the building of a church.

To those who are seriously interested in the evangelization of South America, I wish to make the formal request that they pray regularly for the work in my charge. I myself do not cease to pray that the Holy Spirit be abundantly given to our beloved Mother-Church.

Americo V. Cabral, Missionary Archdeacon.

NOTES FROM JAPAN.

At the invitation of Viscount Shibusawa, of Tokyo, a group of gentlemen prominent in the public life of Japan recently gathered and organized an Advisory Board to St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo. Their purpose is to give all possible aid to Dr. Rudolph Teusler as he begins to carry out his plans for the erection of the new buildings.

The Advisory Board consists, among others, of: Viscount Shibusawa (chairman), Baron S. Goto, Baron K. Iwasaki, Mr. D. Inouyo, president Bank of Japan; Viscount Kaneko, Imperial Privy Councillor; Baron Sakatani, member Upper House of the Diet.

Dr. Teusler says that the members of the committee are the pick of the country in business and national leadership.

More than thirty years ago Bishop Bickersteth, the leader of the Church of England Mission in South Tokyo, established what might be described as a University Mission in the city of Tokyo under the name of St. Andrew's. Its members were drawn from the English universities and have lived a simple community life. They have exercised a wide ministry, helping every good cause, welcoming all comers from every quarter with frank and genial hospitality, standing as champions of a firm yet liberal Churchmanship, and above all, cherishing a sincere and ardent piety.

Conditions resulting from the war, coupled with the death of Archdeacon King, the head of the mission, have made its continuance precarious and doubtful. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which helps to support the work in the Diocese of Southern Tokyo, has been compelled to reduce its appropriation. The outlook for the future of St. Andrew's has therefore been far from bright. Recently an eminent Japanese lawyer in Tokyo, a man with a world-wide reputation, called at St. Andrew's and assured the members of the mission that, if it were impossible to secure support to place the mission on its own footing, he and a group of Japanese financiers were ready to do it on a large and generous scale, because St. Andrew's was an institution of international importance, its members showed a type of Christian living peculiar, inestimably precious, and one which could not be spared.

The incident is of interest because the Japanese gentlemen who offered this aid are not yet Christians. It indicates that our missionary representatives need not, as is sometimes thought, dilute the gospel, if they would influence a people of so strong a fiber as the Japanese.

Church Intelligence

Dr. LaMothe Accepts Election.

Bishop-elect John D. LaMothe informs the Presiding Bishop that he finds himself able to accept his election to be Bishop of Honolulu, and he is asking that the day for his consecration may be designated.

Daniel S. Tuttle,
Presiding Bishop.

June 1, 1921.

Conference of Educational Leaders.

The conference of educational leaders called by the Department of Religious Education at Pittsburgh on Wednesday and Thursday, May 25 and 26, proved to be an exceedingly busy and profitable one. Representatives from nearly sixty dioceses were present, and the widespread distribution of these gave the conference a national character. Problems concerning religious education were discussed by these representatives in an enlivening and absorbing manner. The sessions were held in the parish house of St. Peter's Church. Beginning with corporate communion each morning and lasting until nearly 10 o'clock each night, with hardly an intermission, they were two days of intent and occupied interest.

At the opening session the Rev. William E. Gardner, Executive Secretary of the Department of Religious Education, called for one minute reports from all dioceses represented. These were exceedingly interesting and suggestive. Many new ideas and methods were revealed, but above all the reports showed how real and alive interest in religious education is all over the Church.

After the reports the conference organized with Dr. Gardner as chairman, the Rev. John W. Suter, Jr., educational secretary of the Diocese of Massachusetts, as secretary, and the Rev. Gardiner Tucker, field secretary of the Province of Sewanee, as assistant secretary in charge of resolutions. The purpose of the conference was to discuss certain problems previously assigned and to submit its conclusions in the form of recommendations to the Department of Religious Education. The first part of Wednesday afternoon was devoted to committee work and the remainder of the conference to discussion of committee reports.

Chief in interest among the many reports was that on week-day instruction and co-operation with the public schools. A large portion of time was given to its consideration, and it aroused a widespread interest among those present. The Rev. Robert S. Chalmers told of the work at Toledo, and the Rev. Victor Hoag described the work at Batavia, Ill. The representative from Utah said that they have week-day instruction in that State as a matter of course because the Mormons have week-day religious schools. Mr. Edward Sargent, of the department, pointed out the procedure necessary to inaugurate week-day instruction. He said that it is necessary to enlist the consent of three parties—public school authorities, the clergy and the home.

The Church School Service League proved a storm center of interest. A whole evening was given up to a consideration of the block plan, and the discussion began afresh in the morning. On a very close vote the following resolution was passed: "Resolved, that this conference disapproves the organization of the Church School Service League as a formal national organization."

Another problem which aroused considerable interest concerned the offerings of Sunday schools. This interest was augmented when Dr. Gardner stated that these offerings amounted to over one million dollars a year. The conference endorsed the Duplex envelope and the distribution of the contributions to the five fields, the Birthday Thank Offering and the Lenten Offering for the work of the P. B. & C.

The conference voted to meet in May or June of next year at Chicago. It was recommended that there be similar conferences in each province at the time of the Synods.

Commencement, Berkeley Divinity School.

The sixty-fifth annual alumni gathering of the Berkeley Divinity School at Middletown, Conn., was held in connection with the commencement exercises on June 7 and 8. A class of four students graduated on the afternoon of Tuesday, June 7, and an address was made by Rboert Fulton Cutting, of New York, president of the Cooper Union and director of the Bureau of Municipal Research. At the close of the commencement exercises an informal reception was held on the lawn of the school, and at half past 4 o'clock the annual alumni service was conducted in the chapel, at which the preacher was the Rev. Theodore Sedgwick, D. D., rector of Calvary Church, New York, of the class of 1890. At the alumni dinner held that evening an interesting and novel departure was the addresses by laymen upon Recruiting for the Ministry from the Layman's Point of View. Among the speakers was the Hon. Frank L. Polk, Under Secretary of State in the last administration and head of the American delegation to the Peace Conference in 1919.

On Wednesday there was an early celebration of the Holy Communion and the annual meeting of the Alumni Association, followed by the ordination of candidates for the priesthood and diaconate in the Church of the Holy Trinity. The preacher at this service was the Rt. Rev. David Lincoln Ferris, D. D., of the class of 1893, Suffragan Bishop of Western New York. The dean and Mrs. Ladd entertained the alumni, students and guests at the close of this service at luncheon in the deanery.

The graduates this year are the Rev. William Grime, now assistant at Christ Church Cathedral, Hartford, of the Diocese of Connecticut, and three members of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, the Rev. Messrs. Henry Lewis, assistant at the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York; Loyal Young Graham, Third, and John Kuhns. The Rev. Mr. Graham will begin his work as assistant at Grace Chapel, New York, during the summer, and the Rev. Mr. Kuhns sails for England immediately to study for a year at Cambridge University.

Summer Normal School, Ocean City, Md.

The Peninsula Summer School, which will be held at Ocean City, Md., June 20-25 inclusive, is an intensified Summer Normal School for those engaged in religious instruction, the clergy, lay teachers and superintendents.

The faculty consists of the Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, Bishop of Easton; the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware; the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector St. Matthew's Church, Hyattsville, Md.; the Rev. Frederick E. Seymour, rector St. Philip's Church, Philadelphia; the Rev. George F. Taylor, Chapel of the Incarnation, New York City; Mr. Robert Mathews, Easton, Md.; Miss May Richardson, Memorial Church, Baltimore, Md., and Miss Helen I. Jennings, Elementary Superintendent, Trinity Church, Pottsville, Pa.

A most interesting and instructive program has been arranged and every parish and Sunday school within a radius of one hundred and fifty miles should have at least one representative present.

The registration fee for attendance upon the school will be two dollars for each member, and board and lodging can be obtained at the rate of one dollar and seventy-five cents or two dollars per day.

The pageant on Friday evening, "The Phantom Spirits and the Real Spirit of the Church," was written by the Rev. Edmund Burk, Ph. D., rector of St. Paul's By-the-Sea, and will be presented by a group of teachers from St. Andrew's, Wilmington, and the author.

It is requested that those interested and who intend to come will notify at once Mr. Dudley E. Roe, Sudlersville, Md., or Rev. Percy L. Donaghay, Middletown, Del.

The Blue Ridge Missionary Conference.

The Missionary Conference at Blue Ridge will be held this summer at the usual time, June 24-July 4. Rooms without bath will be $25. Rooms with bath $30 An enrollment fee of $5 is charged each delegate. Reduced round trip railroad tickets will be sold on presentation of identification certificates. Apply to Blue Ridge, N. C., for certificates. Send registration fee ($5) and request for reservation to Dr. H. F. Williams, Box 330, Nashville, Tenn.

The leaders from the Episcopal Church will be: Miss Grace Lindley, Junior Normal Class; Miss Bertha Richards, St. Matthew's Gospel; Miss Claudia Hunter, Morning Watch and Promotion of Prayer; Miss Sallie Deane. Social Committee: The Rev. William Hoke Ramsour, Liberia, Africa; Mrs. W. H. Ramsour (who was Miss Sarah Conway), served a number of years in Africa before her marriage; Miss Alice Gregg, Anking, China; Dr. Robert W. Patton always comes to the Blue Ridge Conference, and other Episcopal Church leaders are expected in addition to these named.

Commencement at the Theological Seminary in Virginia.

The ninety-eighth annual commencement of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, near Alexandria, began Wednesday evening, June 1, when the Rev. H. Percy Silver, D. D., rector of the Church of the Incarnation, New York, addressed the Students' Missionary Society in the chapel of the Seminary.

The commencement exercises proper began on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, with services in the chapel presided over by the Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., and attended by many prominent clergymen and laymen. The address to the graduating class was delivered by the Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, and diplomas were awarded to the following graduates: E. L. Gettier, Robert Magill, Warren Seager, William Nes, Robert McD. Kirkland and Frances A. Cox. The annual essay was read by the Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires, rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York City.

A notable feature of the exercises was the dedication on Thursday afternoon of the new Packard-Laird library building. This is the most beautiful building on the "Hill" and is a memorial to the late dean, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Packard, and to his grandson, the Rev. Dr. William H. Laird, of Delaware. After the alumni luncheon, which was very largely attended and served in the library, a portrait of Dr. Packard was unveiled by his grandson and a portrait of Dr. Laird by his daughter. Bishop Brown made a brief address and Bishop Tucker, of Southern Virginia, read a historical memorial of Dr. Packard, full of literary grace and charm, recalling the rare personality of "The dear old Rab," evoking both tears and laughter from his audience, many of whom had been students under Dr. Packard and his contemporary. The Rev. Dr. Trapnell, of St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, Del., told of the saintly character of his friend, Dr. Laird; and Mr. Joseph Packard, of Baltimore, son of the former dean, recalled the beginnings of the library from his boyhood memories.

The exercises came to a close on Friday morning, when the ordination service was held in the chapel, conducted by Bishop Brown, assisted by Bishops Tucker and Thomson, of Southern Virginia; Gravatt, of West Virginia, and Jett, of Southwestern Virginia. The ordination sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. William A. Guerry, D. D., of South Carolina, who also ordained to the diaconate his son, Sumner Guerry. The Rev. William S. Shacklett, minister in charge of Weddell Memorial Church, Richmond, was ordained to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., who also ordained the following to the diaconate: Douglas W. Neff, C. L. Monroe and Robert A. Magill.

Six Hundred and Sixty-seven Thousand Dollars to the Church for Building Purposes.

The Loan's Committee, in its report to the trustees of the American Church Building Fund Commission at their May meeting, announced a total of loans approved between March 1 and May 1 of $110,000. This record is unprecedented in the history of the Commission, far exceeding that of any like period of time, and being twice the total of loans approved in the entire year of 1916. The obligations so reported exhaust the balance of the capital fund of the Commission which is available for loans, and necessitates a limitation of the committee's future action in approving applications to a turn-over of capital as loans are returned. The trustees regret this limitation in service at the same time that they rejoice that the resources entrusted to them are now entirely in the hands of the Church. Until the capital fund has been increased only small loans will be considered in order that such funds as become available may be distributed as widely as possible throughout the Church.

An interesting booklet and circular has been prepared and is in process of distribution with the view of urging the laity to express their interest in the work of this agent for the Church's physical well-being by gifts and by remembrance in wills. Copies of this booklet may be had of the corresponding secretary, at the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial Tablet Unveiled in Old Pohick.

Old Pohick Church, Fairfax County, one of the old historic churches of America, where many Presidents and statesmen have worshipped, was the scene of a notable gathering on May 29, when a memorial service was held and a tablet to the heroes of Lee and Mt. Vernon districts, who sacrificed their lives in the World War, was unveiled.

The President and Mrs. Harding attended the regular morning service, which preceded the memorial exercises and occupied the pew in which George Washington worshipped as a vestryman for over twenty-five years. In the presidential party were also George B. Christian, Jr., secretary to the President, and Brigadier General Charles E. Sawyer. The parishioners and friends from Fairfax and adjoining counties filled the church to its capacity, and many hundred people were forced to remain outside. Scattered throughout the congregation were representatives of the army and navy and other high public officials.

The rector of Pohick Church, the Rev. E. W. Mellichampe, conducted the services and preached on "Warring for Right." Special music was rendered by the choir, in charge of Mrs. Edmund R. Gibson, who also sung the offertory solo.

At the beginning of the memorial exercises about one hundred school children who had contributed to the tablet fund marched into the church, accompanied by the Engineer Band from Camp Humphreys. Representative R. Walton Moore made a brief talk, paying tribute to the sons of the community who had given their lives for the great cause of humanity, after which President Harding made an address. After the services were concluded, with Mrs. Harding, the President shook hands with each of the two thousand present.

Bishop Brown visited Christ Church Parish, Middlesex County, recently and confirmed a class of twelve in Christ Church and seven in Urbanna Chapel, presented by the rector, the Rev. F. E. Warren.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial to the Rev. Dr. McKim.

Plans are under way for the erection of a memorial to the late Dr. Randolph H. McKim, of Epiphany Parish, and great interest in the project is being manifested by the people of Epiphany Parish, others in Washington and many throughout the country. This memorial will take the form of a bell-tower to be erected at Epiphany Church, containing chimes of rare tone, and also an addition to Epiphany Church, which will enlarge its seating capacity. Detailed arrangements concerning the memorial were discussed at a supper at Epiphany Parish Hall on Monday, June 6.

Musical Service at Olney, Md.

The choir of Christ Church, Georgetown, assisted by several singers from other church choirs, gave a musical service at St. John's Church, Olney, Md., on a recent Sunday afternoon, in response to an invitation from the choir of St. John's. The members of Christ Church choir left in automobiles immediately after the morning service, arriving at the parish house in Olney in time to enjoy a delightful luncheon which had been prepared for them. This was followed by the service and short address by the Rev. J. H. W. Blake, rector of Christ Church, Georgetown, after which the entire party returned to Washington in time to sing for their evening services. Such visitations by the city choirs to the country parishes are good for both city and country, providing as they do a stimulus to the country parish and stirring a greater interest on the part of the city churches in the life of the rural parishes.

The baccalaureate services and sermon for George Washington University were held at 4 o'clock around the Peace Cross on Mt. St. Alban on Sunday, June 6, Canon W. L. DeVries being the preacher.

The Rev. Percy Foster Hall, formerly assistant rector of Epiphany Church and now rector of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, has instituted Christian healing services at St. Paul's Church, at which he has been assisted by the rectors of Christ Church and Grace Church, Alexandria. Dr. Hall was largely instrumental in the continuing of such services in Epiphany Church after the death of Dr. McKim, who had given so much of himself in their interest.

M. M. W.

NEW YORK.

Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop-Elect.

American Board of Applied Christianity to Hold Round Table on Church Methods.

A Round Table on Church Methods, under direction of the American Board of Applied Christianity, is announced for July 1 to September 15. The place of its holding on week days will be the Educational Building, Fifth Avenue and Thirteenth Street, New York, and every Friday evening at 8 o'clock at 16 West Forty-eighth Street, New York. The basis of the methods presented will be Christ's Economy.

In the summer of 1920 fully fifty ministers and laymen, without invitation of any kind, called upon Mr. Eugene M. Camp, then president of the Seabury Society of New York, to counsel with him upon methods for Christian work, and solutions of difficult Church problems. These ministers and laymen came from almost every State, and were in New York to study Church methods, or were passing through it to or from vacation resorts. Successful methods were secured in some cases from those who called and were passed on to others.

The society named has given place to an Applied Christianity Board, with Major General Leonard Wood as honorary president and Mr. Eugene M. Camp as president. Others are associated with these men, several religious bodies, and all conversant with successful methods. This year announcement is made of this Round Table on Church Methods. Appointments may be made by correspondence, or on arrival in New York ministers and others may telephone Watkins 6589. No charges of any kind are made. Conditions in New York will be explained to such as desire, and counsel given as far as possible.

Before the world war the American people were giving $415,000,000 a year to maintain churches and their work at home and abroad, but with increases in salaries, building costs, etc., the amount has risen to $600,000,000. Many questions of downtown churches in growing cities, of foreign born, of Church attendance, of nation-wide campaigns, of training for volunteer workers, of conduct of Bible classes and men's clubs, come to the front and clamor for solution. The aim of the Applied Christianity Board is to create a Church Engineering School, which shall collect scientific management methods from everywhere, and distribute them without charge to those in need of them. Especially is it regarded as desirable that laymen who are set officially to manage churches and their material affairs become familiar with scientific management laws and methods that bring success. It is also desirable to get men into harness to work and to give, and not as now, a very few bear all of the burdens.

Preaching on the Beaches.

The Archdeaconry of Staten Island, N. Y., has arranged to take up for the fifth year missionary work on the beacher. Bishop Manning is anxious, if possible, to extend the work. The venerable Archdeacon Pott, Ph. D., has general superintendence. Mr. C. H. Trench is treasurer, and the Rev. William Wilkinson will be special missioner.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D., Coadjutor.

Good Work in Clarendon County.

Over three years ago the Rev. William M. Walton took charge of the Clarendon County Missions. At the time the Church had only one building in the towns of Pinewood, Manning and Summerton, and as it was located at Summerton, the rector resided there.

The problem was to provide a new building at Summerton, a church at the large, important town of Manning and a chapel (for Sunday school purposes especially) at Pinewood. The old historic St. Mark's was four miles from that town, and rather inaccessible.

A very pretty gothic building in imitation stone has been completed at Manning, and this has been accomplished by a small congregation without debt.

The new church just completed at Summerton is practically new and a beautiful building, well lighted and heated.

At Pinewood beautiful old St. Mark's, four miles from town, has been renovated from end to end, which is a source of great gratification to Church people there, as St. Mark's is one of the most distinguished churches of the State in its contribution to South Carolina's historic life.

In addition to this, the long desired Sunday school building at Pinewood is in process of creation and will probably be in use by the end of the year.

Pinewood has one clerical service only during the month, but the congregation gathers every Sunday afternoon for devotional and Sunday school work.

At Summerton nearly the whole congregation is enrolled with the children in the Sunday school of St. Matthias.

The completion of the work in these missions being now practically assured, the rector has tendered his resignation, to take effect at an early date.

The time for which he pledged himself (three years) was over last Easter a year ago, but by unanimous written request of the Summerton congregation, reinforced by that of the Bishop, he remained another year in order to erect the new Church of St. Matthias.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Reese Takes a Needed Rest.

The Bishop enjoyed a much-needed vacation the first week of this month, when he attended the centennial of the University of Virginia. He was a student there at the time of the semi-centennial, and it has always been one of his dreams to be present at the one hundredth anniversary. The Bishop is an alumnus of the class of '75, and having been appointed class commander early in the year, his duty has been to round up the members of the class for attendance at the celebration. The Bishop preached the baccalaureate sermon at St. Mary's School, Raleigh, N. C., on May 22, attended a meeting of the Board of Trustees of St. Athanasius' School, Brunswick, and the next day preached the commencement sermon and delivered the diplomas to the graduates. The following Sunday he preached the commencement sermon for the Quitman High School. The Bishop will go to Sewanee from the University of Virginia to attend the commencement exercises of the University of the South and a meeting of the Board of Regents.

Dr. Wing Urges Reform: Drawing a pointed lesson for the present conditions in the State, the Rev. John Durham Wing, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Savannah, on a recent Sunday, preached from the text, 1 Kings 18:17, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" From the wicked reign of Ahab and the prophesies of Elijah, Dr. Wing pronounced a solemn warning, and called upon his hearers not to remain neutral, but to protest as Christians and help to bring about a reform from the present evil conditions existing in the State. Without using definite language to express his meaning, Dr. Wing's allusions were very marked, and in speaking of Elijah's warnings to the people of Israel, he said, "Was he unduly advertising the State"? Both the Bishop and Dr. Wing have given full endorsement to Governor Dorsey's action in publishing the pamphlet entitled, "The Negro in Georgia."

St. Paul's Church, Augusta, the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector, has had forty-three candidates for confirmation this year in two classes. Of this number three were admitted from the Roman Catholic Church.

E. D. J.

WEST VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Commencement at St. Hilda's Hall.

St. Hilda's Hall, Charles Town, has concluded its sixth commencement with a graduating class of ten young ladies. Their parents and friends, as well as a number of visiting alumnae, added much to the pleasure of these last days. On Friday night Miss Hester and Miss O'Boyle, the graduates in piano and vocal music, gave their recital.

The spring festival, which has become an event looked forward to each year, was called "The Coming of Spring," and the little fantasy was most gracefully carried out.

The Rev. Giles B. Palmer preached before the graduates on Sunday in Zion Church, a sermon long to be remembered for its simplicity and strength.

Two short plays, quite different in content, and thus giving scope for a variety of histrionic talent, were presented on Monday night.

The Rev. Dudley Boogher conducted the service on Commencement Day, and the Rev. Conrad Goodwin, rector of Zion Church, brought the school a greeting from Bishop Gravatt, who could not be present as had been hoped, and also a call to service which could not fail to encourage and sustain. Then followed the delivery of the distinctions, diplomas, etc., and the closing of "The Link" in the chain which hangs on the walls of Whitby, a symbol of the rounding out of the school year. The Senior class president then presented a class banner, which is to hang also on Whitby walls—the fifth to take its place there.

The exercises closed with the old Hebrew benediction said in concert.

Miss Frances Smith, of Charleston, W. Va., won the Sarah Dandridge Scholship this year. Announcement was made by Miss Duval of two new scholarships to be available next year—the Julia Terrell and the Robert Randolph Duval. The first is the bequest of a Charles Town lady, and the second a memorial to Miss Duval's father.

The pupils' efforts towards a new gymnasium have accumulated more than a thousand dollars, and were highly commended by Miss Duval, who spoke with gratitude of several other gifts to the school in the way of much-needed equipment.

It is hoped that the new academic building will be ready for use next September, and dedicatory services held on Founder's Day, November 1.

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

The year 1921 was one of the most satisfactory in the history of the district. The twenty-eighth annual convocation was held at All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane, May 17 to 19, and was attended by all the clergy and sixty-five lay delegates. Bishop Herman Page presided and the Rev. John G. Larsen was unanimously re-elected Secretary. He appointed the Rev. Lindley H. Miller as his assistant. Reports from all organizations showed a steady growth; in fact, a gain was shown in every line of Church endeavor, but nowhere perhaps more than in the increase of the Sunday schools. The young people in 1919 raised $1,312, but in 1920 gave $2,248, a gain of $936. The district treasurers were also re-elected, W. H. Farnham, treasurer for the district, and W. D. Vincent, treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign, both men receiving the thanks of the Convocation for the excellent service they had rendered the district. The date of the 1922 Convocation was changed, so that it will take place probably early in February, instead of May. The Rt. Rev. Charles Schofield, D. D., Bishop of British Columbia, was the special preacher at the opening service of the Convocation, and his forceful and eloquent message set the tone for the rest of the services and sessions. On Wednesday evening a dinner was held at the Davenport, which was very largely attended, and addresses were given by four Bishops. Bishop Page presided; Bishop Wells, former Bishop, now rector of St. Mark's Church, Tacoma, was given an ovation, and spoke of the pleasure it was both for his wife and himself to return to the scene of old and happy associations. Bishop Schofield and Bishop Keator then spoke on their conception of the Lambeth proposals. Several resolutions were presented, one concerning the new divorce law enacted at the last Legislature, which was vigorously protested by the Very Rev. W. C. Hicks, D. D., and he was ably seconded by the Rev. L. K. Smith. Our Church people were also urged to take personal interest in the problems of housing and unemployment, as being parts of Christianity as vital as matters of doctrine and ritual. Thursday was observed as Woman's Auxiliary Day, and services were held at St. James' Church, Spokane, with addresses by Deaconess Powell, of Roslyn, and Miss Roberts, of Oroville. The Rev. L. K. Smith took the opening service. Bishop Page entertained the clergy at breakfast each morning, and also at dinner at the Davenport Thursday evening, and Mrs. Page entertained the wives of the clergy.

W. A. A. S.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation of Scranton.

The first session of the Convocation of Scranton was held at Christ Church, Stroudsburg (the Rev. E. V. Gray, rector), on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 31 and June 1. At the opening service on Tuesday evening there were addresses by the rector, Archdeacon E. G. N. Holmes and Bishop Talbot, followed by a sermon on "Agnosticism," by the Rev. W. B. Beach, of Scranton. There followed an address on "The Need of a Definite Missionary Policy of the Diocese," by Field Secretary H. P. Walter, and then a conference on the subject.

On Wednesday morning the Rev. E. G. N. Holmes was elected dean, the Rev. F. P. Houghton, secretary, and Mr. C. J. Arnold, treasurer. A resolution was passed recommending to the Bishop the reviving of the Bishop's Church Extension Fund, because of the fact that the Nation-Wide Campaign produced only one-third of the funds aimed at, and therefore did not enable the Bishop to continue the assistance to parishes and missions every quarter in the purchase of lots and erection of churches, rectories and parish houses. The Rev. A. H. Bradshaw, of Easton, presented a meditation on "The Everlasting Life According to the Teachings of Jesus." After luncheon Mr. E. E. Piper led a conference on "Material and Methods of Mission Study Classes."

A notable result of reorganization in this Diocese is the report that during the past year the Woman's Auxiliary of each Archdeaconry attained to 99 per cent. efficiency in its box work; that is, by working along Red Cross lines, the officers obtained boxes from all branches save one in each Archdeaconry.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Diocese Observes Numerous Anniversaries.

Numerous anniversaries are just now being observed in the Diocese—the fifteenth anniversary of the rectorships of the Rev. Messrs. Charles T. Walkley and Charles E. Hutchison, of Orange and East Orange, both marking prosperous periods in their parishes; the fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of St. John's Church, Dover, built in the rectorship of the late Rev. Dr. Butterworth; the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of St. Andrew's, Newark, and the tenth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. Charles H. Wells; the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of St. John's Church, West Hoboken, of which the father of the late Mr. Edward H. Harriman was rector in its early days; the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. C. M. Dunham, of All Saints' Church, Orange, and the twentieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. R. D. Brown, of St. Phillip's Church, Newark. Gifts of money to some of the rectors have marked these notable anniversaries.

The Boards of Religious Education and Social Service have now been organized under the recent legislation by the election of eight members of the Diocesan Convention, the appointment of eight members by the Bishop, and the addition up to eight by choice of the boards. They have been divided into terms so that one-half the number goes out each year. The Bishops and the Diocesan Secretaries, who are also canons of the Cathedral, are ex-officio members. The Finance and Advisory Board, which is the Executive Committee of the Diocese in control of Diocesan business, the Nation-Wide Campaign, etc., consists of sixteen members. The others beside the Bishops, the President of the Standing Committee, the Treasurer, ex-officio, are one-half elected by the Convention and one-half appointed by the Bishop.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Chas. D. Williams, D. D., Bishop

Diocesan Summer School.

The Department of Religious Education of the Diocese has announced that the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, the Rev. Messrs. John H. Lever, J. A. Schaad, H. K. Bartow, W. L. Torrance, C. E. Webb and Miss Florence Newbolt, of New York, will compose the faculty of the fifth annual Diocesan Summer School to be held at Port Huron, Friday, June 24, to Friday, July 1.

It is expected that more than a hundred delegates from the different churches of the Diocese will be in attendance at the school, and the courses in Sunday School Work, Social Service Work, Personal Religion, Leadership of Young People, etc., will be given.

The arrangements for the school are being made by the Rev. W. L. Torrance, rector of St. Andrew's Memorial Church, Detroit.

Detroit Archdeaconry: An address by the Rev. John Howard Lever was the special feature of the spring meeting of the Detroit Archdeaconry, which was held Wednesday, June 8, at St. John's Church, Wayne. The meeting, composed of delegates, both clerical and lay, from all the churches in Wayne County, was opened by a service of the Holy Communion, with an address by the Rt. Rev. Charles D. Williams, Bishop of Michigan.

Reports were made of work done in the various cities, and details given of the different missionary projects which are being carried on in the county.

The meeting was an all day affair, arranged by the Archdeacon of the Detroit Archdeaconry, the Ven. H. K. Bartow.

I. C. J.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

New Cathedral School for Girls to Open in September.

The Hon. Edward Ivinson, of Laramie, has given to the Cathedral Chapter his residence property, consisting of one block beautifully parked with lawn, trees and shrubbery, a three-story stone mansion thereupon, and an enormous stone barn, for the use of the chapter, in launching what will be known as the Cathedral School for Girls.

The gift is valued at $100,000 and consists of the most handsome block in Laramie, but two squares removed from the Cathedral property.

In September, in Ivinson Hall, will be opened the Cathedral School for Girls, an institution affording an opportunity for the girls of Wyoming to obtain an education of the highest order, and be surrounded by a home atmosphere of culture and refinement. This will be made possible by utilizing the University State Training Preparatory School and the Laramie High School. The Cathedral School itself plans to teach "religion, manners and morals," and to provide a home in every sense of the word for the girls. Miss Laura Jay Wurts, of New York, has been secured as principal and has already arrived in Laramie to plan for the opening of the institution.

Mr. Ivinson went to Laramie before the railroad was built, and has remained there until the present day. He is now in his ninety-first year, and this gift is but another chapter in the record of his generous deeds. He has erected the towers and spire upon St. Matthew's Cathedral, in memory of his wife, Jane Ivinson. He has given to the Cathedral Home for Children a forty-acre tract lying just beyond the property recently purchased from the county commissioners. He has given to the Cathedral Home his one-half interest in a certain tract which was sold for $10,000. Judge John W. Meldrum, United States Commissioner at Yellowstone Park, the joint owner of this property, accepted but $4,000 as his share of the proceeds of the sale, and thus by the generosity of these big-hearted Wyoming men, the sum of $6,000 was realized for the Home. To the city of Laramie Mr. Ivinson has given the beautiful Ivinson Memorial Hospital.

The first meeting of the Executive Council, created at the last meeting of Convocation, was held in Laramie May 3 and 4. The Council considered in detail the work coming before it, and appointed certain standing committees. The following elections were made:

President, the Rt. Rev. N. S. Thomas, S. T. D.; Vice-President, Mr. D. P. B. Marshall, Sheridan; Secretary, the Rev. Charles A. Bennett, Cheyenne; Treasurer, Mr. J. H. Walton, Cheyenne.

Community Bible Class Organized: Under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A. a community Bible class has been organized in Cheyenne, directed by the Rev. Charles A. Bennett, rector of St. Mark's Church. An introductory study of the Bible is being made from the standpoint of modern criticism. People of all churches have enrolled, and an unusual and most gratifying interest is manifested by the attendance and discussions.

Memorial to the Rev. Dr. Rafter: St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, is planning the completion of the tower of the church, as a memorial to the late rector-emeritus, the Rev. Dr. George O. Rafter.

L. M. T.

Love is to be considered as a principle and as an emotion, or lively feeling. Both are desirable; but the former is the more solid, permanent and effective. The latter, without the former, soon burns out. A man has left his family, and is traveling to the far West, under a strong impression that he can find a settlement greatly to their advantage. Love, as a principle, carries him. A great distance on the way, at a post-office, he finds a letter from home. His feelings are excited in a strong manner, as he thinks of home. Love, as a mere emotion, would turn him back; but love, as a principle, determines him to go on; and putting up his letter, on he goes.—Dr. Andrew Broadus.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

RACE RIOTS.

The terrible news from Tulsa must have come as a horrible shock to many people who have no conception of the danger of such occurrences, and the consequent constant need for the use of every possible means of creating and maintaining right race relationship.

We have before now called attention to the need for energetic pursuance of the plan of organizing inter-racial committees in counties and cities to promote good feeling and try to remove the causes of friction and the trivial but irritating injustices which very often exist in the way of improper railroad accommodations, both on trains and at stations, unfair school expenditures, and sometimes unfairness in the courts.

There are good but ill informed people who contend that any danger from race feeling is over-estimated, and that these injustices are more imaginary than real.

The recent revelations of conditions on the Williams farm in Georgia, the statements of Governor Dorsey about conditions throughout his State, should convince these good people about the need for fairer treatment of the negro in the future and the iniquity of the present situation.

The still more recent tragedy at Tulsa shows how easily indiscreet management of a tense situation will precipitate a condition which takes martial law to rectify.

The only safe, sane and Christian thing to do is to recognize conditions as they exist, and do all in our power to correct them.

There is no cause which is more thoroughly one in which Church people should take an interest, for there is nothing more outstanding in the gospels than our Saviour's constant effort to break down race hatred.

We see it first of all in the interview with the Samaritan woman at Jacob's well, when He defied all the conventions of His day in speaking to a woman of the despised race, and in offering her of the water of life, so that His disciples "marvelled" when they returned from the village and found Him conversing with her.

Again, the parable of the Good Samaritan was a direct attack upon the hatred and contempt with which the Jews viewed the inhabitants of that adjoining section, and there can be no doubt that the Master deliberately selected the Samaritan to render the ministering offices to the wounded traveler to try to overcome the hostility that existed between the two races in His day.

So in doing all in our power to create better feeling between the races, we are not only doing our duty as American citizens, but are also taking up the burden given us by our Lord and Teacher and fulfilling our duties as His true followers.

FIGHTING A DANGEROUS EVIL.

A correspondent has sent us the following item:

"The Pastors' Association of Elk County and Ridgway, Pa., of which Archdeacon Radcliffe is president, by a unanimous vote, which included Monsignor M. Meagher, rector of St. Leo's Church, Ridgway, passed a resolution supporting District Attorney McFarland in his determination to prevent all games of chance and gambling by any so-called 'carnival' in the above town or county of Elk, and if possible to prevent such 'carnivals' from coming into our towns at all with all their miserable devices simply and only to get money."

We take pleasure in publishing this, because the traveling carnival has become one of the most demoralizing menaces to our towns and smaller cities.

We do not make this assertion in any spirit of narrowness, or with the desire or intention of frowning upon innocent forms of amusement.

There is no harm in the merry-go-round and ferris wheels which accompany these traveling shows, but the great variety of gambling devices and the large following of male tricksters, and female allurers who operate them, literally prey upon the smaller communities like wolves.

Not only do they invariably carry away with them many a hard earned dollar that should go to the support of a family, but frequently they make inroads upon the members of the family, and it is no uncommon thing for young men and women to abandon a life of decency and honest, and industrious, though perhaps arduous, effort for the excitement of "the road" which invariably leads to disgrace and debauchery.

So great has this menace to community morals become that it was given serious attention at a recent State conference of social workers, and plans for fighting it were discussed.

One proposition which we believe to be practicable was to promote the organization of local recreation companies which could purchase and operate the more wholesome amusement devices throughout the summer season. Besides this, to create so great a spirit of support for the local company, and antagonism to the traveling show, that is, town councils or other municipal governing bodies, that a prohibitive license tax will be laid upon the outside concern.

We believe that some such plan as this will be found more effective and more satisfactory than merely trying to drive out the traveling carnival without attempting to provide something better in its place.

Lectures and other interesting and instructive features could be added to the purely amusing and entertaining side of such a local organization.

In this way the Bible admonition to "overcome evil with good" would be carried out to the great advantage of the community.

A COURAGEOUS BISHOP.

Whether one agrees with Bishop Williams, of Michigan, or not, one cannot help admiring his courage in tendering his resignation to his Diocesan Convention.

According to a Detroit paper, the Bishop said:

"I have declared, I hope with reasonable clearness, my stand in the present crisis. It has not been done, let me assure you, without careful and prayerful consideration, nor yet without much distress of mind and heart. . . My own choice is made. I must abide by it. I cannot promise to refrain in the future from speaking as I have spoken in the past. . . . But I am not willing to embarrass the Diocese or hinder its work. Therefore, if at any time, in the judgment of the convention, the Diocese would be relieved and prospered by a change of leadership, my resignation as Bishop of Michigan will be put into your hands subject only to the canonically required judgment of the House of Bishops."

It is not often that Bishops voluntarily resign, and it is a fine thing to see a man so earnest and sincere in his convictions that he is willing to give up a post of honor and distinction rather than relinquish any part of them.

It is also good to read that the convention not only declined to accept his resignation, but included in the resolution the following declaration:

". . . This convention desires to go on record as standing unqualifiedly for the American right of free speech on the part of the Bishop and the clergy regardless of our respective individual points of view, believing with confidence in the ultimate power of the gospel of Christ and desiring only that that shall prevail in all the phases of our modern life."

Into the way of peace He alone can lead us. The gate, if straight, stands open wide. As we enter we realize that He is the door. Along it only Himself can guide us. The track, though narrow, will always be broad enough for Him and His servant to travel side by side. As we move further along it, all sense of the roughness and steepness will vanish as it is borne in upon us that He who guides is Himself also the way. And at the end of it awaits the last and greatest revelation and thrill of all, when He through Whom we entered, by Whom and in Whose company we have traveled, stands glorious and visible before us as Himself the goal!

Family Department

JUNE.

1. Wednesday.
5. Second Sunday after Trinity.
11. Saturday. S. Barnabas.
12. Third Sunday after Trinity.
19. Fourth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Friday. Nativity S. John Baptist.
26. Fifth Sunday after Trinity.
29. Wednesday. S. Peter.
30. Thursday.

COLLECT FOR ST. BARNABAS THE APOSTLE.

O Lord God Almighty, Who didst endue Thy holy Apostle Barnabas with singular gifts of the Holy Ghost; Leave us not, we beseech Thee, destitute of Thy manifold gifts, nor yet of grace to use them always to Thy honor and glory; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

COLLECT FOR THIRD SUNDAY AFTER TRINITY.

O Lord, we beseech Thy mercifully to hear us; and grant that we, to whom Thou has given an hearty desire to pray, may, by Thy mighty aid, be defended and comforted in all dangers and adversities; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For The Southern Churchman.

LONGING.

Jesse Jouitte.

I long to rest beside,
The living waters fair;
To put away all pride,
To cast away all care.

I long for heavenly lands
To follow Him fore'er;
Forgetting earth's demands,
Forgetting every fear.

And when I see His face,
Our Lord the Crucified;
Whate'er my humble place,
I shall be satisfied.

—Jouitte.

A Question of Sincerity.

"It surprises you, I see, to find me a church member and teaching a class in Sunday school," the older man said with the quizzical smile that the younger man remembered from the days of his clerkship at Hastings & Brandt's. "Well, sometimes I'm surprised myself. Ten years ago I thought I had settled this religion question once for all, and settled it right.

"I never told you that I was brought up in a Christian home and had a praying mother. I didn't like to think about or talk about it at that time, for I used to have a twinge of conscience when I thought how grieved father and mother would be if they knew that I had cut loose from the beliefs that meant so much to them.

"My unbelief started with the people who didn't appear to me to be living up to their Christian professions. It wasn't the badness of these people that impressed me, but the lack of anything real in their lives. It looked to me like a game they were playing out because their fathers had played it. Finally I just dismissed the whole subject as an outworn tradition and believed that I was acting upon my sincere convictions.

"Here is where Ben Luther comes in I hired him to do odd jobs round the store. He was a stranger to me, and, beyond his own statement that he was an orphan, with no near relatives, I knew nothing of him or his family. Later a rumor drifted in from somewhere that Ben's father had been under arrest once for mishandling money, and I suppose that made me think of Ben when our cash drawer counted short.

"After that had happened two or three times, and a marked bill was missing, I went up to Ben's boarding place one afternoon and got permission of his landlady to search his room. I didn't intend to make a public example of the boy, and there was a bare chance I might find something that would satisfy my own mind.

"I did. It was a small, much-worn pocket Bible, lying open at a chapter marked by a turned-down leaf. The mark had been made years before, for the thin paper was cracking, and it came to me like a flash that it was his mother's Bible, that her fingers had marked the place.

"I don't know that I ever made a discovery that affected me as that one did. I went out of the room and made the landlady promise never to mention my visit. What I had seen would be worthless as evidence in any court, but I dismissed my suspicions on the strength of it, and later disclosures proved that I did right.

"Strangest of all, the incident forced me to question my own sincerity. Had I found an open book of history or fiction or poetry in Ben's room, I should have gone on with my search. Why was finding an open Bible different? Why was it different to me, who professed to have no special reverence for the Bible? Why should I judge the probable character of a stranger by the fact that he read, or did not read, a discredited book?

"That was the beginning. I decided that I wasn't really sincere in my skepticism, and I set out to make myself an honest man. I didn't believe it would carry me so far as this, but it has."—Youth's Companion.

LITTLE PRAYERS.

I like to think God answers little prayers—
The little words we breathe upon the way—
That we are led in every little step,
Led all the livelong day.

Along the road so many paths there are
Toward goals we will to reach and seek to find.
How could we ever, ever trace them out
Alone—alone and blind?

Though we some longed-for tinsel may not reach.
Some hand may miss that touched our own and passed,
We can be sure there is a reason why
That we shall know at last.

We may be sure our little prayers are heard,
Although the answers dim our eyes with tears;
If in His hand our own can lie at rest,
There is no place for fears.

—Selected.—

For the Southern Churchman.

An Ideal Home Nurse.

Eugenie du Maurier.

The requisites of an ideal home nurse consist not only of a cheery, happy disposition, nicely-prepared meals, the giving of medicines at regular intervals and the keeping of a cleanly abode for the sick one, but of all of the abovementioned virtues plus the natural or trained ability and aptitude for the occupation of mind, body and hands of the invalid.

A nurse's enthusiastic confidence in a method of treatment always brings a measure of success. Every home nurse can recall occasions where her method was entirely subordinate to her enthusiastic confidence in it. Suitable occupation is a most valuable agent in the treatment of the sick. Sometimes it is quite all the treatment necessary. The psychology of work for sick or well people is an important subject. It is not necessary for a home nurse to be a psychologist to be able to prescribe for the member of the family whose physical, nervous, mental and moral characteristics she knows from daily contact therewith, or which she has made the object of keen observation and study.

Not only must the nervous and physical strength be carefully estimated, but the temperament, natural tastes and disposition have to be taken into account in the kind and amount of occupation suggested, as well as in the manner and place in which it is presented.

The elimination from a sick person's mind of the idea of "prescription" or "remedy" in connection with some work is doubtless much to be desired.

Wholesome interests can be substituted for morbid ones, and gradually the attention be shifted to and absorbed by new lines of thought aroused, so that, instead of being a medicine that can be dropped when the invalid is no longer ill, it has become rather a part of the restored individual's life, to be retained in some form. Such a cure means a change in the mental attitude toward life. Wholesome interests are roused. A conscious poise and control in the use of one's strength for the accomplishment of work makes the task a pleasure.

The personality of a nurse is an important factor. Her real enthusiasm and love for her work react most powerfully on the patient. The daily support of a cheerful, patient, orderly nurse, the development of a common interest in the restoring of health to the invalid, a judicious arrangement of the times and seasons, and resourcefulness are among the desired requirements for success

Loss of interest in all kinds of activity and a loss of power of initiative as well as a loss of interest in life itself, are frequently symptoms of invalidism. It is a part of a nurse's problem to arouse and foster interest and fan the flame into real enthusiasm. It is also her task to prevent a patient from overdoing when his interest in returning health or the occupation that has whiled away many a weary, painful hour develops faster than his strength. Tact and care are needed to keep the patient within his limitations without discouragement. Nothing can be more destructive of the patient's ambition than to be left to a monotonous succession of days and weeks for something new to happen.

The value of wise human sympathy, of cheerfulness in word and mien, of tactful dealing with unreasonableness and irritability, of skillful diversion of thought from pessimistic channels, and many other desirable qualifications are essential parts of an ideal home nurse's equipment for her work.

Birds On the Battlefield.

Our fathers used to tell us touching stories of the distress of the birds caused by the continual marching of great armies, till the poor creatures would fall upon the ground at their feet from pure exhaustion of wing in trying to fly away from the danger. Then there was that most impressive of all facts—the singing of the birds during the raging of all-day-long battles. During the prolonged fighting at Gettysburg there came a moment when not a gun was heard to sound. There was a terrible stillness for one brief spell; then it was noticed that the birds perched upon the treetops were busily pouring forth their melody of music, and so far as any one had known, they had been singing all during the deafening roar of the cannon-fire. This seemed incredible at first, but here comes another witness from the awful battlefield of Europe. The account is given by Major Allen Brooks, who writes directly from the battlefield in Flanders. He was so startled by the anomaly that he lapsed into a "striking Hibernicism to express his wonders": "The effect of cannon fire on birds is amazing; almost without exception they absolutely disregard it." Oddly enough, the first birds to attract his attention were the symbols of peace. Wood pigeons and turtle doves are abundant everywhere along the firing line, while thrushes, blackbirds and larks are fairly common. In early spring these birds begin to sing in the trees that line the Yser. "On a sudden, hundreds of guns burst into a terrific and continuous cannonading, when, after three hours, there was a sudden and complete cessation of gun-fire, and the first thing that the reeling senses realized was that the blackbirds were still serenely fluting away. Apparently they had never ceased."

On another occasion Major Brooks was listening to the rich gurgling and chuckling of a nightingale which he had located with his glasses when the morning calm was shattered by a burst of rifle-fire close by. The retiring and seclusive bird paid no attention, nor did he seek a lower or less conspicuous perch. An unruffled cuckoo called continuously on a nearby willow, and crested larks rose, one after another, sometimes from the close vicinity of bursting shells, singing serenely in the azure as if there were nothing to mar the perfect day. The only bird perturbed was a green sandpiper, which was picking up a precarious living in the stagnant waters of a shell crater. "When shells burst too close to him, he sprang into the air and circled about; but he always returned a minute later, defying the dangers and the noise."—Christian Advocate.

CREDO.

Not what, but WHOM, I do believe,
That, in my darkest hour of need,
Hath comfort that no mortal creed
To mortal man can give;—
Not what, but WHOM!
For Christ is more than all the creeds,
And His full life of gentle deeds
Shall all the creeds outive.
Not what I do believe, but WHOM!
WHO walks beside me in the gloom!
WHO shares the burden wearisome?
Who all the dim way doth illume,
And bids me look beyond the tomb
The larger life to live?—
Not what I do believe,
BUT WHOM!

—John Oxenham.

"Stop! Look! Listen!"

"What in the world is that?" inquired Beatrice, stopping in the doorway of the library and pointing a dainty forefinger at a little signboard that, in somewhat shaky letters, requested the passerby to "Stop, Look and Listen."

"That?" said her mother, looking up placidly from the bit of sewing in her hands. "Oh, that is a little memento of Bobby and Peggy and their games this morning. They were playing railroad, and one of the crossings happened to be by that fireside chair."

"Well, really they ought to be taught to put away their things when they finish playing. What if any one came in! Well, I suppose I'll have to put it away myself."

Beatrice moved pettishly across the floor, but Mrs. Marston held up a prohibitive hand. "No, my dear," she said, "that won't be necessary. I don't mind having it left here for a little while."

Beatrice stared. "Leave it, mother? Why, what for?"

"Oh, just to have one or two persons look at it." Mrs. Marston had resumed her placid sewing. "Perhaps you can guess who, Beatrice."

Beatrice's lips puckered in a little round "O" of understanding. "Why, yes. Tom, of course. Indeed, I wish he would 'stop. look and listen' before he plunges in here. Why, just yesterday, when I was serving tea to Tessie Walmsley, in rushed Tom like a great collie dog, throwing muddy snow and books and hockey sticks right and left; and he mortified me nearly to death!"

"You don't think of anybody else?"

"We-ell. I don't know. Of course, Bob and Peggy. If they would live up to that a little more, they wouldn't be always tumbling round and getting hurt the way they do."

Mrs. Marston finished her seam and began to fold a hem. "Any one else?" she inquired with the same calm manner.

This time Beatrice giggled. "Well, really, since you press me, mother," she said. "If we could have it in the dining-room where father could see it before he starts on one of his interminable stories when we have guests—"

She stopped abruptly at the look in her mother's eyes. "Well, really, mother," she said in a halfway apologetic tone, "you asked me if there was any one else—and father was all I could think of."

"It didn't occur to you, did it, dear, to 'stop' for a minute and 'look' at yourself? Well, then, I must do it for you. The fault that this little sign called at once to my mind is one of yours, Beatrice. You pride yourself upon your manners, my dear, and you have reason—they are very pretty, in most ways. But I wonder if you realize how very difficult it is for an older member of your family to hold your attention. 'Oh, yes, mother!' you say quickly when I ask you to do an errand; and away you fly before I know whether you understand what I want or not—and many times you do not.

"Oh, 'Yes, father, I'm listening,' you say, without even looking up from your book—and then you give a queer, wandering answer that shows you haven't listened at all.

"And when your grandmother calls you to her door you never have time to go in and sit down in the leisurely way that old people love. It's always:

"'Oh, good morning, grandma! I hope you feel better. Did you want anything special? Mary is waiting downstairs.'

"You are gone before poor grandma has even had time to catch her breath. One of the first laws of courtesy, my dear, is to behave as if your time were, for the moment at least, at the full disposal of the person who asks for it—particularly if she is older than you. That was the message I hoped the little sign might bring you:

"STOP—quietly and absolutely until you know what is wanted of you.

"LOOK—straight at the person who is talking to you and give your full attention.

"LISTEN—quietly and courteously until you know just what he wants, and then answer intelligently."

Beatrice ran across the room and dropped penitently by her mother's chair. "But most of all," she said, "Stop, Beatrice, and look at your own faults before you make anybody else listen to your criticisms of other people."

Prayer of a Lonely Woman.

All day I have looked at the multitude, and no eye met mine in understanding, no life touched mine in help, no hand clasped mine in fellowship. In a thousand companions I have felt no companionship. A myriad hearts go by, but none stop to beat in time with my heart. I am hungry for friendship, starved for human cheer. I come to Thee, here solitary in my little room in its pitiful stillness, and I come not with vain request for things; I do not ask Thee for spiritual ecstasies; I come for comradeship, to feel that some One is living on with me, though in silence. Some people are so rich in fellowship, their days are feasts of friends. O God, I ask but the crumbs of human feeling that fall from their table. Thou Who guidest souls through the chartless sea of human life, steer some woman's soul my way, bring me the cheering convoy of honest men, and let little children find me. Keep me wise and prudent, that no pirate in the seas of love may deceive me. Infinite great Spirit, reveal Thyself to me as a Friend, and the maker of friends.—Daily Bible.

A Thought for the Month.

"I am among you as he that serveth."

What will inspire a man most will carry him most buoyantly through a long life of labor, making the last years more eager and exhilarating than the first, the joy of ruling men or the joy or serving men? He little knows what human nature is who hesitates about his answer. You may, indeed, feel the identity between the two. You may see how each, realized at the fullest, becomes the other; how he who rules men most wisely serves men most efficiently, rules them most powerfully; but taking them in their ordinary distinction from each other, it is a nobler relation to a man to serve him than to rule him. Rulership stifles and hardens the nature which it deals with. Servantship opens and softens it. Rulership is unsympathetic. Servantship is full of sympathy. Rulership is monotonous and works by law. Servantship is ingenious and various and free. Rulership is self-conscious. Servantship is self-forgetful. The ruler grows tired of his throne. The servant sees his working-room always alive with desire and need.—Phillips Brooks.

The kingdom of God belongs to the children. Woe to us if we take from them what is theirs! Woe to us if we create in the minds of the children the old temper of enmity, lying, arrogance and vanity! Let us help one another to educate the children in school and home for the kingdom of peace and truth. Let us help one another to train the children simply to be men and women, glad and free, honorable and courageous.—Selected.

For the Young Folks

THE SHEPHERD'S PSALM.

The Lord's my Shepherd and 'tis He,—
  That makes me down to lie,—
In pastures green, and leadeth me,—
  The quiet waters by

My soul He doeth restore again,
  And me to walk doeth make,—
In paths of righteousness so plain,
  E'en for His own name sake.

Yea though I walk where death hath trod,
  Yet will I fear no ill,
For Thou art with me and Thy rod,—
  And staff comfort me still.

My table Thou hast furnished,—
  In presence of my foes,
With oil Thou dost anoint my head,
  And my cup overflows.

Goodness and mercy all my days,—
  Shall surely follow me,
And in my Father's house always,—
  My dwelling-place shall be.

—Selected.

The Story of David Livingstone.

A little more than a hundred years ago, in a very poor home in Scotland, there was born a baby boy, who came to be known and loved all over the world because he taught us to know the great and dark continent of Africa. His name was David Livingstone—and his name will never die. Now because they were so poor, David's parents could not give him the education that they would have liked, and at the age of ten we find this boy who was to become so great, not in school, but hard at work in a cotton factory. But we have learned that "where there is a will, there is a way," and young David willed to learn. He managed to secure some books like the ones the other boys were studying in school, and by fastening a book over his loom and taking an occasional glance at it as he worked, he was able to learn. He also studied at night, and are you surprised to know that by the time he was twenty-three years old he had prepared himself for college?

Now, David's mother and father were good Christian people, and had trained his spirit as well as he had managed to train his mind, so we are not surprised to learn that he wanted very much to become a medical missionary. His face was set toward China, and he might have gone there if, just at this time, a great missionary named Robert Moffat, who had been working on the coast of Africa, had not come home, telling of the people in that great land and of how much they needed Christ. In an address Robert Moffat said: "I have often stood at sunset time on a certain hill near my home and seen the smoke of a thousand villages where no missionary of Christ has ever been." As he said these words a young man in the audience began to picture himself visiting those thousand villages, and he said, "I'm going." And he did.

He went out to Africa and helped many people in those villages to love their heavenly Father and to understand the new religion, which was so different from their old one. How different they became. After that the black people were taught to read, and they learned parts of the Bible by heart as they dug in their tiny gardens or fished in their hollowed-out tree trunk canoes. Their lives grew gentler and their fears grew less. The savages who could not read watched their Christian neighbors with surprise, and when they saw nicer homes (very clean) and really, truly clothes, they shook their poor, puzzled heads, saying, "It is strange medicine on those leaves!" They even liked to smell the Bible, and thought the leather binding in damp weather was simply delightful! Some were afraid to open the covers of the Bible for fear some of the magic medicine might blow off the leaves.

Now David Livingstone's motto had always been, "Anywhere—so it is Forward," so he began to study the map and push out, looking for the best places to open missionary work. He started out on a trip of exploration and found so many rivers, lakes and other things that no one had known of before that the result was the making of a new map of Africa. In Central Africa he found many tribes living in darkest heathenism, distrusting all white men, for up to this time the only white men they had seen were the cruel slave-traders who had come and driven away their friends and families. Believing that the only way he could really help these people was by finding a way to the western coast, so that missionaries and traders could come in to them, he undertook this task. It was a long, long way through jungles, swamps and streams, tortured by fevers and by the many creatures, large and small, that inhabit the jungle. When he reached the coast, tired, sick and worn there was a ship ready to sail for England. He was urged to get on board and go home for the rest he so much deserved, but he refused. Why? Because he had promised the simple-hearted natives who had come with him on the long journey that he would see them safely back over the three thousand miles to their homes—and he did.

In later years, when he was on another exploring trip, his third one, he was not able to send word to his friends for many months, and many of them believed him to be dead. A great New York paper sent out a man, Henry Stanley, to find him and to carry to him funds and supplies. After some months Stanley succeeded in finding Livingstone, and an angel from heaven could not have been more welcome than was Stanley. News, letters, provisions, medicine and, most of all, companionship was wonderful for him who had not seen a white face in two years.

Stanley told him of all the things that had happened since he left civilization, of how the world was seeking to give him honor, and begged him to return with him. Livingstone steadfastly refused and continued his task. A little more than a year before his death Livingstone prayed, "My Jesus, my King, my Life, my All, I again dedicate my whole life to Thee. Accept me and grant, O gracious Father, that ere this year is gone I may finish my task. In Jesus' name I ask it. Amen. So let it be."

He was not allowed to complete his task, for one morning his native friends, coming into his hut, found him dead on his knees by his rude bed. "The great master is dead," they said. "We must bear his body to the coast, that the white chief may be buried among his own people." First they buried his heart there in the land for which he had given his life and then they started on their long journey. Nine months later, after having come through the land of hostile tribes, they suddenly appeared one morning before the door of the mission house in Zanzibar and said: "We have brought the man of God to be buried among his own people." The body found its last resting place in famous Westminster Abbey in London, among kings, nobles and the greatest men of the world. One of the guards of Westminster, when asked whose grave of all those buried there is most frequently visited, said: "Without a doubt, that of David Livingstone."—The King's Builders.

HIGH AND LOW.

A Boot and a Shoe and a Slipper
Lived once in the Cobbler's row;
  But the Boot and the Shoe
  Would have nothing to do
With the Slipper, because she was low.

But the king and the queen and their daughter
On the Cobbler chanced to call;
  And as neither the Boot
  Nor the Shoe would suit.
The Slipper went off to the ball.

—John B. Tabb.

"Snuffer."

"Snuffer" always did one of two things when I picked him up: he snuffed and made a funny little noise in his throat that sounded as though his heart was thumping very hard against his ribs; or he rolled up like a big brown chestnut-bur. He cuddled up and looked like a bur because he was a hedgehog. Now don't contradict me and say you don't believe it because hedgehogs don't roll up like chestnut-burs, for they do; that is to say, mine do. If yours don't, it is because you live in a section of the country where porcupines are erroneously called hedgehogs. So you see, according to our different ways of thinking, we are both right, but I am "righter," because there are no hedgehogs in America.

Snuffer, my hedgehog, lived in Europe, where all hedgehogs live; that is, all but those that live in Asia or Africa. The particular part of Europe where he lived was in Sweden, near Upsala.

He and I met one evening just as it was getting dark, which is the right time to meet hedgehogs. I had just finished my supper and would soon go to bed, and he had just waked up and was going out after his breakfast. So you see that while I was sleeping, he was awake; and while he was sleeping, I was awake. That's why we never met in the daytime.

Snuffer probably knew where he could get a meal of mice, bugs and berries—in the grass, in the fields, or along some hedgerow. That must have been what he was after when we met. We were both somewhat surprised, and for a few seconds stood looking at each other. Then Snuffer turned and ran. But his little legs were so much shorter than mine that I overtook and picked him up; whereupon he rolled up into a ball, his prickers standing out like those on a chestnut-bur, as I have said.

You see, Dame Nature had given him such short legs that no matter how fast he tried to work them, any animal could catch him.

"Now see what you've done!" said Snuffer to Dame Nature when he discovered his dilemma. "You've ruined my prospects for a long life. I've no means of protecting myself. The first hungry animal that comes along will make a meal of me."

"Well, w-e-l-l!" replied Dame Nature; "so I have! How stupid of me! Usually I am very careful about that. Don't worry, though; I'll fix it all right. It isn't too late yet. I've made so many sharp-toothed and sharp, long-clawed animals and so many swift-footed creatures that can either fight or flee from enemies, that this time I just think I will make you so you won't have to do either."

"That sounds all right," said Snuffer, "but how are you going to do it?"

Dame Nature didn't say a word. She began placing spines all over Snuffer's back, on the crown of his head and on his sides. When she was through, Snuffer looked like a military hair-brush lying on its back.

"There you are!" she said, as she stepped back and looked him over. "Now when any animal comes after you, don't run. Just stop right still, roll up like a ball, and those spines will stick out in all directions and prick so hard that no one will dare to touch you."

Well, sir! I gingerly picked him up, for his prickers were not so sharp unless I squeezed him, and I took care not to do that; the fact is, I handled him just as you would a chestnut-bur. I turned him around and he looked the same all over. Where had he gone? I could find no hole or sign of a hole where he had disappeared, yet when I first saw him I was sure that he had four legs and a little head; but where were they now?

For some time I held him very still in my hand, and then his prickers began to move just like the hair on a cat's back when she stands on her toes, arches her body, and begins to stretch, and you think she is going to "boil over." Then I saw a little hole begin to open up in the center of the bur and a little nose appeared, and then two little black eyes peeped out at me. Gradually the hole grew larger and larger until his whole face and a pair of big ears were exposed and a broad, stubby, whitish tail touched the end of his nose. There he lay in my hand, blinking at me and ready to close up like a clam should I make a move.

I took Snuffer to my room and placed him on the floor, where he lay for some time before he began to unroll again. I went about my business and finally again saw him peeking at me from the little opening. He watched me until he was thoroughly satisfied that I meant him no harm, and then he uncurled entirely and ran about the room.

I kept Snuffer in my room for about a week, and he proved to be a very funny and interesting little pet. It was not long before I discovered how he managed to coil up so tightly whenever he was scared. When he grew so tame that he did not mind being handled, I put a finger under him and tickled his little "tummy." When he closed upon it I could feel a broad band of strong muscles. It ran over his head and completely surrounded his body at a point where the spines on his back and side united with the hair on his under parts. This acted just like a puckering-string at the mouth of a bag.

Whenever he wanted to become a chestnut-bur he tucked his head under his chest, arched his back, pulled the muscles tight, and there he was—as snug as a bug in a rug.

Snuffer grew so tame that I could call him from across the room by tapping on the floor with my fingers; and when he came up and found that I did not have any food for him he showed his displeasure by sniffing and butting sidewise against my hand with his spines. I fed him bread, boiled potatoes and mice. He didn't seem to care much for the bread and potatoes, but he was very fond of mice. He ate slowly and kept gritting his teeth most of the time. I remember that it once took him sixteen and a half minutes to eat a half-grown mouse—maybe because he chewed his food very fine before swallowing it.

From time to time he would shake himself, and his bristles would rattle against each other. Once I put him on the couch. He didn't seem to like that, for every time that he came to the side he would flatten out and peep over the edge as though he were afraid of falling.

He was most active at night, and whenever I awoke I could hear the patter, patter, patter of his feet on the carpet. He soon got so that he would not coil up when I handled him, but he always tried, by squatting close to the floor and sniffing, to prevent me from putting my hand under him. Sniffing seemed to be his way of saying don't.

One night he in some manner managed to climb up on my bed, and awoke me by butting against my cheek and sniffing. He slept on his side, partly curled up like a dog. Whenever I shut the door or made any sudden noise, he would jump nervously, and at the first sign of real danger he threw up his spines and ducked his head, ready to pull the "pucker-string." Several times he bit my fingers, but it was never more than a hard pinch.

One evening I knocked from the table and broke a glass candlestick, and after I had gone to bed I heard Snuffer rolling one of the pieces about the floor. At another time he tipped over on its side a bowl of drinking water, and, putting his nose against the side, rolled it about the room for a few seconds. Then he ran away, but soon returned and repeated his play several times with evident delight.

When I left Upsala I wanted to take my little pet with me, but I finally decided to give him his liberty; so I carried him back to the spot where we first met and placed him on the ground. The last I saw of him he was trudging off down a lane toward a dense thicket, carrying with him his load of spines.—J. Alden Loring, in St. Nicholas.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER

Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING

2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Gold, Silver and Brass

Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue

for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.

08 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

112 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, De-soto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

"RESTMORE," MONTROSE, PA. 2,000 feet altitude. Large shady lawn; no mosquitoes. Home table. Terms $18 and up. Leaflet.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—A REFINED AND CAPABLE Churchwoman with small capital to join a lady in an established "apartment house business" in Miami, Fla. Highest references given and required. Address "M. C.," care of Southern Churchman.

SITUATION WANTED.

ORGANIST.

ENERGETIC ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, married, churchman, cathedral training; great experience leading large choirs, recitalist, wishes permanent position with good field for teaching. Address "Progressive," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

CLERGYMAN DESIRES PARISH IN town or country; is a Southerner; earnworkers; small family; good visitor. Address "K. J.," care Southern Churchman.

WANTED—BY A CLERGYMAN, A SMALL parish. Correspondence solicited. Address "Presbyter," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A TRAINED NURSE WISHES a position to care for an invalid through the summer, either in the country or to travel. Address "Miss R. N," 519 Penn. Ave., Norfolk, Va.

A REFINED LADY WISHES A POSITION a matron in a college, or school; to enter fall session. Address "G," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—POSITION AS MOTHER'S helper, or assistant in home. Address "E. A. P.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant principal or matron in a school, or some position of trust in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

West: Entered into rest eternal at midnight, Sunday, May 29, 1921, at her home, Elizabethtown, N. C., ELIZABETH DEBORAH WEST, wife of Abner Whitney West.

Dennis: Entered into life eternal June 1, 1921, at home, near Franktown, Va., SALLIE JACOB DENNIS, widow of Arthur E. Dennis, and daughter of the late George W. and Sallie Mapp Jacob. One son, Henry E. Dennis, survives. Interment in Hungars P. E. Church yard.

ROSE ELLZEY McCORMICK.

Entered into life eternal at her home, "Frankford," May 21, ROSE ELLZEY McCORMICK, only daughter of Nannie F. McCormick and the late Thomas M. McCormick. She is survived by one brother, Frank McCormick. She went forth as the sun had set, surrounded by those who loved her.

The passing of this lovely character and child of God has brought sorrow to those who loved her, and stricken the heart of her dear mother, for the bond of love between the mother and daughter was unusually strong. She was a sincere and beautiful Christian, and in her conscientious discharge of her religious duties she found her highest pleasure. The hymn she loved so well was applicable:

"Faint not nor fear, His arms are near,
He changeth not, and thou art dear:
Only believe, and thou shalt see
That Christ is all in all to thee."

After the services at Grace Church, Berryville, Va., she was laid to rest in Green Hill Cemetery, and many of those to whom she had endeared herself gathered to pay their last tribute of love.

From far and near have come letters bearing the tributes of the love and appreciation of those who knew her best, and voicing with one accord the feeling that "Frankford" will never be the same without her sweet welcome.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

R. R.

HENRY BUDD.

The Board of Trustees of Burlington College, assembled in its annual meeting on May 23d, at St. Mary's Hall, Burlington, N. J., desire to put on record its deep sense of the loss it has sustained by the death of its late member, HENRY BUDD.

For many years a trustee of St. Mary's Hall, he performed his duties faithfully and zealously, with enthusiasm for education, thorough Churchmanship, high legal ability and a well stored mind. It was his custom to periodically visit the classes of the school and acquaint himself with the methods of teaching. He delivered a series of lectures to the pupils and teachers on literary and historical subjects, which were afterwards published in a volume entitled "St. Mary's Hall Lectures." His interest in the school and everything that pertained to it was kept up to the end of his life.

The Board of Trustees directs that this record of Mr. Budd's services be spread upon its minutes, and a copy be sent to the surviving members of his family and to the Church papers.

BAYARD STOCKTON,
WM. D'OLIER,
Committee.

RESOLUTION OF RESPECT TO REV. HARRY B. LEE.

Resolved, that the congregation of the Church of Our Saviour, at Rio, have heard with sorrow and deep regret of the death of their friend and former rector, the REV. H. B. LEE they wish to give expression to their great affection for him, and sincere appreciation of all that he did in the founding and developing of the little church at Rio. His memory will long be held in grateful remembrance.

They devoutly thank Almighty God for the good example of His servant, who, having finished his course in faith, now rests from his labors.

They wish to extend to his family their loving sympathy in their great loss, realizing, however, that death is his gain, and the manner of it like unto a great victory.

In behalf of the congregation.

HENRY C. COLES, Treasurer.

A TRIBUTE TO REV. H. B. LEE, D. D.

The Woman's Auxiliary of Calvary and All Saints', Mitchells, Va., met on June 2 in the church whose pastor has so suddenly and swiftly "passed into the heavens," to put on record their sense of the loss his death has brought to his flock, to his friends, to the community he served with such ready will, and, above all, to the church which can ill afford, in this crucial time to spare one of her most faithful sons. The inevitable human protest against the untimely departure of so valiant a soldier of the cross presents itself to our hearts and minds, but we can safely trust God's servant and His work in the keeping of Him Whose will is wisdom and love.

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H. T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either

138 Fulton Street, New York City or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

Personal Notes

The Rev. Malcolm S. Taylor, rector of Grace Church, Berryville, Va., has accepted a call to become rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Danville, Va., in succession to the Rev. J. Cleveland Hall, D. D., who retired some time ago, and is now rector-emeritus. Mr. Taylor expects to take charge in September.

The Rev. Frank A. Juhan has declined a call to St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tenn., and will remain at Christ Church, Greenville, S. C., where he has been rector for the past five years.

The Rev. Francis H. Craighill, missionary to the counties around Wytheville, Va., and formerly rector of St. John's Church, that city, has accepted a call to become rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Rocky Mount, N. C. Mr. Craighill has been the Secretary of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia since its formation.

The Rev. Edmund S. Middleton, D. D., has removed from Dallas, Tex., and may be addressed at 605 Irving Avenue, Syracuse, N. Y.

After thirteen years' continuous pastoral work in the Diocese of Bethlehem, the Rev. Wallace Martin, rector of St. Paul's Church, Montrose, has accepted his election to the Church of the Redeemer, Charleston, S. C., with charge of the seamen's work in that port.

The address of the Rv. Dr. John H. Feringa is now St. Thomas' House, 229 East Fifty-ninth Street, New York City.

After July 1 the address of the Rev. Phillips S. Gilman, rector of St. Paul's Church, Winston-Salem, N. C., who has accepted a call to St. Ann's Church, Nashville, Tenn., will be 421 Woodland Street.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

The Rev. Lee L. Rose, of Calvary Church, Tarboro, N. C., will take charge of Elmira Heights and Horseheads, N. Y., on September 1.

The president of St. Stephen's College, Annandale-on-Hudson, the Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, will spend the summer in Europe conducting an investigation for the World Student Federation into the physical condition and morale of the scholars and students of Central Europe. President Bell expects to bring back such information as will enable this work to be carried on next year more efficiently and with greater intelligence than it has been possible this year.

Beginning the day after Memorial Day and continuing through Saturday, the Rev. William Wilkinson, the "Wall Street preacher," preached every day at the noon service in Wall Street a sermon on Disarmament. The congregations were very large and the interest in the sermons widespread.

Ordinations.

Mr. Van Tassel Sutphen, who has long been a very faithful worker in the Sunday school at St. Peter's, Morristown, N. J., and in many parochial ways, was ordained to the diaconate on the last Sunday in May by Bishop Stearly, the sermon being preached by the former rector of St. Peter's, the Rev. P. F. Sturges. His work as a deacon will continue in his own parish.

In St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, Idaho, on Trinity Sunday, Mr. Basil C. d'Easum was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Touret. He was presented by the Rev. Thomas Ashworth, who also preached. In the chancel were also the Rev. Charles MacLean and the Rev. W. R. R. Simmons. Mr. d'Easum will have charge of two missions, one at Rupert and the other at Burley.

In Trinity Church, Columbus, O., on May 3, the Rev. James P. Attridge was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Reese. The rector, the Rev. E. F. Chauncey, preached the sermon, and the candidate was presented by his brother, the Rev. Thomas W. Attridge. Archdeacon Dodshon read the Litany.

On Trinity Sunday, in Trinity Church, Lincoln, Ill., Bishop Sherwood ordained to the diaconate Mr. Leo Gay McAfee. The sermon was preached by the Rev. John Mitchel Page. The candidate was presented by Archdeacon John Chanler White. Mr. McAfee, who was graduated from the Western Theological Seminary, Chicago, on Thursday, May 19, expects to leave in September for the Philippines.

Following the Example of Christ.

St. Peter uses an illustration, the full force of which is lost in English. He says, "Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example." But the word for example means a copy in a copy book which the beginner must trace over in ink and imitate. With shaky and unaccustomed and cramped fingers the child tries to learn to write. His first efforts are very far from perfect. The line which he tries to trace may be straight in the copy, but his effort is crooked and the pen will go off the track, and when the page is finished it is blotted and blurred perhaps with tears, and smudged with ink, and is not very like the original. But he tried very hard, and by daily endeavor he learns to make a fair copy.

So in our imitation of Jesus we are like children learning to write, and day after day we are tracing our records on the copy book of life. Each day we have a fresh page often just like that of yesterday, and yet we fail to produce anything that is like the original. Only we must keep on, for some day we shall graduate from the day school of life and win our entrance to the High School of Heaven, not by examination, but on the recommendation of our Great Teacher, Who has promised to take us in.

The gospel provides another illustration. In the East the Shepherd leads His flock, and makes use of the well-known instinct of sheep which is to follow exactly the movements of the leader.

But we are the sheep of Christ's pasture. He has gone before and we are to follow in His steps. He knows whither He is going, where are the green pastures, and the fountains of waters and the refreshing shade, and where the lion or the wolf are lurking, and if we follow Him He will do all that is needed, and not one of His sheep shall be lost.

But if one goes astray He will go after it till He finds it and bring it home. No sacrifice too great, no danger too terrible, no precipices too inaccessible for Him to climb in order to rescue His sheep. No thought of earthly gain, no hireling spirit is found in Him. He knows each one by name, and they each know His voice and follow Him. Such must be our individual relation to Him Who is the Good Shepherd, Who gave His life for the sheep. —Canadian Churchman.

Time Enough.

Says a wise proverb, "Time enough is little enough." I suppose there is always time enough to do the things that God requires. God is never a taskmaster. He never lays upon us unreasonable demands: every divine requirement is rooted in fairness. 'Tis our fellows who confuse us with commandments. There is always time enough to do the thing which God requires—if only we can be sure what His asking is. Sometimes the thing He asks looks smaller than the thing we want to do. Sometimes His errand seems an interruption of an important program. Sometimes the face in which He comes to us is forbidden or unwelcome. Often we are so obsessed with the imperativeness of the programs we have built for ourselves: we cannot raise our eyes to meet the look of a more important duty. We are too busy as we say: we have no time. But there is always time—plenty of time—for the thing which God requires.—George Clarke Peck.

It is often difficult to know just how to frame a program which separated groups of Christians can accept, but the way to prayer is always open. Sometimes no definite way of action can be suggested, but the way to the throne of grace is never blocked. Even though we may not be able to pray in the same phrases, it is always possible for all Christians of every name to be silent before God, and to know that He is their Maker and Redeemer.—Charles E. Jefferson.

Do not be troubled because you have no great virtues. God made a million spears of grass where He made one tree. The earth is fringed and carpeted not with forests, but with grasses. Only have enough of the little virtues and common fidelities, and you need not mourn because you are neither a hero or a saint.—H. W. Beecher.

Reasons for Being Honest.

The fact that God spoke these words and said, "Thou shalt not bear false witness," should be a sufficient reason for our obeying without asking why. Sometimes, however, a child obeys more willingly if he knows why he is commanded, and we believe that there are reasons back of every one of God's commands.

Why, for instance, should we be honest Is it because society finds honesty a convenient thing and has decided to frown upon any one who may hold a contrary view; or is it that we wish to live up to our part of the Golden Rule in order that others will deal fairly with us? There may be good and sufficient reasons for being truthful, but still they do not prove that honesty is a virtue.

After all, what is honesty? Webster defines it as "An upright disposition; moral rectitude of heart." Hence, we can say it is one of the foundation stones of character. But we can go even further; for honesty has a peculiar bearing upon integrity, which, in turn, is not only the foundation of character, but the whole structure. Integrity is often confounded with honesty, but the two words have not the same meaning. Integrity, to quote Noah again, is: "Wholeness; entireness; (the) unbroken state."

It is then our very existence, and the thing we would instinctively battle for against the whole universe. We would never deliberately and knowingly do anything to injure it. That we often do so b ylying is on account of our thoughtlessness, or ignorance of its destructive effect upon integrity.

It is not always easy to see just what bearing the one has upon the other, but we may say that honesty is a protecting sheath for integrity. Why? Because truth is an integral part of our complete make-up, or integrity; and anything in us that violates truth, in some degree shatters that integrity.

This is at least one reason why honesty is a virtue, and we may question if the best of us give it the grave consideration it deserves.

We observe only externals ordinarily: a man deceives his neighbor; the neighbor discovers it, becomes bothersome; the unpleasantness that follows is easy to see. But it is after all merely incidental. Unnoticed in the noise of external events, something else is at work; it is the destructive reaction of the sinner's sin upon himself. It is a silent active power that tends to disintegrate his very being. And this operation is not incidental, but fundamental.

Some have a greater respect for truth than others; it is a matter of keener perception of values. But as long as people are guided by their observation of immediate external efforts and at the same time have no respect for the commands of God, many will try to "get by" with as much trickery as their tact will permit or their discretion allow.

If dishonesty were merely defying society, we might easily make heroes of clever liars, giving them credit for audacious courage. Unfortunately, this very attitude is quite generally accepted by the world, hence the multitudes who lie and cheat with a gay braggadocio and are proud of their skill in "slipping something over" on the other fellow.

If they could see that the injury is to themselves as well as to the other fellow, even a selfish consideration might cause many of our clever people to count ten before trying their skill.—B. G., in the Theologue.

An Apportionment of Men.

We have grown accustomed to the use of the word "apportionment," but it usually suggests money; why not have an apportionment of men? On every hand it is declared that the supply of clergy is not equal to the demand. How are we to secure recruits for the ministry? When money for missions is needed, the method employed to impress Church people with a sense of their individual responsibility seems to be that of apportioning a certain amount to each unit in the Church. This done, every effort is then put forth towards raising the quota. Why not use the same tactics in the effort to solve the problem of obtaining men for the ministry?

About a century ago there was one ordination every triennium for every two hundred and thirty-four communicants; today there is one ordination for every 3,350 communicants. Some one may insist that those figures only show how well statistics may lie, but the truth is, the membership of the Church shows an encouraging increase, whereas the ordination shows an alarming decrease. And a considerable number of those who enter our ministry come to us from other religious bodies. Evidently, therefore, our own Church families are falling down in their duty. What shall be done about it?

During the war a given community was called upon to provide a specified number of soldiers—the method of apportionment was used, and men were drafted. Cannot something like that be done in the Church of God, which is composed of those who have enlisted under Christ's banner to fight against sin, the world, and the devil unto their lives' end?

Let us go after the best young men of the Church for the ministry. They are to be had. Are we of the clergy making our promising young men feel that our job is worth while? Let every priest regard this question of vocation for Orders a matter of conscience. Is it not our bounden duty to make a diagnosis of the young men within our cures—selecting, encouraging, counseling, yes, drafting, if need be, those who are evidently adapted to the ministry?

Never was there a bigger opportunity open to the clergy than today. Men outside the Church are feeling the world's need of religion. Leaders in thought are challenging the Church to make good. And the words of Phillips Brooks are still true: "The Christian ministry affords the largest opportunity for the development of a human soul that the world has to offer."

Some one has suggested this as a reasonable goal—one candidate for Orders every three years for every five hundred communicants. Let's try the apportionment method of securing men for the ministry.—The Rev. Fred Ingley, in the Theologue.

BUSINESS MANAGER WANTED

A competent and experienced business man of thorough reliability wanted as Business Manager for the Industrial School and Farm for Homeless Boys, near Covington, Va. Salary, $1,500, home and expenses.

Also combination Bookkeeper and Stenographer.

Apply to George Floyd Rogers, Lynchburg, Va.

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW
CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

HESITATING?

Make up your mind, and come right in. We are waiting to extend you a cordial welcome and to place our facilities at your disposal.
We shall be glad to have you open a Savings Account with us.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main and Twelfth Streets

MEMORIAL DAY IS OVER

The most notable day for national tribute in the history of our country.
Did your church substantially record those of its members who made supreme sacrifices for the advancement of human progress?
Why not choose the Day of Independence—July 4th—independent also in that the church can individually show her faith in sacrifices for cherished Christian ideals.
We answer all questions as to church interior improvement and enrichment promptly and effectively.

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 Sixth Avenue, New York City

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler's Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank
Richmond, Virginia

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley
FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond
1104 East Main Street

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business. Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts. We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

Skin Tortured Babies Sleep
Mothers Rest
After Cuticura

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

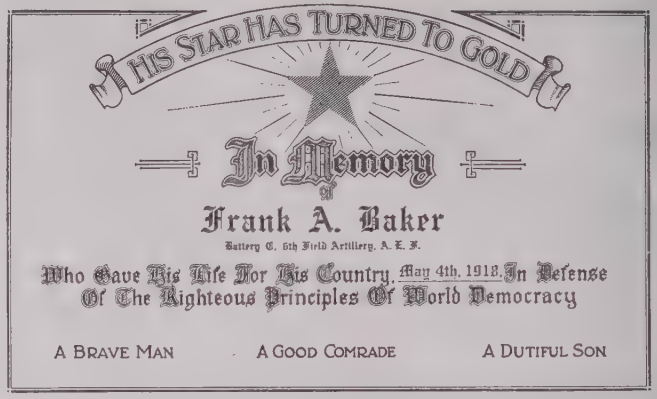
The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Memorial and Mausoleum Windows

Grand Price Louisiana Purchase Exposition
Sent Free: Our 48-Page Book
Ecclesiastical Art in Memorial Windows

THE FLANAGAN & BIEDENWEG STUDIO
312-318 W. Illinois Street, -:- Chicago, Ill.
Established 1883

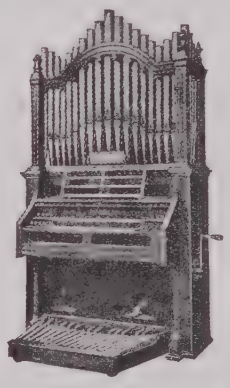


IF YOU LIKE GOOD STATIONERY, get your next box from Lewis. 200 sheets high grade note paper and 100 envelopes printed with your name and address for $1.50 to $2.50. Write for samples of the finest paper obtainble for society, clerical or personal use.
LEWIS, 712 River St., Troy, N. Y.

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

TREMENDOUS VALUE FOR 10c

Washington, D. C.—(Special.)—In order to let people all over the country see for themselves how valuable the Pathfinder can be to them, the editor of that old-established national weekly offers to send his paper on trial eight weeks for only 10 cents. The 10 cents does not begin to pay the cost, but the editor says he is glad to invest in new friends. The Pathfinder has been going for twenty-eight years. One family in every sixty-five in the entire United States now takes it. Thousands more would take it if they realized what they are missing. Only a dime sent to the Pathfinder, 180 Langdon Station, Washington, D. C., will keep your whole family informed, entertained, helped and inspired. Unusually good serial and short stories. No matter what other papers and magazines you may take, you will find the Pathfinder worth many times its cost.



WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

(Actual size, 7½x11½ inches.)

A BEAUTIFUL PHOTO ENGRAVING IN BLACK, WHITE AND GOLD. Furnished with name of soldier, Company and Date in place of the one shown. Ready for Framing. Sent postpaid for $1.50; delivery in one week.

AGENTS WANTED. LEAKE PRINTING CO.,
412 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

For Church and Home

Organs

A beautifully illustrated catalog, showing styles and prices, of the famous Estey, Packard and Corley Organs will be sent on request.

The Corley Company stock is the most complete in the entire South.

Easy payment terms will be arranged.

The Corley Company
The South's Great Musical Dept. Store
213 E. Broad Street, RICHMOND, VA.

THE NEW HYMNAL

With Both Words and Music

Single copies	$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more	1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more	1.00 cash

The $1.05 price in lots of 100 or more is payable 5 per cent with order, 5 per cent upon delivery, and 10 per cent monthly thereafter.

Carriage Charges Extra

The New Hymnal
WITH WORDS ONLY
Forty Cents a Copy
Carriage Charges Extra
Published by

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND
14 Wall Street, New York

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 18, 1921. No. 25.

At Judgment

He thirsted and I gave him drink, you say?
I, who had not drink for me or mine?
I only passed him on the world's great way---
"Aye, and bade him hope---that was the Wine."

He was a-hungered and I gave him food?
Why, I remember not: I only led
My path out by the trenches where he stood---
"Aye, and spoke of faith---that was the Bread."

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address
REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to
REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.
The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Kind words awaken kind echoes.—Old Proverb.

"To obey in the darkness is the great thing."

Take up the first cross you come to, and it will be your right one.

Love is the only badge by which the Church of Christ is known.—R. Fuller.

God's gifts which we possess, we should esteem highly; ourselves humbly.—Luther.

The former pastor of President Harding calls his parishioner an "eloquent listener."

Ye that are workers, and count it the soul's worst disgrace to feel life passing in idleness and uselessness, take courage. Deeds never die.—F. W. R.

Love will die like a smothered fire if you give it no expression.—C. B. Symes.

Pleasure comes through toil and not by self-indulgence and indolence. When one gets to love work, his life is a happy one.—Ruskin.

The new commandment issued appropriately at the Feast of Love, and not long before the great Act of Love.—F. W. Robertson.

Goethe's words to Eckerman: "If you have any faith, give me a share in it; if you have only doubts, keep them to yourself. I have enough of my own."

It is well to let our thankfulness keep pace with His mercies; at least, we can make the effort day after day, and so form the habit of gratitude.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

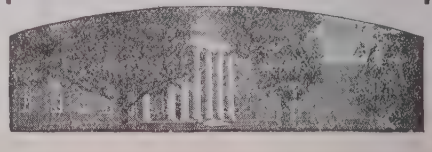
RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921



For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

CHATHAM Episcopal Institute

FOR GIRLS CHATHAM, VA.
RT. REV. B. D. TUCKER, D. D., PRESIDENT
Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

Beautiful and healthful location. 10-acre campus. Modern equipment. Athletics, Gym. College Preparatory. Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Certificate admits to leading colleges. Catalog
ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., PRINCIPAL, BOX 13

EDUCATIONAL

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

Plan Your Vacation to Include

THE HOLIDAY HOUSE

OF THE

Girls Friendly Society

Wrightsville Beach, N. C.

RATES:

All members	$5 00
Associates	7 00
Non-members	8 00

For reservations, address MISS ROSA DAIL, Housemother.

"There cannot be an afterward of elation unless there is a now of obedience."

There is scarcely any part of knowledge worthy of the mind of man, but from Scripture it may have some direction and light.—Hooker.

"I will place no value on anything I have or may possess, except in relation to the kingdom of Christ."—David Livingstone.

One of the great mysteries of the Christian life is the fact that we lighten the burdens and mitigate the sorrows of our own lives by ministering relief and sympathy to others who are suffering and sorrowing.

We do not reach the life of real faith till we are fully conscious of our own helplessness. How can we trust Christ unless we have learned to distrust ourselves?—W. Hay Aitken.

The appeal of religion calls us to the knowledge of the constraining love of Christ. It is not the Church which is at stake. That is only an instrument. It is not religion itself, for that cannot be destroyed. But it is our life and the life of this generation in which we live. Therefore, oh, how overwhelming the logic, let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering.—F. Q. Blanchard.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN A. KINX, M. A.
Headmaster

CAMP OKAHAHWIS

Senior Unit for Women Over 20

Near Rockbridge Baths, in the Blue Ridge, on the banks of North River.

R. R. Stations: Lexington and Goshen, Va.

Boating and swimming, drills, hikes, games and good comradeship.

Season, July 23-September 1st.

MISS MARY E. FRAYSER, Head
1636 West Grace, Richmond, Va.

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida. Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.
CHAS. J. SMITH President

Highlands, North Carolina

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Season Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"
If you will begin to prepare while they are young
Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia
"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk.

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 18, 1921. No. 25.

A CALL TO THE IDEALISM OF THE YOUNG

There has been of late in many places a sharp awakening to the ugly facts in present-day social customs which have crept into being while the conscience of good people slept. Periodicals with wide circulation, like the Literary Digest, have discussed the situation. Public officials, church organzations and preachers have been taking counsel. Our social practices need improvement, and it is well that great numbers of people are beginning to know it.

In the first place, some of the modern dances are so outrageously ugly that they ought to be immediately offensive to refined taste, and at times they come to the very edge of indecency. The origin of these dances was low, and no amount of gilding by fashionable acceptance can cover up their essential grossness. The Commissioner of Police in a large Eastern city stopped a Christian minister in his office a short time ago and said to him that the police sorely needed the co-operation of the Church to set a higher standard of manners among the people who were supposed to constitute good society. He said that young men and women "in society," protected as many of them are by the ultimate safeguard of good homes, do not realize the full danger of some of the reckless modern social fashions; but that these things, imitated among young people who have a less steadying environment, are leading to moral havoc. He said, further, that twenty years ago he was in New Orleans at the time of the Mardi Gras, and that the dances and the dress which could be seen then in the disreputable quarters of the town at the time of the carnival were the same which had emerged now into fashionable adoption.

With the demoralization of the dance, there has come on the part of many young women a strange bravado in dress. Whether on the bathing beaches or in the ballroom, there is a decreasing raiment and an increasing recklessness. The standards of modesty which used to be commanding are impudently flouted by a few, and not insisted upon by the many.

There is, furthermore, a tendency among the young people to resent the chaperonage which formerly was a matter of course. The public dance in hotel ball-rooms to which young girls go with no one but their partners, the automobiles, the late suppers in public places—all are expressions of an exaggerated liberty which puts a premium upon hasty impulse and sacrifices a wise restraint.

What does this mean? Does it mean that the majority of young people today are less fine than their mothers and fathers? We do not for a moment believe it. The trouble is not with any general demoralized intent. The trouble rather is that the great, clean-minded, high-principled majority have not sufficiently stopped to think, to discriminate and to set up constructive principles which the wilful bravado of the few shall not be allowed to break down.

The ignominy of our present situation is that we have carelessly thrown away our aristocracy of taste and conscience. Instead of letting the best within us be the arbiters of taste and fashion, we have let our best instincts be poisoned by the influences that have come up from low dance halls and dives whose very suggestion ought to bring disgrace. We have allowed ourselves to become habituated to music that is full of the barbarities of savage tribes dancing in the jungle, and in the place of a lovely simplicity we have allowed the paint and the powder and the half sensuous dress which vulgarize and cheapen. We need to win back our pride of refinement, of chivalry and romance. We need to open our eyes to see that it is a dishonor to Christian gentlefolk that they should abdicate their aristocracy of feeling and of conscience.

"Whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, think on these things," wrote St. Paul. We want today to get our Christian parents, and to get our Christian young people, to do precisely that. We must get them together to look facts in the face, to make up their minds in the light of Christian idealism as to what is beautiful and what is base. If a single group of high-minded girls should determine among themselves as to what betterments they will determine to bring to pass in society, they can accomplish a saving purpose in any community. It is the business of ministers and other Church leaders to inspire the young people to form such groups. In their hands supremely lies the moulding of a better fashion. There is enough innate idealism among the young people to destroy whatever evils exist if once they are inspired with the power of a positive conception. That idealism must be made conscious of itself and conscious of its solidarity.

WHAT THE CHURCH SHOULD ASK FOR

A crystalization into still more specific expression of the thought which is outlined in the preceding editorial is this declaration of principles presented this week at the Ministerial Union representing all the Protestant churches, in a large Eastern city:

"As Christian ministers we recognize that our supreme duty and privilege is to hold up before the spirits of our people the ideal of those things which are true and lovely and of good report, and to bid them think of these things; confident that the expulsive power of high affections is the strongest force against whatever is ugly or base.

We believe that all thoughtful persons will agree that in our modern social customs, in much popular music, in certain forms of dancing, dress and demeanor, there are elements which are neither lovely nor of good report; and that evils exist which people of sensitive conscience disapprove, but which nevertheless by silence they tacitly condone.

We believe that whatever tends to demoralization in modern social practices can be corrected if the people of Christian conscience will think and act constructively.

We therefore appeal to the Christian mothers of ———, in churches, in woman's clubs, or other organizations, to take measures to crystallize positive standards which they will pledge themselves to uphold.

We appeal to the young women to form groups which will face with earnest thoughtfulness the facts in regard to present-day social customs, discriminate in regard to these between what is fine and what is hurtful, and exert their group influence in favor of standards which their finest conscience approves.

And we appeal to men, and especially young men, to show so unmistakably their social approval of modesty and refinement that whatever is questionable in dress or demeanor may be discouraged until it disappears."

BISHOP TUTTLE TRAVERSES AN OLD TRAIL

On the fifth of October, 1866, a special meeting of the House of Bishops was in session in St. John's Chapel in the city of New York, called chiefly for the purpose of sending another Missionary Bishop into the immense territory lying between Texas, Kansas and the Missouri River on the east and the Pacific States on the west, where only Bishops Clarkson and Randall were holding a few outposts for the Church. The Bishops determined to set apart a new missionary jurisdiction and to elect another Bishop in this new West, his modest title to be "Bishop of Montana, with jurisdiction in Utah and Idaho." Their choice fell upon a stalwart young clergyman, rector of a village church in Morris, N. Y., who had become known to some of them for his missionary spirit, his promising ability and his sound common sense. This was the Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle. At the time of his election he still lacked nearly four months of the canonical age for consecration to the Episcopate. He was consecrated May 1, 1867, by Bishop Hopkins, who had received Episcopal orders at the hands of Bishop White, who had received them from the English Church and was known as the father of the American Episcopate.

Within a few weeks thereafter the new Bishop was making his way by toilsome stages to his distant field. There for nearly twenty years he labored, laying broad foundations for the Church as the land began to receive the tides of immigration and to grow into large and flourishing States. He was translated to Missouri as its Bishop in 1886, and in 1903 became Presiding Bishop of the Church by virtue of seniority. This high office, with its ever-increasing duties and responsibilities, he has held longer than any of his predecessors since Bishop White, and has filled it so ably, so paternally, with such simplicity of character and readiness of devotion to its every demand that he has become easily the most widely known, the most venerated and beloved figure in the American Church; a living example of its genius and type of its ideal manhood.

Bishops in the great West have no longer two or three or four wide territories to oversee, but each State has at least one, and some of them two or three Bishops, diocesan or missionary. So it came to pass that last week Bishop Tuttle was journeying westward to Denver, Col., for the consecration of a Bishop-Coadjutor of that Diocese. With all the facilities of modern travel his route lay in part along the same trail over which he had passed fifty-four years ago, by stage coach or on burros or any way that offered, to the field of his first missionary activities. The great contrasts which have come about during a single episcopate, and the grace and virtue bestowed upon this old Bishop, and through him upon the Church, during that period did not fail to attract the attention and excite the gratitude of the good people in those parts. So at one place and another they begged him to tarry with them for a space that they might make public and devout recognition of what God had wrought for them, in which celebrations the whole Church would fain join in a spirit of sympathy and congratulation.

An account of the services held at Omaha and North Platte, Neb., will be found in our news columns.

THE GREATNESS OF BEING GOOD

Doubtless on last Sunday, being the Sunday nearest to the eleventh of June, many Christian congregations were led to think of St. Barnabas, whom the Church's calendar commemorates on that day.

Many of those whom we commemorate on the saints' days were men of more extraordinary endowment than was Barnabas. Peter was more aggressive and commanding. John had gifts of poetic insight which Barnabas did not possess. Paul was incomparably a greater thinker. Yet, nevertheless, there is no figure among the heroes of the early Church who brings a more immediate inspiration and encouragement to us Christians of today. For Barnabas excelled in a way in which we also can learn to excel. His virtues were not those of the genius, but those of the man who takes endowments not outstandingly different from those of the average man, and weaves them into a life of nobility through the simple power of religious consecration. He brings us not the example of a distant attainment, but rather the encouragement of a friendly presence which bids us walk on the same road of achievement with him. He was great not because of his gifts, but because of his goodness, and though not all men can be gifted, all men can try, like Barnabas, to learn to be good.

He was, say sthe narrative in the Book of Acts, "a good man," and it goes on to add that he was "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." That is to say, he was made what he was because the spirit of God had been allowed to fill him and possess his life.

The pitiful shallowness of many lives is that they are not filled with anything except themselves. Their impulses are the common impulses of their human and material calculations. They are hemmed in by a moral complacency that does not look beyond itself. All the currents of their being are sluggish, like a pond fed by a few thin streams. No tides out of the unfathomable deeps throb up into them with the rhythm of the eternal sea.

The great, deep lives are those which maintain their contact with the depths in God. Oh, that we might remember again and again that truth, so simple and so imperative, so awful in its all-inclusive importance for all religious living, and yet so easily forgotten! There are so many to whom religion means simply a name for certain practices, a garb put on at times over their accustomed ways of living, and not the transformation of the whole nature of that living through the miracle of the heaven-born life. So many live content with the feeble barrenness of their souls, as though no reservoir of the mighty grace of God existed beyond the horizon of their poor complacency. They are never filled by the Holy Ghost because they never truly understand how awful is the difference between what they are and what they might be, and how marvelous in its possibilities is the change which the Holy Spirit can work in them. They lie like barren deserts, painfully growing their few poor flowers here and there, with the sluices of the life-giving waters shut by their own neglect. They list like stranded vessels on the flats of the inland bays, with never a glance turned to the sea horizon from whence the rush of the releasing waters might pour in. But the great souls, the free souls, the souls which, like Barnabas, are glad in their unfettered goodness, are those which have opened the gates through which the life of God can come. They may not be different in themselves from other men and women; they may have had originally no extraordinary endowment of spiritual capacity, but they have waited upon the Lord. They have pondered upon the miracle of the spiritual world. They understand that there is something, not ourselves—a great, inclusive glory of the life of God—which can pour in upon us and fill us with itself. They have prayed, they have dreamed, they have desired. And so at length they have been filled with the Holy Ghost, and with the joy and power which that brings.

When a man thus is filled with the Holy Ghost, he is also, like Barnabas, full of faith. He has faith in the illimitable possibilities of God's achievements. He has faith in events and faith in men.

Is this not what we need supremely today—men who have been filled with the Holy Ghost, and therefore are full of faith? In these immediate years it seems as though there were an ebb in faith. There are plenty of phrases. There is much talk of loyalty to the Church, much boasting of patriotism, much vaunting of 100 per cent. Americanism and all the cheap vociferousness that takes the place of a noble pride. But there is a fashion of discounting the ideals which are the heart of faith. It is even possible for the very standards of value to be so dimmed and distorted that men twist the things which are the marks of glory into the butt of a cynic's scorn. We may sometimes hear it said of some great leader and prophet of his time who saw from the hilltops the vision which a dull and selfish generation may never see, "We do not believe in him; he was an idealist." An idealist! Think of the unconscious callousness to holy things which ever lets that word be spoken without an awful reverence! An idealist. Such was Isaiah. Such were all the prophets and seers of the world. Such were those who in every generation have beckoned the race forward by the torches which they have kindled in the rising sun. Such were all the architects of the purposes of heaven. Such was the Christ upon His cross! God pity us if today in America we drag down by gross fingers of stupid disbelief the power of ideals that ought to thrill us and lead us on climbing roads! To be full of the Holy Ghost is to be full of faith, and to be full of faith is to be full of the dauntless confidence that the things which one generation dares set up as its ideals can be built through the grace of God into the next generation's facts. To be full of faith is to believe that there are no limits to the things which God can do. It is to believe that human nature is malleable, and human souls can be made anew by the heavenly touch. It is to dare to attempt great things, knowing that faith can move mountains if once it has moved to obedience the hearts of men.

A CANADIAN PRESBYTERY ON CHURCH UNION

Through the courtesy of Mr. Robert H. Gardiner we have the report of the Anglican and Presbyterian Committees on Church Union made to the Montreal Presbytery on May 20, as given in the Montreal Daily Star. A committee of the Presbytery was appointed to support the consideration of this report before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, which was to meet in Toronto, June 1.

Professor Welsh gave a full explanation of the report which contains resolutions agreed upon by the two committees in their five conferences held under the joint chairmanship of the Bishop of Montreal and Professor Welsh since the new year. In these conferences it was found unnecessary to bring up either of the vexed questions of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church and of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith or of the uniformity of public worship. Thus two difficulties anticipated by some as insurmountable were found to be outside the fundamentals of Church union and reorganization of the different denominations was found unnecessary.

With regard to the question of faith it was resolved:

That the Lambeth statement represents the view of this conference, namely:

"We believe that the visible unity of the Church will be found to involve the whole-hearted acceptance of: The Holy Scriptures, as the record of God's revelation of Himself to man, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith; and the creed commonly called Nicene, as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith, and either it or the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession of belief; the divinely instituted sacraments of baptism and the Holy Communion, as expressing for all the corporate life of the whole fellowship in and with Christ; a ministry acknowledged by every part of the Church as possessing not only the inward call of the spirit, but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body."

With regard to the question of order, the following resolution of the Lambeth Conference was adopted: In view of the ultimate ideal of a reunited Christendom, a representative and constitutional episcopate, co-ordinated with Synodical, Presbyterial and Congregational representation, is adapted to the achievement of the larger unity."

Professor Welsh explained that a representative and constitutional episcopate would mean that the Bishop be chosen by clergy and laymen and be responsible to the Church as a whole, not autocratic.

At the third conference the following resolution was brought up but not formally adopted, a joint sub-committee being appointed to deal with the matter. It was reported at yesterday's meeting, however, as it formed the basis of subsequent discussion and action: "In view of any action involving union between the Anglican and Presbyterian Communions, bishops and clergy of the Anglican Communion would accept a form of Presbyterial Commission, and ministers of the Presbyterian Communion would accept a form of Episcopal Commission. Any who at the time of union may not desire to receive such a commission, entitling them to officiate at all acts of worship in the united Church, would retain their present status and functions."

The fourth conference resulted in the acceptance of the following forms of reciprocal commission, which Professor Welsh pointed out were not ordination ceremonies but merely those admitting ministers already ordained in one communion to the larger ministry of a reunited Church.

The Presbyterian form of commission to Anglicans was as follows:

"A declaration will be made to the effect that there is no repudiation for reflection on the ministry to which we have been set apart by the Holy Spirit, but that the authorization is given to enable us to exercise the ministry in a wider sphere within the reunited Church. Then the clergy of the Church of England will be admitted according to the form in the "Draft of the Book of Common Order of the Presbyterian Church in Canada," pp. 35, 36. Now may be sung 'Come, Holy Ghost, Our Souls Inspire,' or other hymn of supplication for the presence of the Holy Spirit. Then shall the candidate kneel, and, other Presbyters standing about him, the Moderator shall say: 'Since no man is of himself sufficient for these things, let us call upon God in prayer.' "

In the course of the consecrating prayer, the Moderator will say: "We now, by the laying on of our hands, admit to a wider exercise of the ministry of the word and sacraments. At the conclusion the right hand of fellowship will be given to the clergy of the Church of England, and an invitation to take part in the Presbyterian ministry. The benediction closes the form of ceremony.

The Anglican form of commission to Presbyterians, similar to the aforementioned, is as follows: "The candidates having been presented to the Bishop, then shall the Bishop say: For as much as terms have been arranged between the Church of England in Canada and the Presbyterian Church in Canada, with the purpose of realizing, through a visible and corporate union, their common fellowship in the Universal Church of Christ, and of manifesting that fellowship to the world, and for as much as it is necessary that there should be in this united Church a ministry that shall be acknowledged in every part thereof, it is our purpose now to give to these our brethren, by the laying on of our hands, a commission to the office of priesthood, it being clearly understood that herein there is no repudiation of or reflection on their past ministry, to which they were set apart by the Holy Spirit, whose call led them to that ministry and whose power enabled them to perform the same."

Professor Welsh explained that the use of the word priesthood contained nothing offensive to Presbyterian beliefs. The word was not used in the sense of the priest who stands between the soul and God, but in a purely religious sense as being the Anglican form for that office in the Church of England which corresponds to that of the presbyter in the Presbyterian Church.

After the invocation and prayer the commission is given as follows:

"Then the candidates shall kneel, and the Bishop, with the priests present, shall lay hands severally on the head of every one, the Bishop saying:

" 'Take thou authority to execute this office now committed to thee by the imposition of our hands. And be thou a faithful dispenser of the Word of God and of His holy sacraments.' "

The ceremony concludes with the benediction.

Dr. Welsh and other members of the Presbytery expressed the highest admiration for the manner in which the members of the Anglican committee had met them on various points, enabling them to escape the threatening barrier of reordination and other difficulties. The Bishop of Montreal and others had consented to the proposed Presbyterian form of commission to the wider ministry. The conferences were felt to have led to a larger measure of common understanding. Dr. Duncan moved a resolution commending the attitude of the Anglican committee and recommending the consideration of the constructive conclusions of the joint committees.

THE CALL OF THE MINISTRY

By the Rev. W. Cosby Bell, D. D.

The Church papers have repeatedly marshalled the main facts which lie back of a discussion of the call of the ministry. They may be briefly pictured by the following statements: There are in this Church some 9,031 parishes and missions. There are approximately 4,400 parochial clergy to man them. Five years ago there were in our five Eastern seminaries 256 students. This year there are 179. In 1916 there were 692 postulents. In 1919 there were 393. The Bishop of a Middle Western Diocese has recently said that unless the number of candidates rapidly increased, one-third of the parishes in his section would be vacant within five years. The full effects of the shortage will be felt only a few years hence, but they are already beginning to be felt. We have received at the Seminary during the past session more than twice as many requests for recommendations as we did last year. One of the Virginia Bishops told me not long ago that he had eight vacant parishes, with no prospect of filling them. The facts are undisputed; they point inexorably forward to a gradual arrest and slowing down of the life and work of the Church for lack of men. The facts are clear. The problem left is that of changing the facts.

When we are confronted with a great need our most important task, I take it, is to begin to think about sources and methods of supply. Thinking and talking about vacant churches will not fill them—only thinking and talking about men will do that, and it is time that we talked less about needs and more about men.

With regard to the sources of supply, there stand out in my mind two very hopeful features in the present situation. In the first place there has surely come home to the minds and hearts of all of us in late years a new realization of the unused and untapped reserves of self-forgetful service that are latent in ordinary human nature. We had said, perhaps in our folly, that our age was at heart materialistic and given over to the pursuit of selfish ends. We had said perhaps that the youth of our time did not readily respond to the call for unselfish service. We had said that young men shrank from the ministry because the salaries were too low, and that to raise the salaries would be to increase the number of ministers. And then you remember—that even as we talked so there came an arrest—a pause in our national life—a sense of growing crises. And then, in the silence of an intense and poignant expectation, there rang out high and clear the call of the bugles of duty. They spoke not of salaries, high or low, nor yet of personal advantages to be lost or won. They spoke only of service difficult and dangerous to be carried through in whatever misery of body or distress of mind. And then from every corner of the land there came to us the sound of trampling feet, the movement of the young men pouring out from the cities and the plains and the mountain valleys and crowding into the long roads that led to Flanders and Lorraine. And so we have had our demonstration. We know now—there is no excuse for our not knowing it—that given an adequate objective, given a cause to serve that offers the opportunity for moral and spiritual adventure, and the servants will be forthcoming. The supply is there.

And this is the second hopeful thing that I see. There are in the Seminary I know best a number of young men of whose quality and character we can speak in terms of high praise. If in our dealings with these young men we found in them some special and distinct ministerial quality or a special super-normal experience which could not be created or educated—which a man simply has or has not—then we should feel rather hopeless about doing anything to meet the need for ministers, for then we should have to face the depressing fact that very few men are potential ministers—that the source of supply is very limited indeed. But though I usually do not find in these men an exceptional quality or an exceptional experience, I do find in them something quite distinctive. It is an exceptional insight. They are normal and healthy young Christians, believers in God and followers of Christ, desiring to live their lives in His service. There are such Christians in every community. But these men are Christians who have discovered something. They have discovered that in the ministry is to be found a field for the service of God and man and a cause to serve which quickens their blood and stirs their hearts and kindles their brains. And they are there at the Seminary mainly as the result of that insight—the insight that to serve Christ in the ministry is to serve mankind in a singularly effective way and to find for oneself a life singularly worth living.

If this is not an inaccurate account of what takes most of us into the ministry, then the centre of the problem of increasing the number of ministers is the problem of widening that insight. It is the problem of bringing larger numbers of men to feel the special appeal—the call of the ministry. God is calling men into His service and into a ministry of one sort or another always and everywhere. In baptism we are signed with the sign of the cross and promise to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto our life's end. This is God's call to a ministry in the awakening of the religious life of the child. In the hearts of boys and girls as they come forward for confirmation is a call to the ministry. For even as we have many members in one body and all men have not the same office, so we who are many are one body in Christ. There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; diversities of ministrations, but the same Lord. And if, paradoxically, young men feel that while they can naturally and quietly consider the call to be Christian doctors or teachers or merchants, they cannot or ought not consider the call to the ministry until something, they know not what, wholly extraordinary has happened to them, it is partly our own fault. It is partly because we have acquiesced in the ancient heresy that the ministry is an isolated profession. If we find ourselves isolated, it is possibly because we have isolated ourselves, and we have isolated ourselves to the point where very few young men ever even consider the call of the ministry as even a possible life work for them. They know that a minister usually turns up in church on Sunday morning, but how he got there, by what mental and spiritual processes, what were the motives which actuated him, when and where he was trained, or whether he was trained, what, if anything, the Bishop has to do with it, they do not know. Is it not the case that for the most part we have left, as it were, the onus of a decision wholly to the uninstructed individual?

There is the best possible authority for reversing this policy. When Jesus was organizing that first peripetetic theological seminary in Palestine, He called His students one by one—Matthew from his place at the receipt of custom; Peter and John from their nets. And He called in spite of the fact that some might not and one did not turn out to have the inward call. When deacons were needed, the apostles did not wait for volunteers. They directed the Christian community to choose men of good report, and they got among others a man like Stephen. When St. Paul found at Lystra a certain promising disciple named Timothy, "him would Paul have go forth with him and he took him." In other words, he found a good man, made a direct personal appeal to him, and as a result secured him. When the Christians of Milan in the fourth century needed a bishop at a critical time, they picked out the best man they knew—a layman, a brilliant lawyer, and Governor of the Province, saying, "We will have Ambrose as our bishop," and they got him. Possidius tells us that, another presbyter being needed in the community, the Christian people seized hold of the great Augustine and presented him to the bishop for ordination, and that Augustine recognized the call of the people as the call of God. So one might go on to show with illustration after illustration that the laissez-faire policy has not been the historic and effective policy of the Church.

Perhaps we should be agreed that the ideal thing were that the Church should so present the call to the ministry that every worthy young Christian would be able to consider intelligently and seriously whether or no the call be addressed to him. Now to be able to do this, he needs first of all information. He should have presented to him in some clear and intelligible form the actual objectives and aims of the ministry, its place and function in the Church and in the life of the world. He should be able to form some idea of the scope and range of the minister's work—as student and teacher, as preacher and priest, as organizer and administrator, as servant to the entire life of the community, as friend and comrade of every person in the parish, from the children to the grey-beards, as minister indeed to the whole of human life in its relation with goodness and with God. He should be able to visualize the actual processes by which a man becomes a minister, the method of training, the process of education. I am afraid that young men frequently see in the minister one who, moved by potent but mysterious forces, rises and preaches spontaneously on successive Sunday mornings throughout his life. He knows that such a feat is beyond him. He is unaware that the sermon has a history. Often he does not know there is such a thing as a theological seminary. One of our best graduates at the Theological Seminary, from Virginia, and a graduate of the University of Virginia, told me the other day that he had never heard of a seminary until two weeks before he entered ours. He had thought about the ministry from time to time, but had felt himself unprepared for it, and was unaware that there was a way to remedy his deficiency. * * *

The situation then can be met, I believe, by incorporating enlistment for the ministry among the normal yearly parish objectives. Might not each parish make a sustained effort to put and keep at least one man in preparation for the ministry each year? Might not each minister survey his parish each year for possible candidates and present the call to the individual? Might not the call be more frequently presented from the pulpit and the Sunday school and in the schools of the State? Might not a diocesan committee support the efforts of the individual by informative literature, including perhaps a seminary catalogue mailed at intervals to potential candidates?

Is it not the case that the call to the ministry, to be successful, must be pitched on a certain key? In the first place, it must be pitched upon the positive key of opportunity rather than upon the negative key of self-denial. We ministers know, of course, that while the ministry means a denial of selfishness, it does not mean the denial of self. Rather it means self-realization. We know that it means an opportunity for a man to use all possible knowledge of goodness and godliness, of science and art and philosophy and literature and life. We know that there is no capacity for dealing with men, no gift for organization, no power for clear thinking and writing and speaking, which does not find here scope for its exercise. We know, too, the richness of life that comes of close and enduring relations with our fellowmen which the ministry brings. We know that this service of Christ means that one has life and has it ever more abundantly. And yet, somehow, sometimes there creeps into our voices as we talk about it a kind of gentle whine. We dwell sometimes upon the difficulties and forget the opportunities. We desire, no doubt, that the difficulies should be faced and understood by every man entering the ministry, but do we always get the other side understood equally well? Surely the call to the ministry must show men, must make them vividly feel, that they are setting out to win their lives and not to throw them away. If they are to feel the call to the ministry, they must first feel the call of the ministry. And, secondly, that call must be pitched primarily on the key of service, not of sacrifice. We talk sometimes about sacrifice as if that in itself had some virtue and some appeal. But indeed, in and by itself, it has neither, and we are mistaking the incidental thing for the essential thing. For sacrifice has meaning and use only as a means to service. Then it is forgotten in the joy of the service. "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross despising the shame." We are told that the cadets of the French Military School of St. Cyr insisted upon wearing the white gloves of parade in their first engagement, and put flowers in the muzzles of their rifles, turning the grim and bloody business of war into a festival. And we have, above all things, to help our young men to see that here is an unparalleled opportunity for service to God and man.

One great thought is now dominating the minds of all thinking people. It is the thought that out of the illumination of the war we must wring the materials for a better world than the world of yesterday. For such a better world, we know that just one thing is wanted, and that is better men. That is the basic need upon which every league of nations and every scheme of social reform depends for its success, and that fact is the call to the ministry, for the ministry is just a body of men whose special concern is with the transformation of character, and who hold themselves to be the servants, not of private interests, but of mankind. We do not do that work very well, perhaps; perhaps the chief reason being that we are not good enough to do much good, but it is our work. The task of the minister is to minister. It is to put away, as the soldier does, all thought of private gain, and go on a permanent active service to make the spirit of Jesus Christ the spirit of this world. That His spirit should become the spirit of this world is, I take it, the only possible or even conceivable solution of the problem of human life, and therefore the man who enters the ministry has at least the chance to bring his entire weight to bear at the crucial point in the task of mankind, and to put his energy at work at the central moral and religious problem upon which all other problems finally depend. It is a chance to fling all one has and all one is into the world conflict at the point where the struggle is most severe and the issue most doubtful. It is a chance to count for one man in the battle of the Lord. And this our young men must be brought to see.

Some Eclesiastical Dont's

By an Archdeacon.

It is somewhat unfortunate that after traversing a considerable portion of our pathway on earth we cannot go back and put up sign-posts of direction originating in our experiences of results. Such sign-posts might, of course, be occasionally misleading, as it is often difficult for a conscientious thinker to look back over his life and separate the real mistakes from those which are only apparently so. The young clergyman, however, guided as far as possible by the Church's wisdom, must learn his own lessons. This article is merely a modest effort to be suggestive without claim to infallible conclusion.

In the first place, don't suppose that it is humanly possible to apply the Church's rubric law to every condition in worship and ministry. Our Lord's warning, "I have many things to tell you, but ye cannot hear them now," applies in the realms of practice as well as theory. In St. Paul's, Richmond, or St. Bartholomew's, New York, the full rubrical law applies in its exactness. It presupposes certain conditions of education, environment, custom and equipment. As acting canon of a pro-cathedral, I have used Eucharistic vestments and the full ritual. On the other hand, as a summer preacher to a crowd of uneducated mountaineers, I have preached in my shirt-sleeves and with no Prayer-Book at all. The only lecture I gave them on the Church was a talk or two, impartially expressed, on what the various "bodies," Methodist, Episcopal, etc., taught, emphasizing the grand fundamentals on which we were not divided. Every sect was represented in the audience. They curiously combined the maximum of sectarian zeal with a minimum of sectarian knowledge. They were an a. b. c. congregation ecclesiastically at an impossible distance from our Church influences. The results nevertheless were gratifying.

Don't fail to cut and measure your service by the character of your congregation. A mixed congregation, or one enjoying the Church services occasionally only, cannot enjoy or be helped in the largest way by the service proper for the average metropolitan church, re-enforced by its training, equipment, numbers and music.

If your views are "sacramentarian," don't be in a hurry to let miscellaneous mission audiences, in a land saturated with "Protestant" ideas, into the fulness of your theories. Do not fail to warn those under your instruction against the fatal results of a mechanical religion, or lead them to suppose that "saving" results come from frequent communion regardless of preparation, spiritual conditions or compliance with the plain law expressed not only in the Word of God, but in the prayer-book preface to the Holy Communion. Don't let them forget that your "glad to see you at the Holy Communion" means, "I am glad to see your frequent self-examination and prayer and your resolution to earnestly struggle for a closer walk with God." Don't fail to remember that the system of the Roman Church is inseparately connected with her confessional. While speaking of the "prayer wheel" of heathenism as a mechanical religion, don't fail to remember that with many souls ranged under the cross there is danger of a similar mistake. This you would deplore!

Don't plan a church building too large for your congregation. Your plan would better provide for an enlargement some day. Don't forget that the blessing promised to a "two or three" congregation is proportionately increased by the enlargement to two or three hundred—both to yourself and the original "two or three." Don't forget that your maximum use on the Lord's day is attained by getting all of your people to one service if possible, rather than dividing them into a morning and evening congregation. Give your evening service where there is no morning service. Actually I incline to the belief that the empty pews of the average town church at the evening service are a damage to the spiritual interests of the Church. A cottage or chapel service in a favorable locality is to be preferred, or an appointment in an adjacent town. In this particular the custom of the Church in many localities appears to clash with common sense according to the laws of psychology and of expediency.

The "don'ts" multiply. Don't waste your Lenten privilege. The crying need of the Church is a deepened spiritual life—a higher spiritual ideal and ambition. Do not neglect lectures on sociology, on ecclesiastical history, etc., but the Trinity season is the proper or better time for this. During Lent there should be one great central thought, i. e., Christ, tempted, conquering, crucified; a trinity of theme around the figure of our Lord. Seize the objective and drive for it with constant prayer and with all your power from Ash Wednesday to Good Friday. Let no cross lights or minor objectives obscure your vision. Kindle your fire if needed at the flame of men like Hay Aitken, the English missioner, and keep it burning steadily.

Again, in scattered mission circles where communicants are few, there is usually an attempt at one week day service. Try to condense the special days of the Church within the octave into that week day date and in that one service. Don't try the Church's complete ideal under impossible conditions for your people.

My brethren of the clergy will, I hope, pardon this attempt to teach others who are wiser and better men. I address, however, especially the junior clergy. Some of these "don'ts" may be helpful to them.

May I venture to say a word of caution to the junior bishops? Our bishops are usually big-hearted men. This may mislead. When an ordained man develops a fundamental ethical weakness (very rare in our Church), do not restore and pass him on. I have followed the sad results of such a policy frequently. Ultimately such a man may make good. But these "Folds of Christ" are precious charges. The risk is too great.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

A WAY TO GET DISARMAMENT.

Mr. Editor: Your Disarmament Number, the Peace Number of the Churchman, and the corresponding issues of many religious papers, and also the many sermons that were preached on June 5, must surely have done marvelous good in arousing public sentiment, but as you well say, "vague good intentions will be perfectly futile unless, etc."

Now as to the effectiveness of the, etc., may not a lesson be learned from the success of the prohibition movement? When did prohibition pass? Was it not when Congressmen and Senators were made to know that their vote against prohibition would mean their defeat at home? So now, when the people show the same determination against spending 90 per cent. of their Federal taxes for things pertaining to war, then and not till then something will be done. From this time henceforth, until the end is accomplished, every candidate for Congress should be forced to face this issue: Will you vote and use your influence in behalf of any movement or measure that looks toward disarmament? When the time comes let us bombard all candidates with some such question as this. Meantime let us hope that thousands of letters are reaching President Harding in support of a conference.

JAMES H. DILLARD.

Charlottesville, Va., June 14, 1921.

THE SUNDAY NEWSPAPER.

Mr. Editor: The reading of the Sunday newspaper has an effect on our spiritual life similar to that of a narcotic. It tends to deadness of spirituality and to a deepened and more intense worldliness.

The Sunday newspaper has very largely banished the religious weekly from our homes. What is the result? People are grossly ignorant of the Church and her history, of her work and her possibilities. No perceptible difference can be seen in the conduct of the Churchman and the worldling. Christian people are largely ignorant of God's word, forgetful of the Ten Commandments; the materialism and vanity of the world loom large in their eyes, and on these they concencrate their thoughts and physical efforts; and as they grow in that direction they dwindle in spiritual vitality and stature.

The reading of the Bible, devotional books and the weekly Church paper is now so neglected by the majority of people who claim membership in the Church that we are seriously in danger of being not only religiously lukewarm, but actually cold.

This neglect of the Bible and perusal of the Sunday paper are an indication of the trend of our lives. It shows in what we are interested and in what we are not interested. If we who call ourselves Christians are going to conform to the ways of the world we shall, no doubt, be popular with the world; but there are some things that to the forward-looking Christian are of more eternal value.

The popularity of the Sunday newspaper is a token of sad degeneracy and decline in the spiritual life of the people.

LEWIS OSTENSON.

Oconomowoc, Wis.

The Great Commission.

CHINA FAMINE BROKEN.

Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, cabled the Department of Missions on June 6 as follows:

"There is no further need for Famine Relief; stop sending funds."

At first it had not seemed possible that the news could be true, since all agencies had been bending every effort to meet the supposed emergency in the Province of Chihli. Mr. Lamont, chairman of the American Committee, however, has ascertained that due to abundant rains in the famine-stricken areas and early harvests, the backbone of the famine has been broken. It is, therefore, possible to notify the Church people who have so generously given that there is no further need for direct Famine Relief.

It is a time to express some merited feelings of satisfaction that Christian people have so generously responded, making a total contribution exceeding $6,874,000. The Church papers have unstintedly given space and in every way forwarded this great cause. Our representatives in China have repeatedly voiced their appreciation. Bishop Graves writes:

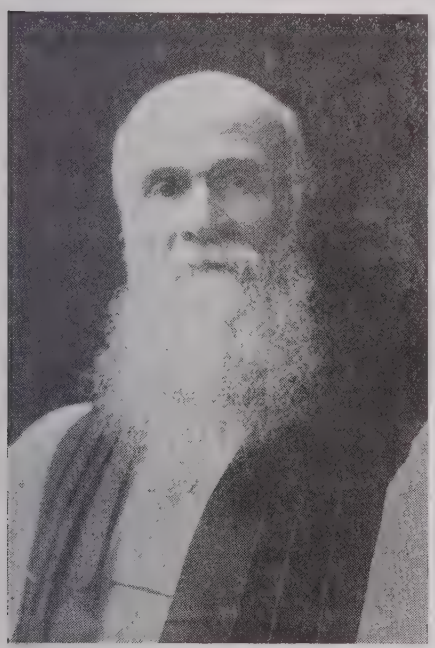
"Our Church people at home have done wonderfully well, and we are grateful for all the help they have afforded."

This has brought to a close one of the most tragic chapters in the history of China, if not in the whole world. Years to come will reveal the fact of the invaluable aid rendered to our Chinese brothers by the people of this country.

The American Committee for China Famine Fund feels therefore, that the task for which it was appointed has been accomplished, and plans for demobilization, including the gathering in of monies now in the hands of the local committees, will at once begin.

The American Committee, upon the suggestion of the committee in China, has been studying how best to develop plans for the prevention or relief of future famines in China, and such funds as are received in excess of actual famine relief needs, or as may be contributed to the China Famine Fund by reason of activities now under way, will be devoted to that purpose or such other post-famine problems as the committee may decide.

The Foreign Missionary Boards and other permanent agencies, which have contributed so largely to the success of the campaign, have before them the solution of serious post-famine problems. In whatever work of this kind they decide to undertake they will receive the hearty co-operation and sympathy of the American Committee, and in any such work the committee bespeaks for them the support of the American people.



Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, chairman, said that he felt that the value of the American effort toward relief of the famine in China could hardly be over-emphasized, both from the point of view of the relief of millions of starving peoples, and as an expression of the great sympathy of the United States for a sister nation in trouble.

In behalf of the Missionary Societies and the churches which are carrying on missionary work in the famine area of Northern China, Mr. Robert E. Speer, as President of the Federal Council of Churches and Chairman of the Church Committee co-operating with the American Committee for the China Famine Fund, stated that these church agencies would go forward with the work of re-establishment in Northern China, caring for orphans and helping the people to return to their villages and farms and to restore their homes, and that for such purposes and for the work of future famine prevention the churches would receive and administer through their agents in China whatever funds could be secured for these ends.

Church Intelligence

ENTHUSIASTIC RECEPTIONS TO BISHOP TUTTLE IN NEBRASKA AND DENVER MARK THE OPENING OF CENTENARY OF MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Inaugurating in the great West the Centenary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, which is to be celebrated this summer and fall throughout the Church, Bishop Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, President of that Society and Presiding Bishop of the American Church, received characteristic Western greetings last week in Nebraska and Colorado. The Bishop was on his way to preside at the consecration of the Rev. Dr. Ingley as Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Colorado, and his railway journey carried him over part of the same route which he had followed exactly fifty-four years ago, under such different conditions, when the young Bishop was making his way to his frontier missionary field in Montana, Utah and Idaho. The coincidence could not fail to attract attention or to give occasion for a grateful celebration of the progress of the Church in those parts during the single episcopate of this pioneer Bishop.

BISHOP TUTTLE.

At Omaha, on Wednesday, June 8, at noon, the Bishop was entertained at luncheon at the Happy Hollow Club with one hundred and fifty guests present. Speeches were made by Bishops Shayler, of Nebraska, and Beecher, of Western Nebraska, to which Bishop Tuttle made response. At Trinity Cathedral on that evening an impressive service was held attended by a great congregation, the combined choirs of the city furnishing the music. Bishop Tuttle made a characteristic address, in which he plead for disarmament, urged a wide observance of the Missionary Society Centennial, and made interesting references to his experiences in the old West and the significance of the missionary enterprise in the development of the country.

The Bishop reached North Platte, Neb., on Thursday, June 9, fifty-four years ago to the hour after his arrival on his first visit, June 9, 1867. He was accompanied by Bishops Beecher and Shayler, and was met at the station by a committee headed by the Rev. W. H. Moore, rector of the Church of Our Saviour. At a luncheon given at noon Mr. Moore made an address of welcome and Bishop Beecher acted as toastmaster. Bishop Shayler spoke of the lessons of the Centennial and its significance to the growing membership of the Church, especially in the Western country. Mr. J. Q. Wilcox voiced the greetings of the Churchmen of North Platte, and Mr. I. L. Bare, Secretady of the Chamber of Commerce, spoke in behalf of the community. Bishop Tuttle again spoke reminiscently, saying, "Fifty-four years ago, at this hour, I was reading the first service of the Church ever heard in North Platte." He spoke of the old days on the frontier and of the lessons of one hundred years of service of the Missionary Society and of the progress gained. In the afternoon a motor ride was taken to the Cody Ranch, and in the evening a service was held in the Church of Our Saviour, at which all the Bishops present spoke.

On June 10 the Bishop was to have reached Denver, which city he first entered on June 11, 1867, on a stage coach with a rifle on his knee. He was to be met by the Mayor and a committee of citizens, the Boy Scouts and a brass band, be received with an address of welcome by the Rev. Sherman Coolidge, a full-blooded Indian priest, and escorted in a stage coach to the home of Mrs. Lefevre. The consecration of Bishop Ingley was to take place on Saturday, June 11.

Letter to Authorities of the Eastern Church.

At the April meeting of the Commission to confer with the authorities of the Eastern Orthodox and Old Catholic Churches in the Church Missions House in New York City, a letter was unanimously agreed upon and sent as directed by the last meeting of the House of Bishops held in St. Louis to the Acting Patriarch and the Holy Governing Synod of Constantinople, in reply to a communication received in September last. The Bishops express the sympathy of the American Church for the inhuman persecutions to which many Eastern Christians are subject, refer to the services held in many places in the interest of the Eastern Churches and in furtherance of unity therewith, express appreciation of their suggestions for closer co-operation and fellowship through various means which are recited and suggest further a joint commission for preparing a bilingual edition of the liturgies of the respective Churches. Conviction is expressed that the time is fulfilled for the answer to our Lord's great eucharistic prayer for the visible unity of His followers and rejoicing in every token of its approach. The letter is signed by Bishops Tuttle, Gailor and Darlington and Dr. B. Talbot Rogers as Secretary of the Commission.

Daughters of the King.

Mrs. Felix G. Ewing, of Cedar Hill, Tenn., President of the Order of Daughters of the King for the Province of Sewanee, has issued a pamphlet with interesting information concerning the history and purposes of the Order, a recognized branch of the Church Service League, with its definite object for the extension of the kingdom of Christ among young women. Chapters are quietly but actively at work in many places in this province, but it is felt that they ought to be greatly multiplied, and would be if the simple methods and purposes of the Order were better known. Even in very small mission congregations where a sufficient number of women to form a chapter cannot be had, it is suggested that one or two unite with others in like circumstances to form a "Bishop's Chapter" and report their work directly to the Bishop. Mrs. Ewing publishes strong letters from a number of Bishops and other clergymen of prominence, testifying to the great value of the work and influence of the Daughters of the King in parish life and its spiritual development. The Order, as is well known, is closely parallel in its working to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, emphasizing the same points of endeavor through the same means. Mrs. Ewing will be glad to give information to any persons in her province who are interested.

Sewanee Summer Training School for Workers.

The program for the session of this school for 1921, to be held August 9 to 22 inclusive, is now out. It contains full information as to the excellent courses offered for training leaders in the various departments of the Church's work, as well as to expenses, railroad rates and other items. Address the Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., at Charleston, S. C., until July 25, and after that date at Sewanee, Tenn. A comprehensive outline of the program was given in our issue of May 21.

St. Mary's Conference.

St. Mary's Conference was held according to the program planned, beginning Monday night, May 30, and ending Friday night, June 3. The attendance was not so large as it has sometimes been, but there was almost one hundred present. The quality of the work done was admirable, the atmosphere inspiring and the Conference on the whole one of the happiest ever held.

The main part of the work was done by the Rev. Charles H. Boynton, Ph. D., General Theological Seminary, and the Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, Secretary of the Department of Social Service. The Rev. Henry H. Covington, of Norfolk, was very helpful in his devotional addresses. The Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker and the Rev. W. A. Jonnard added much to the study of Religious Education. Miss Emily Watkins and Miss Margaret McGuffer gave helpful conferences on the Girls' Friendly Society.

There was enjoyable music in the evening in the auditorium, and one new feature was the beautiful devotional service out on the lawn under the trees. Tuesday night Bishop Darst conducted conferences on the Nation-Wide Campaign; Wednesday Bishop Cheshire gave interesting reminiscences on old North Carolina times and churchmen; Thursday night Dr. Boynton presented vivid pictures on the screen and gave graphic descriptions on scenes and experiences in connection with his travels in the interest of the Near East Relief. The culmination of it all took place in the chapel Friday night in a most searching, helpful and inspiring sermon by Dean Lathrop. The missionary pageant was also given, which was very well done, and done in an atmosphere of reverence and sympathetic attention.

Commencement at the University of the South.

The fifty-third commencement exercises of the University of the South were opened on Thursday, June 9, with the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees at 9 o'clock in the morning, at which time an address was made to the Board by Bishop Gailor, Chancellor of the University. The Board remained in session during the entire commencement exercises, which came to an end on Tuesday, June 14.

The baccalaureate sermon was preached Sunday, June 12, by the Rev. William H. Milton, of New York City, for many years rector of St. James' Church, Wilmington, N. C., and a preacher of note.

The Hon. Christie Benet, of Columbia, S. C., delivered the commencement address to the graduating class on Tuesday, June 14. Mr. Benet was appointed to the United States Senate in 1918 to succeed the late Hon. B. R. Tillman, of South Carolina.

On the evenings of Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 9, 10 and 11, contests in debate, oratory, declamation and essay were held in the Sewanee Union. The annual reception given by the Vice-Chancellor to the students, professors, residents and visitors took place on Friday evening, June 10.

The Rev. James M. Maxon, rector of Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn., preached the annual sermon to the St. Luke's Brotherhood on Sunday night, June 12.

Monday, June 13, by resolution of the Board of Trustees, was turned over to the alumni, and alumni activities were held throughout the day. In the morning the alumni attended chapel exercises in a body, and a tablet to the late Ven. Hudson Stuck, D. D., for many years Archdeacon of Alaska, was unveiled. The annual meeting of the associated alumni was held at the Sewanee Union. Mr. David A. Shepherd, until last year organizing secretary of the alumni, is president of the Alumni Association.

The commencement day exercises were held at 10 o'clock in All Saints' Chapel. The Latin salutatory was delivered by Thomas Exam Hargrave, of Nebraska, and the valedictory oration by Moultrie Guerry, of South Carolina. Degrees in the college and the theological department were conferred at this service by the Vice-Chancellor of the University, and honorary degrees by the Chancellor. The medals and prizes won during the year were also awarded during these exercises.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Commencement at St. Christopher's School.

The commencement of St. Christopher's School, Richmond, took place on Thursday and Friday, June 9 and 10. On both days patrons and friends of the school were present in large numbers and took part heartily in the exercises, which were held under the pines on the lawn.

Thursday was given up to the lower school, and the boys, under the leadership of Richmond Gray, Form 4, master of ceremonies, showed by the manner in which they went through the parts assigned to them the effect of the training they had received at the hands of Miss Bouldin, the principal, and her able assistant, Miss Rice. Features of the occasion were the speeches made by Richmond Gray, Stuart B. Gibson and Robert S. Bosher, all of Form 4, and the perfect rendition of the declamations and other pieces made by the members of the various forms. Miss Bouldin was particularly happy in her parting words to the boys of Form 4 graduated to the upper school.

The single drawback to the occasion was the absence of Bishop Brown, President of the Board, who was kept away by an out-of-town engagement.

Friday was Upper School Day. After the opening service conducted by the headmaster, the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, rector of Grace Church, Richmond, delivered the annual address, a forceful presentation of the duties and responsibilities of the boys to Church and State. It was listened to with interest and close attention, and was heartily applauded. Following the annual presentation of the Lee-Jackson Trophy Cup, the rendition of selections by members of Form 8, and the delivery of the school monograms to the successful athletes by Mr. Fitzgerald, of the faculty, distinctions and prizes were awarded, announcement of scholarship awards was made, and diplomas of full graduation were delivered to E. M. Archer, Richard H. Johnson, Jr., and Berkeley Williams, Jr., of Form 8.

The announcement of the founding of a new prize at the school, the gift of Bishop Brown was received with enthusiastic applause, and the Bishop's words to the school, in which he showed his deep interest in the institution and his confident faith in its future, were listened to with profound interest.

After a valedictory delivered by Berkeley Williams, Jr., of the graduating class, the exercises were brought to a close by the singing of "Blest Be the Tie That Binds" by the boys of the school, and the benediction pronounced by the Bishop.

Among the boys especially distinguished in the commencement were A. S. B. Nolting and Peyton R. Williams, winners of the prize for highest scholarship, and Francis J. Duke, winner of the Williams Madel for excellence in Latin and the Bryan prize for leadership.

Stuyvesant School, Warrenton.

In his review of the school year Mr. E. B. King, headmaster, spoke of the improvement in the scholarship and of the proposed plans for enlarging the school in the near future. According to the statistics in the annual report of the Secretary of the College Entrance Examination Board, the method of individual instruction employed at Stuyvesant enables boys to take examinations at an age much below that of the average school. Messrs. S. C. Brittle, of Warrenton; Moses Ely, of New York; Harrison Nesbit, of Pittsburgh; Robert F. Perkins, of Boston; Seymour H. Preston, of Warrenton; Edward M. Weld and J. P. Whiton-Stuart, of New York, are members of the Advisory Board in charge of the new building plans. Although no positive action has yet been taken, plans are under way to divide the school into an upper and a lower school. The lower school, for small boys, will retain the present buildings. For the upper school it is hoped that new buildings will very shortly be erected. The school already has nearly a hundred acres of land, and the plans will embrace a scheme for ultimate development into a large school.

Among the prize winners were the following: Henrly Ward Abbot, Jr., of Boston; Frank Emery Lyon, of Philadelphia; Robert Taylor Scott Keith, of Warrenton; George Wilder Neville, Colonia, N. J.; Thomas Deford, Jr., Baltimore; William Bassinger Lawton, Washington, D. C.; William Byrd Clark, New York; James Hillhouse Alexander, Augusta, Ga.; Frederic William Scott, Jr., Richmond.

The Emily Klein North Scholarship for the following year was awarded to William Bassinger Lawton, of Washington.

The Susan LeRoy King Scholarship was awarded to Robert Taylor Scott Keith, of Warrenton.

The Bishop Brown Scholarship, at the bestowal annually of Bishop Brown, was awarded to Frederick Louis Grammar, of Leesburg, Va.

The members of the graduating class were Henry Hard Abbot, Jr., of Boston; William Byrd Clark, of New York; Thomas Deford, Jr., of Baltimore; Frederic William Scott, Jr., of Richmond.

The vestry of St. James' Church, Ashland, have accepted with many expressions of regret the resignation of the Rev. Edward L. Goodwin, D. D., who has felt himself unable to continue longer in active charge of a parish, and has conferred upon him the honorary title of Rector-Emeritus.

St. Thomas' Church, Ginter Park, Richmond: The Executive Committee of the Nation-Wide Campaign of St. Thomas' Church, of which Mr. R. C. Beverley is chairman, is planning to organize at a special meeting and to carry through the third and final year of the Nation-Wide Campaign. St. Thomas' was the first church in the United States to pledge its quota in the campaign of 1920. The rector, the Rev. E. C. Pedrick, and the vestry have received the plans and estimates for the new $20.000 parish house, and work on the building is expected to be commenced this fall.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor.

Historical Celebration, Jamestown Island.

On the Third Sunday after Trinity, June 12, at 3 P. M., Holy Communion was celebrated at Jamestown, in commemoration of the first service held in America. Fully one thousand people, of every protestant denomination, attended the services, which were held in the open fort, where church benches had been placed and an altar set up, banked with flowers grown at Jamestown. The pulpit from which Bishop Tucker spoke was placed between two trees and the communion service used was the old Jamestown communion silver which is still in the possession of Bruton Parish Church, the rector of which, the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones, has been appointed by the Bishop of the Diocese rector of the dormant parish of James City, in which Jamestown is situated. The old silver is carried by him each year to the Island.

Bishop Tucker delivered an historical address, and celebrated Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. E. Ruffin Jones.

Consecration of St. John's, Portsmouth.

St. John's Church, Portsmouth, Va., was the scene of a beautiful and impressive service on Sunday, May 29, when Bishop Tucker consecrated the church.

The Bishop preached from the text, "I was glad when they said unto me, we will go into the house of the Lord." He referred to the history of the church, which was organized in 1848, and to the fact that the old church was consecrated on the 29th of May in the year 1850. His references to the former rectors, especially the Rev. James Chisholm, who died a martyr in the yellow fever epidemic in 1855 while ministering to the people of the stricken town, and the Rev. John D. Powell, who served the church for twenty-seven years, were very touching. He also referred in delightful words to the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim and the Rev. Z. S. Farland, former rectors.

Dr. Joseph Grice, the senior warden, presented the evidences of freedom from debt, and the rector, the Rev. William A. Brown, read the Consecration Sentence. A large congregation was present. There were used for the first time a new set of communion linens given by a member of the congregation and a silver bread box made from old silver given by members of the congregation to perpetuate the sacred associations of the pieces of silver given. The recently changed communion rail and the new tilings of the sanctuary added much to the attractiveness of the church.

Mr. Brown has gone for a three months' trip to Europe, as a delegate to the International Rotary Convention in Edinburgh, Scotland, representing the Portsmouth Club, of which he is now the president. A purse presented to him by members of his congregation and other friends will enable him to go into the other countries of Europe for a rather extended trip.

St. Peter's, Norfolk.

The Rev. W. L. Loflin has resigned from St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, to take effect July 1. Mr. Loflin came to Norfolk ten months ago and found the parish in a decidedly run-down condition. The former rector had resigned in May, 1920, and during the summer months the services were conducted by a devoted layman who kept the church doors open, with the assistance of one of the city clergy, who took one service each Sunday.

When Mr. Loflin took charge he found seventy-five communicants in the parish. By pastoral work of the hardest kind he has increased this number to three hundred, seventy-nine of whom were received by confirmation, one class numbering fifty, the largest class ever confirmed by Bishop Tucker. Others were received by transfer, and still others were those who had drifted away from the church and were brought back. Approximately one hundred baptisms were conducted in the church by Mr. Loflin. The offerings for parish maintenance have been the largest in the history of the parish.

During the last ten months the church has been completely renovated. The chancel has been enlarged, a new altar put in, a new solid silver communion service has been secured, a new baptismal font has been given and the organ has been rebuilt. The roll of scholars in the Sunday school has been increased in this time from sixty-five to one hundred and sixty.

Mr. Loflin leaves to become rector of St. Luke's Memorial Church, Cleveland, Tenn. His removal from St. Peter's is felt to be a very decided loss to the parish, and his place will be a hard one to fill.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Luther G. H. Williams, of Indianola, Miss., has been called to Abingdon, Va.

The Rev. Francis H. Craighill, who was until recently in charge of the missionary stations near Wytheville, left on Tuesday, June 7, for his new charge, at Rocky Mount, N. C.

The Rev. Normand E. Taylor, of Buena Vista, has been called to succeed Mr. Craighill. Mr. Taylor's people, however, are endeavoring to persuade Mr. Taylor to remain with them.

Mr. Richard Baker and Mr. J. Manly Cobb, students at the Virginia Seminary, will do missionary work at St. Peter's-in-the-Mountains and Endicott respectively. They will enter upon their duties June 21.

Mr. Beverley Boyd, a postulant for the ministry and for the present a student at the University of Virginia, has been assigned by the Bishop to the work at Schuyler, where he will serve during the summer.

The Rev. N. P. Huntington, a member of the staff of St .Paul's Cathedral, Boston, has been called to work in the Archdeaconry, with residence at Norton.

The Rev. Walter R. Noe, of Wilmington, N. C., and the Rev. A. R. Parshley, of Clinton. N. C., will be in charge of St. Peter's Church, Roanoke, for the months of July and August respectively.

The Bishop preached the baccalaureate sermon at Porter Military Academy, Charleston, S. C., on June 5, and on June 12 he preached the baccalaureate sermon at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Va.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

New Enterprises to Aid Church Work.

Two projects which are certain to affect the Church and its prospects in Metropolitan New York have just been started after years of discussion. One of them is a tunnel under the Hudson River, consisting of tubes for east-bound and west-bound traffic, and to be devoted to such traffic—teams, drays, autos. The other is the creation of a new harbor of New York, opening directly upon the lower bay, which is practically the ocean. It is known locally as Jamaica Bay. This vast harbor affords more dock frontage in miles than all of the Hudson and East Rivers now do, and it is so large that the ships of all the world might ride there at one time. Millions on millions are to be expended on these projects, connecting New York and New Jersey by land, and a new harbor to serve the entire New World.

The effect of these vast enterprises upon the growth of New York as a city, down town and in all parts of Manhattan Island, on Long Island, North New Jersey and Westchester County, and the effect of these vast enterprises upon the Church and its work, its growth and its ability to serve America and the world, cannot be painted in words. It can only be guessed at in the imagination, when it is helped out by the record of tremendous growths in past generations.

Endowment of the Episcopacy in the Diocese of New York, completion of the Cathedral nave, larger use of volunteer laymen, with training school to secure efficiency, Church extension downtown and uptown, in the suburbs and far into rural districts—these are begun none too soon. Neither has enlarged work for the unfortunates in prisons and hospitals, and for men of the merchant marine. Right after the War Between the States a Church leader in New York predicted that New York City would some time cover all of Manhattan Island. What seems strange now is the fact that he was laughed at when he thus spoke in 1868, as being hopelessly visionary. The attitude of Church leaders has changed in our day.

Harvey's Statements Repudiated by New York Ministers.

Universally the statements made by Ambassador Harvey in London concerning the reasons why the United States entered the war, and the probable attitude of the government in regard to disarmament, were repudiated by New York preachers on Disarmament Sunday, June 5. The same preachers, on the same day, declared that the United States ought to lead in the movement toward limitation of disarmament.

Ascension Parish, Mount Vernon, will build a parish house at a cost of $75,000 to take the place of the present frame structure, and to be a memorial to the wife of the rector, who died a year or more ago in an epidemic of influenza. The rector is the Rev. M. L. Brown. It is reported that already upwards of $50,000 has been subscribed. The present parish house formed the original church. In new plans the present church's seating capacity is to be increased.

The Rev. John Mark Ericsson, rector of St. John's Parish, Yonkers, has resigned after a service of about a decade. He will go abroad at an early date, accompanied by Mrs. Ericsson. St. John's is the historic parish of Yonkers and the Diocese, dating from 1694, or two years older than Trinity, New York. Its location is Getty Square, and its plant one of the most complete in the Diocese.

C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Memorial to the Rev. Dr. McKim.

The new tower and chimes to be erected at Epiphany Church by the people of Epiphany Parish and others, in memory of Dr. R. H. McKim, will probably be started very soon, according to present plans. A large mass meeting was held at the church on Wednesday, June 8, when addresses were made concerning this memorial by members of the vestry, representing the church, William Knowles Cooper, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A., representing the community at large, and Dr. Freeman, present rector of the parish. In speaking of the memorial, Dr. Freeman said: "Nothing seems so symbolic of the qualities and characteristics of Dr. McKim as a strong tower, a tower standing four-square that would witness to permanence to strength and to uprightness. Furthermore, it would be a tower, standing upon one of the great highways of this city in the eye of the people, just as for a generation he whom the tower memorializes stood before the people of this city a strong and unfailing witnesss of these great fundamental principles that underlie and make secure our individual and corporate life. The tower also, in its chime of bells, will symbolize another distinguishing quality in Dr. McKim's ministry. His was always a clarion call, and, however men might differ with him, they ever recognized in him the elements of fearlessness, sincerity and high consecration."

The architect's description of the proposed change is as follows:

"The main vestibule is to have a marble floor and Caen-stone walls. A vaulted ceiling of Caen-stone will give it a more churchly appearance. Out of the vestibule will lead the two new stairs to the church south gallery. The stairs will be of oak with plaster walls pierced by high gothic windows, which will also light the second story hall of the south gallery. From this hall a large stained glass window will face the street. The south gallery will be extended northward, affording double the present seating capacity.

Upon the present brick wall of the tower are to be added two high stories crowned by a slender sphere. In the higher story chimes will be placed. By way of improving the church ventilation, it is proposed to remove part of the wall separating the choir from the Parish House Assembly Hall and substitute accordion doors or heavy hangings. All the dormer windows over the nave will be made to open."

In the tower thus described will be installed a superior chime of bells, and in the vestibule an appropriate tablet in a conspicuous place will tell the story of the great service of the great and good man whom it memorializes. It is estimated that these improvements will cost about $60,000, and it is the desire of those in charge that the number of subscribers to this memorial fund be large and inclusive of the great body of people who loved and honored Dr. McKim.

At the mass meeting on Wednesday night it was reported that $18,500 was subscribed, and it is hoped that subscriptions will be made promptly so that work may begin at an early date. Mr. M. O. Chance, postmaster of Washington and vestryman of Epiphany Parish, was made chairman of the Canvassing Committee.

The cornerstone for the new building for All Saints' Church, Chevy Chase, was laid by Bishop Harding, assisted by the rector, the Rev. J. W. Austin on Monday, June 13. Just twenty years ago on this date the cornerstone of the present church was laid, so that this occasion will have a peculiar interest for the people. The present church building will be used as a Sunday school, and the new building, when completed, will seat five hundred or more people. It will be planned to harmonize in design with the present church building, guild hall and rectory, the whole forming a coherent architectural group. The salient point in the design is a square tower fronting on Chevy Chase Circle. The style is English gothic and the material Cleveland Park stone. For the work now in hand the congregation has raised among themselves about $50,000, including a gift of $8,000 for a memorial organ and a gift for a memorial altar.

Students of Gunston Hall have been awarded honors for the largest representation in the Bible Questions Contest which has been carried on by one of the daily papers of Washington. Gunston Hall is not a church school, but a large proportion of the girls are Episcopalians and attend St. Margaret's Church while in Washington.

M. M. W.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. LaMothe to Be Consecrated June 29.

The Rev. John D. LaMothe, D. D., rector Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, will be consecrated Bishop for the Missionary District of Honolulu in Ascension Church, St. Peter's Day, June 29.

An Impressive Service.

On Thursday, June 9, in the Chapel of the Diocesan House in Baltimore, the Rev. John W. Torok, D. D., former Roman Catholic Monsignor, was received as a priest into the ministry of our Church by the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland. The Rev. Dr. W. M. Dame, president of the Standing Committee, presented Dr. Torok. All the members of the Standing Committee were present, and also the two recommending priests, the Rev. Thomas Burgess, Secretary Foreign-Born Americans' Division, Department of Missions, and the Rev. George E. St. Claire.

The service, which was made wonderfully impressive, consisted of the reading of the Canon and an address by the Bishop to the applying priest, who then made a formal declaration and was pronounced received into our ministry by the Bishop, after which the Holy Communion was celebrated.

Dr. Torok, who was a Greek Catholic (or Uniat) and a professor in the Uniat College in Rome, where he was in touch with the people of many races, is well known in Europe as a Hungarian patriot and scholar. He came to this country in 1920 by permission of the Roman Propaganda Fidei Congregacio for the purpose of lecturing to the Hungarians on anti-Bolshevik propaganda. He has taken out his first papers as an American citizen. Dr. Torok takes his place as a special assistant to the Rev. Thomas Burgess in the Foreign-Born Americans' Division of the Department of Missions, where he will prove of great value in helping to lead the Americanization and religious work among the unchurched immigrants from Middle Europe in the United States, and where he will be of great assistance in many ways in addition to his particular work among the unchurched Magyars in America. Enormous numbers of these have left the Church of their native land and are out of touch with all religion and isolated from American life. They are thus a natural prey to Bolshevik propaganda.

Three Convocations Hold Interesting Meetings.

During the month of June three convocations of Maryland have held their sessions. The Convocation of Cumberland, on June 1, every member present, and the Convocation of Annapolis, on June 3. Sunday School Work was the chief topics of discussion at these two convocations. At the Convoation of Towson, held Wednesday, June 8, the Rev. Dr. Peter Ainslie, of the Church of the Disciples of Christ, widely known for his work and interest in the subject of Church Unity, gave a vivid presentation of the work of Geneva Conference. After an extended address, he was persuaded to talk for more than one-half an hour longer at the afternoon session.

Dr. Ainslie's chief point for emphasis was that no Church organization is in the position to invite all others to consolidate with it. In response to a large number of questionnaires which the Commission on Faith and Order had sent to various communions, asking what each had in its possession vital and fundamental which no other Church had, only two answers were returned, and these from very small communions.

The cornerstone of the new Holy Trinity Church, in a growing section of Baltimore City, was laid by Bishop Murray on the afternoon of St. Barnabas' Day, June 11. This is one of the new pieces of construction work under the impetus of the Nation-Wide Campaign. Holy Trinity Church was recently sold to a colored congregation, and will consolidate with its own mission chapel on the new site. The Rev. W. Weir Gilliss is rector. The address at the cornerstone laying was made by the Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore. The Bishop was also assisted in the service by the Rev. Edw. T. Helfenstein, D. D., Archdeacon of Maryland, and Rev. Romilly P. Humphries, D. D., Archdeacon of Baltimore.

Open-Air Services: During the summer season the Rev. Arthur Chilton Powell, D. D., rector of St. Mary's, Hampden, conducts community open air services on the beautiful grounds surrounding St. Mary's Church.

The Women's Work, under the Church Service League, of the Diocese of Maryland, Mrs. Julius E. Freeman, president, has met with such success during the past year, and has grown to such proportions that a whole floor of the Diocesan House, 409 North Charles Street, Baltimore, will be altered and adapted for them, and turned over in the fall for their exclusive use.

R. F. H.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop Helps the Unemployed.

The Bishop has made a gift of one hundred pounds of soft cured codfish to the Social Service Federation of Savannah for distribution among the poor of the city. The fishermen of New Foundland have not been able to dispose of their catches this season due to the depression of business, and having been appealed to by a benefactor who is aiding these fishermen, the Bishop conceived the idea of purchasing some of the codfish for the use of the unemployed of the city, and in this way help the fishermen of New Foundland.

Organization of a Parent-Teacher Association of St. Paul's Sunday school, Savannah, the Rev. S. B. McGlohan, rector, has recently been completed. The object of the association is "to study the welfare of the child in the home, the Sunday school and the community, and to create a better mutual understanding between the parents and teachers, and to secure their co-operation in all work for the interest of the children." The meetings will be held monthly.

E. D. J.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Two Churches Consecrated.

On Trinity Sunday two churches which have long been used were consecrated, Calvary Church, Bayonne, the Rev. Claude Soares, rector, by Bishop Lines, and Christ Church, Harrison, by Bishop Stearly. The consecration of the first named church was made possible by the gift of $1,600 from Mrs. J. M. Smith, the widow of a former very devoted vestryman of the church. This set the church free for consecration after more than fifty years. Letters from former and neighboring rectors were received, one of them having special interest, from the Rev. Philo W. Sprague, who had charge of Calvary Church close to the beginning of his ministry in 1878.

Christ Church, Harrison, has long stood in its place, and was for twenty-five years, before the Rev. R. J. Riblet became rector in 1918, associated with

(Continued on page 21)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Ed. Sec.

THE LITTLE ONE WHOM NOBODY KNOWS.

All was ready. The danseurs had been rehearsing vigorously for four whole days. Don't think, gentle reader, that they were practicing the "pernicious modern" dance which is causing disruption in Baptist churches, and has attracted the heavy artillery of State health officers. Such things do not invade the quiet columns of the Southern Churchman.

These performers had been rehearsing, vigorously and perspiringly, a balloon dance to the rendering of which sundry guests had been invited.

As we have said, all was ready. The chairs were placed in the back yard for the audience. The orchestra, puffing energetically and almost apoplectically upon a comb covered with tissue paper, was in readiness, and the danseurs, three little girls of eight, nine and six years respectively, were eager to begin.

Then the blow fell. "The lady across the street says she has got to go to supper, and can't come to be audience," dismally announced one of the performers. She had "specially been invited and had accepted," and it was "real mean of her not to come at the last minute."

This meant that 25 per cent. of the chairs would be vacant.

The six-year-old performer rose nobly to the occasion. She disappeared, and presently returned with a youngster ever smaller than herself. When questioned as to who she was, she replied: "She is the little girl who lives over the store whom nobody knows, but she'll do fine for a audience."

Now the seats being filled, everything proceeded splendidly. The orchestra puffed away, the tissue paper becoming moister and moister and the complexion of the puffer growing more and more glowing, without the use of cosmetics. The danseurs, too, became more and more moist until finally they fell into poses of graceful exhaustion—with balloons poised on hand or foot, according to the skill of its owner.

Then this same resourceful dancer, having recovered her breath, took the conscripted audience by the hand with the remark that no doubt she was tired and wanted to go home, and led her off. The unexpected and unexpectant guest protested that she was not tired and did not want to go home, but her six-year-old fairy god-mother was obdurate and reconsigned her to the oblivion from whence she came.

As the writer, who was also a part of the audience, watched the disappearance of the "little girl whom nobody knows," and thought upon her impromptu compulsory coming. He was reminded of the story of those other guests who were compelled to come in from by-ways and hedges that the table should be filled.

He thought also of the thousands of "little girls whom nobody knows" in our crowded cities, who are living over stores and shops, and in all sorts of hot and stuffy places—and he wondered. Are we doing so much as to invite them to witness a balloon dance in a cool, shady back yard upon pleasant green grass?

Now is the time that many of you, my readers, are planning for your "vacation" at seaside or on mountain top. Have you thought of "the little girls (and boys) whom nobody knows"? Have you made your contribution to the Salvation Army Camp Fund, or to any other organization—and there are several which make it their business to see to it that children who could not otherwise get a little outing in the country should do so?

The writer once had the privilege of knowing a little woman, a frail, delicate little person, who lived in Baltimore and spent her summers in organizing these expeditions of children to the country, in collecting "fresh air" funds and interesting people to give of themselves as well as of their means for this great cause.

Her methods were varied and numerous.

One of them was to interest some rural community through the county paper, or an ehergetic public-spirited individual, and induce a number of farmers to take from one to five of these city children into their homes for a week, getting perhaps a hundred or so placed in one locality. Then she would charter a car or secure charity passes from the railroads.

Interested persons from the city end of the work would take the children, and go for them at the end of the week.

This plan had the advantage of enabling country people who could not give largely of money to render a great service by opening their homes to the little ones of the city.

It also brought these two sets of God's children together, which is always a good thing. One of the greatest causes of friction in the world is the inability to get the other person's viewpoint, and a most excellent way to remove this ground of misunderstanding is through contact.

The "green countryman" is a common expression, but the ignorance of the suburbanite about rural things is quite as great as the greenness of the country boy or girl in town.

It is recorded of one of these "fresh air children," as the farmers called them, a little girl who perhaps "lived over a store and whom nobody knew," that one evening, while watching the milking, with the cows standing around reflectively chewing their cud, that she turned to the farmer with the exclamation, "Mister, does you furnish all the gum for these cows?"

Sometimes, too, casual acquaintances formed in this way have developed into lasting and valuable friendships helpful to both the rural and city dwellers.

As we have said, this little lady was frail and delicate, and after a while her soul outgrew the body and God unshackled it from its shell of flesh and blood and touched her with the finger of His promoting power, so that now no doubt she is rendering Him some greater service in a larger field.

But somehow we feel that the spirit of Katherine G. Speer (some of you may have known her) looks upon the earth when the sun's hot, piercing rays strike fiercely into back streets and alleys, and that through that "mystic sweet communion" which we have "with those whose rest is won," she inspires people who can to give, and those who will to serve in this cause of gaining fresh air for God's children who would otherwise not find it.

Who knows? Perhaps it was she who put those words into the mouth of that little six-year-old girl, which in turn has caused the writing of this page on behalf of the little ones whom nobody knows.

Perhaps, too, she will follow this message as it goes to our subscribers throughout the country, and will say to them as they read. "Inasmuch as ye do it unto the least of these my brethren, ye do it unto Me."

Russian Children Repatriated.

American interest in the strange around-the-world journey of the Yomei Maru, chartered by the Red Cross to take the 780 children of the colony found starving in Siberia in 1918 from Vladivostok to Halila, Finland, has been reopened by the recent return to America and thence to his home in Honolulu of Major Riley H. Allen, Red Cross officer in charge of the expedition. Every one of the children has been returned to his family. Contrary to expectations, most of the children, including those of Polish extraction, were claimed by their families in or near Petrograd, the city from which they had been sent three years before.

Anxiety had been expressed in this country, specially in Polish circles, lest in returning the children to Soviet Russia the Red Cross was submitting them to a dangerous fate. It developed, however, that the Soviet censor did not interfere with, and to that extent cooperated with, the continental newspapers, American consuls and representatives in all parts of Europe, the League of Red Cross Societies and the American Red Cross, in an effort to locate the parents who were supposedly scattered throughout Europe. Although most of the children were repatriated in Russia, some were sent to other parts of Europe.—Survey.

Family Department

JUNE.

1. Wednesday.
5. Second Sunday after Trinity.
11. Saturday. S. Barnabas.
12. Third Sunday after Trinity.
19. Fourth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Friday. Nativity S. John Baptist.
26. Fifth Sunday after Trinity.
29. Wednesday. S. Peter.
30. Thursday.

Collect for Fourth Sunday After Trinity.

O God, the protector of all that trust in Thee, without Whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy; Increase and multiply upon us Thy mercy; that, Thou being our Ruler and Guide, we may so pass through things temporal, that we finally lose not the things eternal. Grant this, O heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. John Baptist's Day.

Almight God, by Whose providence Thy servant, John Baptist, was wonderfully born, and sent to prepare the way of Thy Son, our Saviour, by preaching repentance; Make us so to follow His doctrine and holy life that we may truly repent according to His preaching; and after His example constantly speak the truth, boldly rebuke vice, and patiently suffer for the truth's sake; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Divine Love.

Love bade me welcome; yet my soul drew back,
Guilty of dust and sin.
But quick-ey'd Love, observing me grow slack
From my first entrance in,
Drew nearer to me, sweetly questioning
If I lack'd anything.

"A guest," I answered, "worthy to be here."
Love said, "You shall be he."
"I, the unkind, ungrateful? Ah, my dear,
I cannot look on Thee."
Love took my hand, and smiling did reply,
"Who made the eyes but I?"

"Truth, Lord; but I have marred them; let my shame Go where it doth deserve."
"And know you not," says Love, "who bore the blame?"
"My dear, then I will serve."
"You must sit down," says Love, "and taste My meat."
So I did sit and eat.

—George Herbert.

Confidence.

The world can get on with very little money—but it cannot do anything without confidence. In statesmanship the prevailing power is confidence in the people for the future. The worst kind of government will finally work itself out to its destruction, if let alone. There is an ineradicable tendency in human nature to better its condition if we only trust it.

Many a man has put out his unholy and unhallowed hands to steady what he thought was the trembling Ark of God. The Church's only weapon is the truth. Let it oe bravely and trustingly proclaimed, and all will be well.

We need confidence in ourselves. We are frail enough. But when we come into the presence of the truth and the truth comes into us, we find it puts a power into our hands that can overcome the carnal things of earth.

Many of us are afraid to stand upright and look error in the face. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" was the cry of a frail man who felt that he "could do all things through Christ strengthening me." Many a man has lost the battle through the failure to believe in himself.

We need confidence in God's people. They are the best people in the world. Many are their faults and more their follies, but after all has been said, this would be a sorry world if they should all be taken away at once. Imagine any neighborhood utterly devoid of any Christian man or woman. There are such. They are not desirable places to live in by any means.

God's people fail us at times. One said, "I was worse cheated by a church member than by any one in the world." Of course there are frauds in the professed Christians. There are counterfeits circulating among the currency of our nation. That fact does not make good dollars any less desirable.

When in trouble and in need of a counselor, we find them among those who live close to God.

When millions of dollars are to be raised for any charitable cause, the Church of God is always appealed to. Even the selling of Liberty Bonds was furthered by the Church. And when economy in the use of wheat was necessary, it was God's people who saved the bread that won the war.

The most altruistic work is Foreign Missions. Thousands of men and women go to the discomforts and dangers of foreign lands to carry a gospel to people who must be taught the value of it. Millions of dollars are given cheerfully to carry on this work. We can trust people who are animated with that spirit.

We need confidence in God's Providence. He has never failed. His plan is sure and certain, and though our impatient hearts cry out, we find that we can trust them to come to a glorious fulfilment. That plan in its utmost details was laid in eternity. Through the ages it has been slowly unfolding, and the day shows strong the hand of wisdom. Our petty affairs we can safely leave to His wisdom and goodness.

We need confidence in His Son. Life is a poor thing without faith. Jesus Christ asks it, and when we respond, life grows sweet and cheerful and full of meaning it never had before.

Why not have faith?—Presbyterian of South.

The Giving Heart.

After a long siege of illness a man was making slow progress toward recovery. The strain of nursing had told seriously on his wife's strength. The weather was suffocatingly hot. One day Mrs. Poll, her Italian scrub-woman, said pityingly to the tired, anxious wife: "You look-a bad. You feel-a sick?" The next time Mrs. Poll came she said: "You look-a bad; why not tak-a him to the country?"

"O Mrs. Poll, I can't afford it. I haven't the money," was the answer.

The woman then said softly, pleadingly, "I have-a money in the bank."

"The hand which I seized was coarse and hard-working; it was not even clean," said the tired wife in relating the incident, "but it seemed to me the most gracious hand in the world. What a pitiful little sum she had stored away I do not know, but if it had been millions it would not have been a greater offering. She seemed disappointed that I did not avail myself of her riches, and I could not make her understand she had given me something far above money."—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Power of Prayer.

Brooke Hunter.

Prayer has the power to make us strong
When we are tempted to do wrong;
It is the refuge which we find
When evil thoughts disturb the mind;
It turns us from alluring sin
And helps us to be pure within.
Though Satan would our souls ensnare,
He trembles at the power of prayer.

Prayer has the power our griefs to heal
When we the loss of loved ones feel;
It can our drooping spirits raise
And cheer us in misfortune's days,
And make us brave and patient here
When trusted friends prove insincere
When we have trials hard to bear,
There's comfort in the power of prayer.

Prayer has the power to give us faith,
And banish all our fears of death;
For we are mortals, and should try
To gain immortal life on high,
By asking God, each day and night,
To guide us in the path of right.
Then we should here for heav'n prepare,
And win it through the power of prayer.

The Story of Sophie Wright.

A strong young acrobat from a circus, stranded in New Orleans, walked its streets one day wondering if anywhere he could find a helping hand to a better life. He saw a sign above a door, "Day School for Girls," and rang the bell. A slip of a girl, leaning on a crutch, her fair hair in a braid down her back, answered it. Would she teach him to read and write and cypher? He could pay nothing. Sophie Wright looked at him. There in the dull, unlovely street, in her poor little home, her great hour came to her. "I will help you," she said; "only, can you come at night? You see. I am teaching in two schools and studying in one and have no time all day, but at night I could teach you."

The night school began with the young acrobat. It grew till there were hundreds. When the whistles blew, from the foundries and factories, from wharves, warehouses and shops they came, boys of nine and men of fifty.

All unconscious, the men and boys of the streets learned from her the ancient vows of knighthood, "to live pure and follow the King," to reverence their own conscience and to honor womanhood. So passed the years in New Orleans.

Then the city, which from time to time bestows a silver loving cup on that citizen who has given most service, suddenly stirred and spoke, "The silver cup to Sophie Wright!"

"Present it at night!" the day workers cried. "Give it in the day!" the night workers cried. Through a long, bright afternoon and through the evening the festival lasted. By thousands the people thronged the great park. On the platform a woman, small, lame, white-haired, gently thanked the city and the cheering multitudes. But when her boys brought to her another cup made all of love and flowers and a check for $10,000 they had raised to lift the mortgage on the school, the tears welled up in the soft and shining eyes and overflowed.

Only a few years ago Sophie Wright finished her task. It was a light burden the boys from the night school bore into the church that day, but heavy enough and dear enough to plunge a whole city into mourning. Flags at half-mast, stores closed, Legislature adjourned, Jew, Catholic and Protestant, they came through the gently falling rain to honor her who, like the Lord, had said, "I am among you as he that serveth."

Right at your hand, in your own home, your town, your countryside, there is some work to which God calls you to make your small beginning. Sophie Wright "climbed the steep ascent of heaven through peril, toil and pain." Do you follow in her train? Are you making Christ's kingdom grow?

Bereaved.

Let me come in where you sit weeping, aye,
Let me, who have not any child to die,
Weep with you for the little one whose love
I have known nothing of.

The little arms that slowly, slowly loosed
Their pressure round your neck; the hands you used
To kiss. Such arms, such hands I never knew.
May I not weep with you?

Fain would I be of service—say something
Between the tears that would be comforting—
But ah! so sadder than yourselves am I,
Who have no child to die.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

Defeated.

The girl in the blue serge and the carefully mended gloves, in the end of the car, sat looking straight before her, with heavy, sullen eyes. A woman in the seat opposite thought what an unpleasant face it was. But the girl in the blue serge, it happened, was fighting the heaviest battle that had ever come her way. As she left the car and walked slowly up the wide avenue to Miss Davenport's, the battle grew fiercer and fiercer. The day before Miss Davenport had paid her for the embroidery she had been working upon for the past six weeks—exquisite, fairy-like monograms and wreaths that made Miss Davenport's trousseau the admiration of all her friends. The bill had been seventy-five dollars, but by a mistake Miss Davenport had paid her eighty-five—and Jennie Gow, carrying home a last bit of work that she had overlooked, carried also the extra ten dollars and the burden of her great temptation.

Ten dollars meant so much! It would mean, if she waited until mid-summer, a new suit in place of the three-year-old blue serge. Or shoes and a new hat—and how she did want a new hat! And what would ten dollars mean to Miss Davenport? Perhaps she meant to give it to her, anyway.

"Then why don't you thank her for it?" conscience intervened.

The girl turned about and walked back quickly.

Miss Davenport was in, the maid said, and after a moment Jennie was summoned upstairs. Miss Davenport, young and beautiful and radiant with her new happiness, met her cordially.

"O Miss Gow, you brought me that last sleeve, didn't you? I didn't miss it till the seamstress began to put things together. I'm just wild over your work, and so is everybody who sees it. Oh, and I must show you the strangest coincidence—a blouse I bought at McVeigh's that almost exactly matches it. Isn't that odd?"

"It is queer," Jennie answered. Her tongue felt stiff and heavy. She told herself that Miss Davenport did not give her a chance to say anything.

Miss Davenport, taking the blouse from a drawer, looked up with laughing eyes.

"But you don't know the strangest thing about it yet. It wasn't the blouse I bought. I didn't see any like this. I bought a ten-dollar one—just for traveling, you know—and this is marked fifteen. They must have made a mistake—mixed addresses or something; but if people will make mistakes, they must take the consequences. It wasn't my fault!"

"No—I—it's very pretty," Jennie stammered. "Thank you for the work, Miss Davenport."

A moment later she was out in the street. Her face was burning—and the ten-dollar bill was still in her pocket.—Youth's Companion.

The Bible.

The Bible is clear enough that the most timid swimmer may enjoy its waters without fear.

It is deep enough for the most expert swimmer to enjoy without touching bottom.

Its critics have been legion, but it is still here; they are gone.

It is the root of all good civil law, and good practice.

It has comforted millions, as no other book can comfort; and still continues to do so.

When nations ignored its teachings, they fell.

When nations embrace its teachings, they survive.

It tells what was, what is and what will be—an epitome of life from the cradle to the grave, and then beyond.

It is God's vital and inviolate Word, and can never be set aside.—John Watson.

Another Cat.

Mike and Pat worked for a wealthy farmer. They planned to turn burglars and steal the money which the farmer had hid in one of the rooms of his house. They waited until midnight, then started to do the job.

In order to get the money they had to pass the farmer's bedroom. Mike says, "I'll go first, and if it's all right you can follow and do just the same as I."

Mike started to pass the room. Just as he got opposite the door the floor creaked. This awoke the farmer, who called out, "Who's there?"

Mike answered with a "meaow!" The farmer's wife, being awake, said, "Oh, John, it's the cat," and all was quiet.

Now Pat started to pass the door, and as he got opposite it the door creaked again. The farmer called out again, louder than before, "Who's there?"

Pat answered, "Another cat."—Buffalo Times.

Then and Now.

Three years ago the great war was shaking the foundations of the world. Men were saying—some men—"Where is now thy God?" But it was not hard then for the most of us to hold to our faith. The problem did not seem difficult. The world had defied the moral universe, had set up the golden calf of self and greed, had held high carnival, and then, suddenly, had rolled within the sweep of the mills of the gods—the eternal gods of righteousness and truth and justice. These mills began to grind. We said "cause and effect, seedtime and harvest, the wind and the whirlwind." We thought we understood it. It was all going to be justified by a world new-born out of the night of unutterable retribution.

The armistice was signed. Alas, the world that was caught between the upper and nether millstones of the moral order seems to have been crushed too fine to be remade again. Where is the good will between the nations which was to mark the golden age—when, chastened by war, mankind should glory in a common brotherhood? When, as even we then boasted, "Humanity should be above all nations"? When to be 100 per cent. American meant self-denial or even death, if need be, to save a world beyond ourselves? Where sits today that dreamed-of group of statesmen, done with secret diplomacy, done with the eager hunger for place and power and control of the markets of the earth?

Never through the war did the whole seething turmoil of things look so without plan or purpose as does this confused and turbid whirl of opposing and contending forces now calling itself Europe. No wonder the faith not founded on the rock is swaying to and fro and wondering in the darkness whether this be God's world or the devil's.

Civilization after civilization has gone down into the pit. But faith has not died. It has always emerged with clearer vision and more radiant hope. So shall it yet again. We, too, we of this modern world, may vanish into the night like the empires of the past, and leave not a wrack behind of all our busy, rushing life. But what of that? This still is the faith of some of us, that "through the ages one eternal purpose runs," and that truth and right and love do now sit somewhere the crowned masters of the world.—Our Dumb Animals.

Trinity.

In the realm of thought even as in the realm of nature we often come upon that which we cannot understand. In the study of the Scriptures it is the same; there are things hard to understand, in fact, impossible to be comprehended by the human mind, and so we stand dumb before mystery. The existence of God as the Triune God is one of these unfathomable mysteries which the mind of man finds it hard to conceive. And still, as Christians we must accept this idea of God's mode of existence, for the simple and sufficient reason that it is revealed in the Bible. Here is where our faith must be given full play. After all, this implicit faith required of us to accept the doctrine of the Trinity has its counterpart in our every-day life. All our actions have in them the element of faith, and without this principle society could not hold together for a single day. Faith is the foundation of religion. It is impossible to prove the existence of God, and it is impossible to understand the doctrine that God's mode of existence is as Father, Son and Holy Ghost. But nevertheless to the Christian it is not a matter of doubt, but of firm faith, for it is the foundation stone of the Christian religion.

It is a reproach to man and a grief to our heavenly Father that we do not lean more trustingly upon Him. We cannot understand, but we believe. We cry, "O Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief."—St. Mark's Outlook.

We are assured of the victory of righteousness in the world.—R. S. Storrs.

For the Young Folks

My Task.

To love some one more dearly every day,
To help a wandering child to find his way,
To ponder o'er a noble thought and pray,
And smile when evening falls,
This is my task.

To follow truth as blind men long for light,
To do my best from dawn of day till night,
To keep my heart fit for His holy sight,
And answer when He calls,
This is my task.

And then my Saviour by and by to meet,
When faith has made her task on earth complete,
To lay my homage at the Master's feet
Within the jasper walls,
This crowns my task.
—The Foreign Field.

For the Southern Churchman.

Frances Runs Away.

Ethel Nelson.

Frances sat for a long time in the big arm-chair, her little mouth puckered up as though it had been drawn up with a string, a deep frown on her face and the tears just ready to come at a moment's notice. If her mother had come out on to the porch just then and spoken a word or have dropped a kiss on top of the curly yellow head as she usually did, the tears would probably have followed the curve of the fat little cheek and disappeared and all of her anger would have been gone and everything would have been rosy again.

But her mother did not come out and the tears stayed just inside of the big blue eyes, and Frances sat on in the arm-chair thinking that her mother was the very worst person in the world.

Frances thought that she was never allowed to do any of the nice messy things that other children did. Just at that time she wanted to play in the barnyard pond with David, the little boy next door. He had taken off his shoes and stockings and had gone to wade and catch tadpoles.

Frances thought that this was the very nicest game in all of the world, but mother thought differently.

"She is a bad, wicked old fing," she said. "I'll des wun away."

So she climbed down out of the big arm-chair and ran away. Had mother been looking out of the kitchen window at that moment she would have seen a yellow head bobbing up and down as Frances slipped through the garden gate and went down the beaten path between rows of blossoming potatoes. Might have seen her twist a loosened paling in the back fence and pass into the lane that led to the hills and deep shaded woods. But her mother was busy and did not see any of this, and Frances went on unmolested, "des wunning away."

On one side of the lane the hills rose one after another with deep hollows between, and both the hills and hollows were covered with tall trees and bushes, which to Frances had always seemed dark and forbidding. On the other side of the lane was a pasture, and in that pasture was a big red bull.

"Don't ever go through that pasture when you are wearing red," David had always told her. Frances looked at the woods and they were dark and lonely. She looked at the green pasture and there was the bull. She felt of the red ribbon she wore on her hair and decided to keep on down the middle of the lane.

The more she thought of the grief and disappointment that her mother must feel when she discovered that her little girl was gone, the faster her little fat legs carried her, and she looked neither to the right nor to the left as she ran down the lane.

"Uh, uh," something said suddenly right in her ear.

Frances stopped with a shudder and then gave a scream, for at her side stood a fierce-looking hog. It had come so quickly and unexpectedly that she had no time to be really afraid. So she picked up her little skirt, and shaking it in her face, said as fierce as her trembling little voice could say:

"Shoo, shoo," but he did not shoo quite as fast as she would have liked, and she was beginning to get really frightened when he turned and went back into the woods.

Frances drew a deep breath and went on her way, but not quite so fast this time. She had just reached the Black Hollow and was feeling brave again when—

"Quack, quack," came a funny sound from behind a tree and she stopped and listened. She could not imagine what in the world could make such a queer noise. "Quack, quack," came the noise again, and out from behind the tree came a big white goose, and behind him another and still another until five of them were coming toward her. Frances had seen geese before, but not so near and not quite so friendly, and she did not know just what to do.

But as she had had such good luck with the hog she decided to try shooing them, too. She picked up her skirt just as she had done before.

"Shoo, shoo, go away," she said, but the geese did not go away; instead they came closer and closer until they were almost touching her, and there was no more room in which she could back away from them. It was then that her courage fled completely, and turning around, she went back faster than she had come down.

She found the fence just as she had left it.

"My, it's dood to be home," she said, as she fastened the paling back in its place.

Coming out onto the porch a few minutes later, her mother saw a flushed faced little girl coming around the corner of the house.

"Muvver," Frances said, tears of gladness now filling her eyes, "I'se tum back."

"My blessed angel," her mother said as she gathered the child up into her arms. Her mother intuition told her that a tragedy had just been averted in the life of the child.

The big, wicked world looked so much safer from the shelter of loving arms that Frances smuggled up closer and said:

"I des I'll stay wif oo."

A tightening of those same loving arms was the very best answer in the world.

Weather Forecast.

My daddy looks in the paper to see
What kind of a day it is going to be.
My mother goes out and looks up at the sky,
And wonders if all of the clothes will get dry.

Now why should they look at the paper and sky?
I've a much better way on which to rely;
And if you'll believe me, I'll tell it to you—
I've tried it and know that it always comes true!

I tell by my pussy! (You know he's so clean—
The tidiest kitty that ever you've seen
When he washes his face and his eyes and his nose,
I watch his paw closely; and why—do you s'pose—

If he washes in front, but not back of his ear,
That day is just sure to be pleasant and clear,
But if he cleans front of his ear and behind,
You'll see the rain soon. Pussies know, as you'll find.
—Rose Brooks, in Christian Register.

Dogged Persistence.

In speaking to the Church school of St. Paul's Parish, Vickford, R. I., this spring, the treasurer of the Presiding Bishop and Council intimated that the children might like to purchase a dog for Bishop Rowe with their Lenten Offering. Thinking that $100, the price of a good dog, might be beyond the capacity of the school, he suggested that two or three legs, or even a tail, would be welcome. After Easter the rector wrote, "We have bought the whole dog," adding that the children were determined no part of the animal should be missing. They earned most of the money and made a record of $105 as compared with $32, the best they had done in the past.—The Spirit of Missions.

Jenny Rabbit's Air Ride.

"Look out, Jenny!" squeaked Ma Rabbit. For Ma Rabbit had seen Sharp Hawk suddenly swoop down between the two pecan trees which stood one on each side of her grass-house, and she knew that Sharp Hawk was not very friendly to the Rabbit family.

But her warning words came too late. Sharp came down like a flash of lightning upon little Jennie Rabbit, who was sunning herself at quite a distance from her home; and, seizing her in his hard claws, he hurriedly flapped his wings and started away toward the sky.

"Mamma! Mamma!" shrieked Jenny Rabbit, because she was being scratched by Sharp's claws, and, too, she was very much frightened. It was something new to her to be taking a ride so far from the earth.

But Sharp paid no attention to her cries, nor did he heed Ma Rabbit's moans of grief. He kept right on flying, heading straight for the high limb of a sycamore tree which stood a quarter of a mile away. It was on this high limb that he had stood and torn to pieces Bill Mouse and Jack Snipe when he had caught them for his dinner.

Just as he was about to reach the tree, however, at a time when Jenny Rabbit felt an unusually painful scratch of his claws, she began to wriggle desperately. It hurt her all the more to struggle, but something seemed to tell her to use her every effort to get free. And, to her joy, as a result of her violent twisting, she escaped from Sharp's claws, but not without leaving bits of fur hanging to his feet. She fell down, down, down through the limbs of a small oak tree nearby, which broke her fall, and at the same time kept Sharp Hawk from immediately swooping and catching her again.

As she struck the ground she felt a painful twinge in her foot, but at that very instant she saw a hollow log within a few feet of her. So she sprang on her three good feet to the hole in the log; and then, even though the pain in her foot was great, she scrambled to the farthest corner of the log. The hole was so small that it didn't leave her much room. She didn't mind that, however, for she knew Sharp Hawk couldn't get into it. Here, feeling secure and soon forgetting the pain in her foot, Jenny Rabbit went to sleep to pass the time until Sharp Hawk should leave the neighborhood of the log.

* * *

Ma Rabbit, not knowing what had happened to Jenny, was very sorrowful. "If Jenny hadn't gone so far from the house," she groaned to Pa Rabbit, when he had come home from his work in the turnip patch, three hours later. "I had so often told the dear child not to go too far from the house. But it's too late to even think of that now." And Mr Rabbit cried and cried.

Poor Pa Rabbit couldn't say anything in reply because of the big lump in his throat. He had loved Jenny so much that it was indeed a sorrow to him to think of her in the clutches of Sharp Hawk. So Pa could only put his arm about Ma Rabbit and try to comfort her in that way.

But while they were sitting there in front of their little house, weeping, they heard a rustling in the weeds bordering their lawn. Looking up, through their tears they saw—Jenny Rabbit!

"Oh, Jenny!" cried Ma, hopping to her and throwing her arms around her neck.

"Jenny!" shouted Pa joyfully, putting his arms around both of them.

"Oh, I'm so glad to get back," said Jenny. "I had to hobble all the way home, though, because of my sore foot."

Then Ma and Pa tenderly helped her to the front of the grass-house, where they heard Jenny tell how she had escaped from Sharp Hawk and how she had stayed in the log until Sharp had become tired of waiting for her and had gone away.—Presbyterian Banner.

Mother Says.

Mother says:
If you're thoughtful and polite;
Go to bed at eight each night;
Always hasten to do chores
And give up chairs for visitors,
Weed the garden, carry wood,
And be very still and good—

Mother says:
If you're faithful in your task;
ever beg ,but only ask;
Fold your napkin, say your prayers;
Put no gum upon the chairs;
Keep your bureau drawer quite neat;
Never walk through pools, but on
The sidewalk till the mud is gone;
And say "Thank you" often, and
Sit erect and walk and stand;
And wash well behind your ears;
Always wait until it clears
To wear your best clothes, and not fail
To hang your coat upon its nail—
You will find the people where
You live, like to have you there!

Our house has a pleasant yard,
I am trying very hard!

—Mary Caroline Davies.

The Rogue's Bargains—A Hindu Story.

There was once a rogue who had somehow or other secured a jar full of money and jewels worth a hundred thousand rupees. Determined to increase his wealth, he made public announcement that if any one would tell him something he did not already know, he would give that person the jar with its contents; but any one who tried to win the jar, and failed, would have to pay him a penalty of a hundred rupees.

Many people tried to win the prize, but no matter how strange the things they told the rogue, he would always say, "Yes, I knew that long ago!" And then he would claim the penalty. Thus he grew richer every day.

However, a clever young man once came to him, saying that he wished to try his luck for the jar.

"You know my terms?" asked the rogue.

"I do," answered the young man, "and I accept them."

"Very well, then," said the rogue. "What have you to tell me which you think I do not know?"

"Only this," replied the young man, who had taken care to bring a number of witnesses with him, "that your father borrowed this jar full of money and jewels from my father and never returned it. Now that my father is dead and I am his heir, it rightfully belongs to me."

"Oh!" began the rogue with his usual answer, "I knew—" Then he halted, for he suddenly saw that if he said he had known this for a long time, he would thus admit the debt and would consequently be compelled to give up the jar to the young man.

"Why," he started in again, "I never heard—" Then he stopped a second time, for he realized that if he acknowledged he had never before heard of this, he would be forced by his agreement to surrender the jar.

By this time the witnesses saw that the rascal had at last been caught, and with one accord they shouted out:

"Give up the jar! Give up the jar!"

He hesitated; whereupon they seized it and handed it to the young man. Then they drove the rogue out of town.

But the young man who had won the jar by his cleverness lived in great ease and comfort all the rest of his life.—W. Norman Brown, in St. Nicholas.

The Mud-Wasp's Home.

In Mexico and in some far-away parts of our own country houses and cities are built of mud, which hardens in the sun. They call it adobe, and travelers look upon the houses made of it with great curiosity.

But they might see many such houses at home, only much smaller. They are made by the little blue mud-wasp. Sometimes she will come right into your room and build her house in the corner before your eyes.

She comes in the window with her load—a bit of mud—and placing it on the wall, smooths and pats it with her feet and mouth, till she has laid a nice foundation, and then she goes out again for more.

As she must go to the garden to scrape her load together, it takes her several minutes; but comes flying back and plasters it all. When three or four trips have been made you can see quite a little patch on the wall. She scarcely stops to rest, but keeps going and coming putting layer after layer of mud on her foundation, and slowly building up a nice little room.

Inside of this room the mother wasp has laid an egg, and now we see what she has been working for. The house is for her children and she must make it comfortable for them.

When they come out of the eggs, they will be hungry, so she must provide food for them.

Perhaps she will find a fly or a spider. She will drag him along to the little mud-house and wall him up with the egg.

Then the mother goes away, and you will see her no more. But if you watch the little adobe house in the corner you will see the young mud-wasp come out through a neat round hole in its side.—Then he will fly away from his mud-house, never to return.—Virginia Guide.

Boats With Eyes.

The Chinese have a queer custom of painting an eye on the bow of a boat so that it may easily see its way through the water. Small as well as large boats must have an eye, and nothing must be permitted to cover it.

There is a story of an Englishman who, while traveling in China, let his feet dangle over the painted eye of the small boat in which he was sailing. The owner, becoming much excited, begged the Englishman not to interfere with the sight of the boat while it was moving through the water.

When the first railway was built in China some of the native workmen, who were familiar with boats, wanted to paint an eye on the front of the locomotive. Such a powerful creature as that, they said, should not be allowed to run about blind.—Youth's Companion.

A QUESTION.

I thought that foreign children
Lived far across the sea
Until I got a letter
From a boy in Italy.
"Dear little foreign friend," it said,
As plainly as could be!
Now I wonder which is "foreign,"
That other boy or me?

—Junior Red Cross News.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.

Special attention to out-of-town orders.

Samples sent upon request.

615 East Main Street. Richmond, Va.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

FAMINE RELIEF.

For the convenience of our readers we publish the addresses of the treasurers of the various Relief Funds whose appeals for the starving, and especially for starving children, are so urgent and touching. The Southern Churchman will forward contributions to any of these, but to save time, postage and possibility of miscarriage, checks would better be sent directly to the treasurers as below:

Near East Relief (formerly "Armenian and Syrian Relief")—Cleveland H. Dodge, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City.

European Relief (Central and Eastern Europe)—Franklin K. Lane, 42 Broadway, New York City; or locally for Virginia, Desoto Fitzgerald, 218 Mutual Building, Richmond, Va.

Chinese Famine Relief—Remit through Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer, Presiding Bishop and Council, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching. Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmond, Va. R F D 2.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse abd veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth Street N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

BOARDING.

THE MAGNOLIA, 1321 M STREET, N. W. One, or more, ladies visiting Washington can find transient quarters with Miss Bouldin.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A WORKER QUALIFIED TO teach for the Indian Mission in the mountains of Amherst County, Va. Will be associated with an experienced social worker. Adequate salary. Comfortable mission house. Schoolhouse and church on the grounds. Address Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, Amherst, Va.

WANTED—MOTHER AND DAUGHTER, or two sisters (white), to do cooking and laundry work in small family in the South. State salary expected in first letter. Reply "W. P.," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—A HOUSEKEEPER FOR HOSpital. Must be efficient, and know how to manage colored help. Give references. Address Gladys Wingfield, Social Service Worker, Hansford, W. Va., care Sheltering Arms Hospital.

SITUATION WANTED.

CLERGYMAN DESIRES PARISH IN town or country; is a Southerner; earnworkers; small family; good visitor. Address "K. J.," care Southern Churchman.

A REFINED LADY WISHES A POSITION a matron in a college, or school; to enter fall session. Address "G," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—POSITION AS MOTHER'S helper, or assistant in home. Address "E. A. P.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant principal or matron in a school, or some position of trust in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Kearny. Entered into life eternal May 30, 1921, at University of Virginia, ELIZABETH HARRISON KEARNY, wife of General John Watts Kearny, and daughter of Colonel Julien Harrison and Lilly Johnston Harrison

"Eternal rest grant unto her, O Lord, and may light perpetual shine upon her."

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to take from our midst our faithful and zealous worker, MRS. VIRGINIA B., wife of Mr. Logan Newbill, Montague, Essex County, Va., who died on the 21st of March, 1921, and was interred in Christ Church Cemetery, Middlesex County, and who was for a number of years a member of Christ Church Parish Guild, the loss of her gentle and kindly influence being most deeply felt, yet knowing God doeth all things for the best, let us bow in submission.

"Thy will be done."

We extend to the bereaved husband and family our deepest sympathy.

It is further ordered that a copy of these resolutions be recorded in the minutes of the Christ Church Parish Guild, a copy sent to the bereaved husband and family, and copies sent to the Southside Sentinel and to the Southern Churchman.

Respectfully submitted,
MRS. W. C. SEGAR, President.
MRS. C. E. SELBY, Secretary.
Christ Church Parish Guild, Middlesex County, Va.

A MEMORIAL.

Entered into eternal life April 20, 1921, MRS. JAMES T. PLUNKETTS.

A devoted and simple walk with God on earth, placing her hand in His, "like a little child," as she entered the kingdom of heaven, makes for Christian fellowship a valuable asset. When, like the early Christians, we see what can be borne and lived up to, thanking God for even grievous crosses borne for His sake.

Such a life was Mrs. James T. Plunketts'. Through illness, followed by brain clouds, did this mother watch over and interpret for her afflicted boy during his life of twenty years. This affliction came to the mother after seeing a little girl made a cripple by a fall.

In spite of all earthly discouragements, her brave spirit, communing with her Lord, she protected and ministered to her husband and seven other children, and with patriotic heart and soul sent two of her boys to do their part in the World War. The close of this pure, loving life was no surprise to those of us who have known her, and were privileged to be with her as she entered into eternal life.

"Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," was her reward, and we knew and felt it.

E. H. L.

RESOLUTIONS.

Excerpt from the minutes of meeting of the vestry of St. Andrew's Church, Norfolk, Va., June 7, 1921.

Resolved, that this vestry record upon its minutes its sense of loss in the recent death of JUDGE WILLIAM BRUCE MARTIN. Judge Martin was one of the small group of men who in 1911 founded this church. He served many terms on its vestry and on all occasions gave his time and energy without stint in the interest of its advancement.

Judge Martin believed in practical religion—he placed the interests of his Church and the call of the religion of Christ above all other demands.

He has left a record of things well done, and a gap which it will be difficult to fill, and

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to remove Judge Martin from the Church Militant to the Church Triumphant, now

Therefore, be it resolved, that we, the vestry of St. Andrew's Church, do hereby express our sympathy to his family and the deep sense of loss which we, the vestry, and the Church of St. Andrew's have sustained, and Resolved further, that a copy of this resolution be spread on the minutes of the vestry of St. Andrew's, sent to his family and published in the Southern Churchman.

A copy.

F. B. BRAGG, Register.

BENJAMIN B. BROCKENBROUGH.

Died, at his home in Tappahannock, Va., on May 29, BENJAMIN B. BROCKENBROUGH, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. The end came suddenly in the peaceful hours of this Sabbath morning while he was surrounded by every comfort and luxury that a beautiful home afforded, and during the ministrations of a truly devoted wife and helpmate, who with him had shared the joys and sorrows of life for more than fifty years and in whose lives were reflected all that was beautiful in love, in devotion and utter dependence the one upon the other. His widow is Mrs. Annie Mason Brockenbrough, daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Mason, of Raleigh, N. C.

There could scarcely be found a more regular worshipper, or one more loyal to the fundamental teachings and principles of the gospel, and we believe that he will receive from Him to Whom the secrets of all hearts are revealed the cup of salvation which is so freely offered to all who come unto Him for life.

A. D. L.

A schoolboy had a blind father; the boy was pitcher on the school baseball nine, and the father was in the habit of being present at all the school ball games, although he had to look on at the prowess of his son through other eyes. Then the father died. The day after the funeral a championship game was on, and to the surprise of his fellows the lad expressed a strong desire to play. He pitched the best game of his life, and the home nine won. When the captain congratulated him he said with shining eyes: "That is the first time father ever saw me pitch. I did my best for him."—Selected.

Of all our infirmities, vanity is the dearest to us. A man will starve his other vices to keep that alive.—Franklin.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

Trinity Church, Newark, under the faithful care of the Rev. William J. Tilley, who died in April, leaving a remarkable record for kindness and devotion to his people. The parish has accumulated a fund of more than $10,000 for a new parish house.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

The Shoshone Indian Reservation.

General Hugh L. Scott, a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners, made a visit of inspection to the Shoshone Indian Reservation, Wind River, Wyo. His official comment upon St. Michael's Mission will be gratifying to those who are helping this unique work, and are following its progress with interest. General Scott writes:

"There is another Episcopal Mission recently established about six miles down the river, which maintains about seventy-five Arapaho children (day and boarding). The plant is growing rapidly on the right lines, and the management by the Rev. Mr. Balcom seems to be in a high degree efficient and progressive. As outlined to me, his treatment of children and parents seems to be dictated by a deep sympathy with their needs and aspirations designed to increase their pride in themselves, without which no advance can be made. A broad tolerance was noted with their customs and beliefs which is calculated to lead them eventually away from these by degrees instead of an effort being made to change all their customs and make over a people in a night, a course always doomed to failure. I was greatly pleased with what I learned of the wise broad-mindedness of the manager, the Rev. Royal H. Balcom, and of the Bishop of this Diocese, and predict for them a great success in the results of their work. Their management is more in accord with what my own experience has told me is the proper course than any management I have so far encountered, and is calculated to lead these people to a higher civilization quicker than they would ever attain in any other way."

L. M. T.

TEXAS

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

Cornerstone of Community House Laid

The cornerstone of Autrey House, the first unit of the community center for the Church's work at Rice Institute, was laid Sunday morning, June 5, with a simple ceremony of short talks and songs.

James L. Autrey, Jr., son of the late Judge James L. Autrey, in whose honor the building is donated and named, laid the cornerstone, and short talks were made by the Rev. Harris Masterson, who is in charge of the community work near Rice; C. H. Atkinson, a member of the class of 1921 at the institute, and Dr. Peter Gray Sears, rector of Christ Church. The music was under the direction of Mrs. H. M. Garwood.

H. M. K.

Personal Notes

The Rev. William Oscar Roome, Jr., rector of Emmanuel Church, Anacostia, D. C., has accepted a call as rector of the Chapel of the Mediator, Philadelphia, and held his last service as rector of Emmanuel Church on Sunday evening, June 12. Mr. Roome has been rector of the Anacostia Parish for the past eight years, having been prior to that assistant at St. Stephen's Church. During the past week Mr. Roome was presented with a gold watch and his wife with a handsome pin, by the people of Emmanuel Church, as a token of esteem and gratitude for his work there.

The Rev. James M. Stoney, for the past four years rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Clemson College, and St. Paul's Church, Pendleton, S. C., who has resigned to accept a call to Grace Church, Anniston, Ala., expects to take up his new duties some time during this month.

The Rev. Dr. John R. Harding, formerly Department Secretary in the Province of New York and New Jersey, has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. John's Church, Sodus, N. Y., with charge of two parochial chapels. Dr. Harding will continue his work as corresponding secretary of the associate alumni, General Theological Seminary.

At Oglethorpe University, the honorary degree of Doctor of Law was con-

DURING THE PAST TWO YEARS

the following progress has been made at St. Stephen's College, the official College in the East for men of the Episcopal Church:

1. The following six men have been added to the faculty as heads of departments: Lucius R. Shero, Ph. D., Greek; Phineas W. Whiting, Ph. D., Biology; Lyford P. Edwards, Ph. D., Sociology; Clarence R. Williams, Ph. D., History; Percy S. Prince, M. A., Physical Training; A. Willoughby Henzell, M. S., Physics.
2. Over 6,000 new books have brought the library to a strength of 47,000 volumes.
3. New and modern biological and chemical laboratories have been installed.
4. A new $70,000 gymnasium and clubhouse has been built.
5. The student enrollment has doubled.

TWO YEARS AGO ST. STEPHEN'S WAS A GOOD COLLEGE FOR MEN DESIRING THE BACHELOR'S DEGREE IT IS EVEN MORE SO NOW

Address: Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y. R. R. Station: Barrytown, N .Y.

TUITION, BOARD AND ROOM, $500 PER ANNUM

ferred upon the Rt. Rev. Thomas Frank Gailor, D. D., at the commencement exercises on May 29.

The Rev. Walter E. Bentley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Port Washington, Long Island, N. Y., and Secreary of the Actors' Church Alliance, has sailed from Baltimore for San Francisco via Cuba and Panama, to return overland about the middle of July. During his absence the Rev. Frederick A. Heisley and his son, Rev. Cyril E. Bentley, will supply the parish.

The Rev. John Durham Wing, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Savannah, Ga., preached at the Peace Cross Service in the Cathedral Close, Washington, Sunday afternoon, June 12. Dr. Wing has just been appointed chaplain of the First Regiment of Savannah.

The Rev. Kenneth Mackenzie celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his rectorate of Holy Trinity Church, Westport, Conn., by the visit of Bishop Acheson on Sunday, June 5, for the administration of confirmation to twenty-two candidates. The parish had signalized the real date, June 1, by the gift of a purse of three hundred dollars, supplemented by an expression of affection to Mrs. Mackenzie from the women of the parish.

The Rev. James Dirickson Cummins, rector of Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, and Archdeacon of East Louisiana, sailed from New York on June 11 for an extended tour of France, Switzerland, Italy, Greece, the Holy Land and Egypt. He will also visit Saloniki, Constantinople, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus and Tripoli en route to Palestine, returning to America for services at the Cathedral on the last Sunday in September. The Rev. Henry J. Brown, the Rev. J. H. Swann and the Rev. J. H. Hamaker will supply at the Cathedral during the summer.

The University of King's College, Windsor, N. S., conferred the degree of D. C. L. upon the Rev. Ernest Milmore Stires, D. D., L. H. D., rector of St. Thomas' Church, New York.

Ordinations.

On the Second Sunday after Trinity, in St. Clement's Church, El Paso, Tex., Bishop Howden ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Corwin C. Miller. The rector, the Rev. Fuller Swift, Ph. D., preached the sermon, and Rev. C. S. Sargent, D. D., presented the candidate. Mr. Miller was in the work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew during the World War, and was located at Fort Bliss. He was confirmed in St. Clement's Church, studied a year with the rector, and has recently completed the two years' course of study at the Church Divinity School of the Pacific, San Francisco. Mr. Miller will be the vicar of the new St. Alban's Chapel, El Paso.

The Rev. Rush Wiley Smith was ordained to the diaconate in Mt. Calvary Church, Baltimore, on St. Barnabas' Day, June 11, by the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D. The Rtv. William A. McClenthen, D. D., presented the candidate and preached the sermon.

The Rev. Samuel M. Shomaker was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Murray in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, the same day. The Rev. Ralph B. Pomeroy, of the General Theological Seminary, preached the sermon, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Canon William DeVries.

In St. Mary's Church, Mitchell, S. D., the Rev. Robert Murphy was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, D. D., on Sunday, May 29. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles A. Weed, dean of the Central Convocation and rector of the parish, who also presented the candidate. Mr. Murphy was graduated from Seabury in the last class and is a member of the Diocese of Colorado. Through the courtesy of Bishop Johnson he was ordained in his old boyhood home, where his parents now reside.

In Trinity Church, Highland Park, Ill., on the First Sunday after Trinity (May 29), Mr. Leonard Clark Wolcott, B. A., was ordained to the diaconate by the Rev. Dr. Anderson, Bishop of Chicago. The candidate was presented by his father, tht Rev. P. C. Wolcott, D. D., who also preached the sermon. The Litany was read by the Rev. Arthur W. Jenks, D. D., of the General Theological Seminary.

Deaths.

The Rev. John S. Hansborough, rector-emeritus of St. Thomas' Church, Orange, Va., died on Thursday, June 9, in his ninetieth year. The funeral services were conducted on Friday from St. Thomas'. Mr. Hansborough was a graduate of William and Mary College and was ordained deacon in 1859 and priest in 1861 by Bishop Johns. He retired from the active ministry in 1908 and was made rector-emeritus.

The Rev. George Gunnell, L. H. D., rector of Trinity Church, Toledo, O., aged fifty-three, died suddenly of apoplexy in the office of his physician on May 31. He was on the eve of taking his family to Montana for the summer, where he was going to help the Bishop in his mission work, and had been apparently in the best of health. Funeral services were held on June 3 at Trinity Church by Bishops Leonard and Du Moulin, assisted by the Rev. R. S. Chalmers and the Rev. E. F. Talmadge. The body was taken to Beaver, Pa., for interment.

The Rev. Stephen Arnold Webb Pray died on April 24, 1921, in Mercer Hospital, Trenton, N. J., of pneumonia. He was, at the time of his death, curator of the Washington headquarters at Rocky Hill, N. J., and conducted the services at Trinity Church in that village.

The Rev. John Stirling Moody, a minister of the Diocese of East Carolina, died at his home, "Haymount," Fayetteville, N. C., on May 26, in his seventieth year.

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE
Florist
209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.
Flowers of Quality

JUST READY
More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"
By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.
SUNNY WINDOWS
Author of "The Children's Year"
AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by
Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Do You Know

How many Episcopalians there are in the United States?
The population of the various countries of the world?
The chief auto pleasure routes in the United States, and their distances?
The yearly production of the various crops for the last ten years?
The laws governing marriage and divorce?
The military and navy data of all countries?

All these questions, and thousands of others, are answere in the "World Almanac and Encyclopedia," which we are giving away to our customers and to all those starting new accounts.

National State and City Bank
1111 East Main Street, - - RICHMOND, VA.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE
CARPETS DRAPERIES

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President — C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President — R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

Shave, Bathe and Shampoo with one Soap.— Cuticura

Cuticura Soap is the favorite for safety razor shaving.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.
INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

MEMORIAL DAY IS OVER

The most notable day for national tribute in the history of our country.

Did your church substantially record those of its members who made supreme sacrifices for the advancement of human progress?

Why not choose the Day of Independence—July 4th—independent also in that the church can individually show her faith in sacrifices for cherished Christian ideals.

We answer all questions as to church interior improvement and enrichment promptly and effectively.

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 Sixth Avenue, ew York City

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice
For Prevention and Treatment of
PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE
Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac
Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid
Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.
17 Kent Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y

Central National Bank
Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Acccunts

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.
Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

Johnson's Foot Soap
(On market for over fifty years)
Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning

FEET

that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

Thomas Gill Soap Co.
711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 25, 1921. No. 26.

ST. ANNE'S

Episcopal School for Girls, Charlottesville, Va.

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector.

Miss EMMA YERBY, Principal

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev. George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5001 Woodland Avenue.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each.

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

When the heart says give, the gift will never be too small.

The reason all things work together for good to them that love God is because love is always the gainer by being tested.

"A dead Christ was the Church's despair; a dead and risen Christ the Church's triumph.

Of all that could not be spared from our life, our sacrifice is that which could be spared the least.—Selected.

Just as co-operation among men makes material success, so working with God makes spiritual success.

God may use the humblest of us in carrying on His work, but when we are used by God we are exalted.

The Christian is walking on dangerous ground who is not praying every day of his life that he may be more like Christ.

Habits of worship learned in boyhood were practiced by Jesus in manhood; as our boys are today our men will be tomorrow.

"Endurance is the crowning quality, and patience all the passion of great hearts."

The Holy Spirit presents to the soul the knowledge of the excellent righteousness of Christ, and then creates a hand of faith to embrace it.—R. Sibbes.

"One act of obedience has more power to clear a man's eyes than hours of idle contemplation; and one act of disobedience has more power to dim his eyes than anything besides."

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Opens Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
BOX 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

EDUCATIONAL

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

Plan Your Vacation to Include

THE HOLIDAY HOUSE

OF THE

Girls Friendly Society

Wrightsville Beach, N. C.

RATES:

All members	$5 00
Associates	7 00
Non-members	8 00

For reservations, address MISS ROSA DAIL, Housemother.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

PARSONSFIELD SEMINARY,

North Parsonsfield, Maine,

For boys and girls. In the foothills of the White Mountains; 200 acres; 4 buildings; invigorating air; all sports. College preparatory course, Domestic Science, Teachers' Training. College Certificate privilege. Endowmentp ermits $450 to cover all expenses. Catalogue and views.

H. H. TRUFANT, Prin.,
Box F, Kezar Falls, Maine.

COLLEGIATE SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

CAMP OKAHAHWIS

Senior Unit for Women Over 20

Near Rockbridge Baths, in the Blue Ridge, on the banks of North River.

R. R. Stations: Lexington and Goshen, Va.

Boating and swimming, drills, hikes, games and good comradeship.

Season, July 23-September 1st.

MISS MARY E. FRAYSER, Head
1636 West Grace, Richmond, Va.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

Have You Selected Your School?

Enrollments are now being made for the ensuing school year. Many institutions already have a waiting list. If you find it difficult to make a choice, the Southern Churchman will be glad to assist you. Address

Southern Churchman School Bureau
815 East Grace St.
Richmond, Va.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH Presidnet

Highlands, North Carolina

THE DAVIS HOUSE

Tenth Season Opens June 1st

Altitude, 4,000 feet. An invogorating climate and most comfortable house. Church people preferred.

Address MRS. M. MARTIN

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SUMMER CAMPS

The growing popularity of camps for young people attests the benefit to mind and body of open air and well regulated exercise. Select your camp now. The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN will help you to make a choice.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Jno. L. Williams & Sons

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 1815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street .....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"
If you will begin to prepare while they are young
Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia
"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival
The Couper Marble Works
(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk.

XANTHINE

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JUNE 25, 1921. No. 26.

WHICH REPRESENTS AMERICA?

Speaking in London on May 19, Mr. George Harvey, appointed by President Warren G. Harding the Ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said this:

"Far more prevalent until recently was the impression—and this was and still is in a measure sincere—that we went into the war to rescue humanity from all kinds of menacing perils. Not a few remain convinced that we sent our young soldiers across the sea to save this kingdom and France and Italy. This is not the fact. We sent them solely to save the United States of America, and most reluctantly and laggardly. At that, we were not too proud to fight, whatever that may mean. We were afraid not to fight. That is the real truth of the matter, and so we came along toward the end and helped you and your allies to shorten the war. That is all we did and all we claim to have done."

Speaking at the commencement of Brown University, his alma mater, on June 15, the Secretary of State, Charles Evans Hughes, said this:

"Our men did not go forth to fight for this nation as one of imperialistic designs and cunning purpose or to protect a land where avarice might find its surest reward. They offered their lives, and all the energies of the country were harnessed in the supreme effort, because we loved the institutions of liberty and intended to maintain them, because we hated tyranny and the brutality and ruthlessness which found expression in the worship of force, and because we found our fate with that of the free peoples who were struggling for the preservation of the essentials of freedom. With them we made common cause, and as from one end of the country to the other rang appeals in the name of civilization itself, the whole nation responded."

Which represents America—Mr. Harvey or Mr. Hughes?

We believe there is only one answer. The speech of Harvey is repudiated by the deep indignation of a disgusted nation. It is odious in its ugly cynicism. The words of Mr. Hughes, which one can scarcely doubt, were meant as an answer to the Ambassador, give voice to that fundamental idealism which America cannot deny until she is ready to deny her own soul.

Let us all remember this: the question of the purpose of America in the war is not a mere academic discussion of a fact already settled; it is the living determination of something still to be revealed. In the mighty emotions which stirred in the hearts of the millions of this nation, there were blended elements which were common and elements which were high and holy. With the earthiness of the obvious passions—self-regard, self-interest, hatred of an enemy who might injure us—there mingled the transfiguring flame of a nobler hope. It was the hope that the sacrifice of this nation might lead to a better future for the nations, and redeem thereby through its spiritual service all the dark necessity of strife. How creative that hope may be, and how far therefore it may be said to represent America, is still subject to the living processes of our thought and choice today. The deep disgrace of such a speech as Harvey's is that it would cramp the soul of this nation within the pettiness which is all he sees and all he can describe. The worth of such an utterance as Mr. Hughes' is that it reminds us of the elements in our purpose which were highest, and bids us follow where these point the way.

GOOD NEWS OF THE NATION-WIDE CAMPAIGN

The report of Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer of the Nation-Wide Campaign, dated June 15, is bright with encouragement. For the first five months of this year the Treasurer has received $1,176,481.90, as against $941,273.98 for the corresponding period in 1920, an increase of $235,207.92. Out of this increase $190,586.49 is represented directly by increase in payments on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

When the year began the authorities in New York, who knew the facts, must have had a shiver of apprehension. In the month of January only $19,193.70 was received, as against $50,439.80 in the same month of 1920. From these figures it might have appeared as though the Church had exhausted its efforts in the first year of the campaign, and was to slip this year into a deeply disappointing failure. But it has turned out that the decrease in that month was due to the great efforts of parochial treasurers to send in every available dollar in December, 1920, in order that the quotas for that year might be as nearly as possible met, which temporarily exhausted the resources as the new year began. In February of this year the receipts crept up to a point almost exactly equal to the receipts of the same month of the year before. In March there was an increase of more than $76,000, and in April and in May also the gains have been large.

As Mr. Franklin reminds us, the increase is largely due to the fact that certain Dioceses, such as Massachusetts, Western New York and Michigan, did not hold their first Nation-Wide Canvass until the spring of 1920, and so remittances from these Dioceses were not represented in the early months of that year. It is possible, therefore, that the remaining months of 1921 may show not nearly so large a relative increase. Nevertheless, in spite of the financial stringency which has been sharp in some parts of the country, and the depression which many of the Church's givers have felt, in consequence, the fine fact stands that this year, in its total results, the Nation-Wide Campaign is going forward. We have a long way to go to reach our rightful goal, but we are on the way.

HOW TO HELP TOWARD THE WORLD CONFERENCE

We have commented before on the remarkable evidence of widespread interest in Christian reunion. Some weeks ago there was reviewed a cluster of books, all of which brought the message of a fine optimism as to the present spirit among the various Church bodies for a closer approach. Only last week our readers had before them the remarkable statement of a Presbyterian Synod in Canada, concerning the proposals of the Bishops at Lambeth.

Meanwhile, the movement for a World Conference on Faith and Order, which for the last decade has been so patiently labored for by the leaders in this Church of ours, waits upon the aroused interest of all Christian people to make possible the practical steps for which the representatives of many Christian bodies are ready. It is possible that the great majority even of intelligent Church people, though they have noted the statements concerning it in the Church papers from time to time, are not conscious of the extraordinary facts which Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, secretary of the commission working toward the conference, sets forth in this recent bulletin.

"The world-wide interest in the movement for a World Conference on the Faith and Order of the Church of Christ is well shown by the number of countries and of important persons from whom gifts for its support have been received. After overcoming the difficulties and delays incident to reaching by letter or personal visit all the important churches throughout the world, as well as those caused by the war, a preliminary meeting was held in Geneva, Switzerland, last August, to ascertain what were the principal differences between the churches and whether there was sufficient prospect of their reconciliation to make it worth while to continue the effort. The meeting was attended by about one hundred and twenty delegates, coming from forty countries in North America, Europe, Africa, Asia and Australasia, and members of about seventy national churches, representing the sixteen great families or groups of churches which make up the Christian world, except that the Roman Catholic Church had declined the invitation. For the first time in history members of the Eastern Orthodox, Armenian, Anglican and Protestant Churches met to confer as to how they might reach that unity of Christians for which Christ prayed. The meeting was convinced that the effort is in accordance with God's will, and a Continuation Committee of fifty-five members in the United States, India, Japan, Australia, England, Constantinople, China, Czecho-Slovakia, Russia, Serbia, Greece, Bulgaria, Rumania, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Hungary, Canada, Switzerland and Scotland was appointed to carry it on. The full report of the meeting can be had free on application to Robert H. Gardiner, 174 Water Street, Gardiner, Me., U. S. A."

The unhappy fact which must be accepted with this fine report of progress is that the Commission's next steps are hampered by the lack of money. It was the plan that there should be held this summer two important meetings, one of all the commissions representing the Churches of North America, and one of the World-Wide Continuation Committee, but neither of these meetings can now be held because there are not sufficient funds to defray the necessary expenses. Literature which ought to be printed also is held back.

Three generous members oof our Church in America have heretofore borne the expenses of all the work directed toward the World Conference, but the preliminary meeting in Geneva issued a world-wide appeal. "Answers," says Mr. Gardiner, "have already been received from many places in the United States, England, Scotland, Ireland and Canada. Gifts have come also from Guatemala, India, Japan, South Africa, Porto Rico, Denmark, Argentina, Brazil, Bermuda, Germany, the Netherlands, New Zealand, British Honduras and Norway." But these gifts are mostly small, are not yet greatly numerous, and are inadequate.

May there not be those among the readers of these words who want to show the genuineness of their interest in Christian reunion by helping according to their ability to finance the World Conference? The address of the secretary has already been given, and the United States Trust Company, 45 Wall Street, New York City, U. S. A., is acting as treasurer.

"THE GREATEST OF THESE IS LOVE"

Love exalts the value of the human soul. "Love is of God, and he that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God." He, that is, who has the true reflection of the love of God in his heart will recognize in others that which is most God-like. He cannot estimate other human beings as mere instruments of his purpose. He cannot think of them as so many hands on his farm or in his factory. He cannot think of society as a kind of impersonal arrangement by which various groups of people are to be so fitted together that things may be produced and money made for those who hold positions of advantage. He knows that whatever other specious tests may be proposed, no civilization is really advancing unless the level of freedom and self-expression and life in its highest sense is being lifted for all the people.

Does this sound like a vague thing? On the contrary, it is the master key that determines the right ordering of every practical detail of this world of ours. There is no other way to real wellbeing, no other road to the right and happy adjustment of our most every-day affairs, than through the door which this key of love unlocks. We see the truth of this already in those intimate relationships where the best values of life blossom. In the home, for example, where the members of a family dwell in that affection which has made the very name of home almost the sweetest sound in our whole language, the secret of its beauty is that no single member of the family is estimated from the standpoint of selfish advantage, none measured as a mere instrument by which gain can somehow be brought to the others. Each one is prized for the preciousness of his or her own self. The father is not loved because he brings so many dollars of income by which the others can be fed and clothed. He is loved because he is the father, with all that that implies of strength and help and devotion. The mother does not love the child because she imagines that presently the child will grow up and go to work and make the family richer. She loves it because it is her child, and she loves it most not when she thinks of what she will receive from it, but when she rejoices to pour herself into all the expanding wonder of what that child may come to be. The same truth which we see in the closest and warmest circles remains also true in the widest spheres of human contact. If we would solve aright the industrial and economic problems which will face us now and in the years to come, if we would find the way which leads through all the often ugly tangle of hostile interests between employer and employed, if we would find the road to justice and to order in the business world and in the building of our communities, we must let love lead the way with its insistence that the thing that really counts is human life. There is something better than dividends for the capitalist, something better than more wages for the laborer. Dividends and wages both may play a part in this higher thing, but the thing that counts is the development of a finer life; and the finer life is only developed when men allow themselves to be led by the desire to fit their aims into a common enterprise in such way that every one who shares it shall be advantaged by the sharing. In our estimate of the importance of our communities and the success of our nation, we have got to get away from the figures of the ledger and look at the facts of human life. Is friendship widening? Is the consciousness of a public interest which is larger than selfish, private jealousies growing? Are men thinking of the progress of their community and their country in terms of the relief of poverty, and the lifting up of the conditions in which the poor live, in the safeguarding of childhood and the increase of education and relentless warfare against all exploited evil, rather than merely incomparative bank statements and trade plans and preferential tariffs? In short, is our world creating a larger life instead of accumulating the mass of supposed livelihood? This it must do if it remembers the truth which it may forget, but never in the long run escape—that love, which means the exaltation of the soul's life and the soul's right to live, holds the final clue to all high development and progress.

MEMORIAL TO DR. McKIM

Our readers noticed with gratification an item in our Washington letter of last week in regard to the memorial to the late Dr. Randolph Harrison McKim, which has been determined upon by the vestry of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., of which he was the rector for a third of a century. It is fitting, of course, and would be expected such a memorial should be erected, and none more suitable could be devised than the proposed tower and chime of bells on his old church; to be both a monument to his ministry there and, as it were, a perpetuation of that voice of clear tone and no uncertain sound which for so long called the people of his city to worship God and lift up their hearts unto Him.

So his memorial will stand where he would have it—at the doors of the Lord's house, down town among the people, speaking its message to the city at work and the stranger within its gates. The great cathedral has its many uses and appeals to the cultivated Church mind, but it is not yet acclimated to American conditions. The handsome up-town church among the homes of the well-to-do is needful and befits its surroundings. But the sombre old church down town, on a busy street, architecturally out of fashion it may be, somewhat time-worn and weather-stained perhaps, is the church that appeals to the passer-by, that the people of the city have learned to love by long association if it has been true to its opportunities, and that stands out for them as the representative of the great Church whose name it bears. Nothing that is merely modern or merely pretty can add to its value, but they will be grateful for what shall add to its permanence and its spiritual appeal.

We trust that this monument to the work of a great democratic Churchman will soon be realized and long bear its witness at the heart of the nation's Capitol.

CHANGE IN DAY OF PUBLICATION

Our subscribers want their Southern Churchman to reach them before Sunday. There is a unanimity of sentiment on this point that cannot be mistaken, and it is perfectly just. Our business department has therefore made an arrangement with our printers whereby the paper will be delivered to the mails on Thursday morning of each week. By this change we hope to reach all but our most distant readers by Saturday at latest.

This means that each of our "forms" must be closed a day earlier. The editors have been sternly admonished that the bulk of the "copy" must go to the printer by Friday or Saturday, and the very last belated item of news by Tuesday at noon. Will our contributors and correspondents kindly take notice?

Thirty-Five Plus Thirty-Five

W. H. Morse, M. D.

One of the busiest of Hartford's busy streets is Asylum Street. In the hurrying throng one sees now and then—one in every twelve, according to the census statistician—near-Americans. And among these perhaps most often, Italians If one has any sort of curiosity to watch these familiar new neighbors as they pass along, it will be noticed that there is a place where as they go by the men lift their caps, and the women courtesy. It is as they do before a shrine in the homeland, and yet there is no church near, no gilded cross displayed. But there is the reverence. Up one flight from the street is one whom these sunny sons of Italy delight to honor, their friend of many years, a friend always there, an old man, a man who is seeing his seventieth year pass, and who for thirty-five of the three-score and ten has been there, laid there on his bed, a cheerful invalid, their saint.

As a young man of capacious soul traveling in Italy, at a watering-place, Howard Gilman Young sustained a fall that rendered him helpless ever after. They brought him home to Hartford and put him to bed. Since then he has never walked. He had been a warm friend of the Italians in the years he spent in their homeland, and they have not forgotten him. They like to step in and see him, and they are welcome. Over in Rome, before his accident, in the catacombs he found the Christian faith, and ever since it has been his one consolation. Confirmed in the Episcopal Church, he is a communicant of Christ Church Cathedral, and the Italians appreciate his Christian interest in them.

And he is interesting. A large and almost dark room looking out on Asylum Street; and there on his bed in front of the windows he lies, a face as smooth as an infant's, unwrinkled, with flowing whiskers, bright eyes and smiling lips. The hands extended to welcome visitors are white and slender. His paralyzed feet are raised above his hips at the foot of the bed. The voice is soft and musical. All around the bed, and all about the room, are pictures and statuary, crucifixes, madonnas, old prints of Christ, and pictures of the Holy Land.

All is suggestive of Italy, and all to remind the bed-ridden man of his summer times there. Banners, too, woman suffrage pennants, books and books; the daily and religious papers within his hand-reach; a famous pet parrot at his side; and perfect contentment personified in the occupant of the bed. When he is not reading or entertaining callers, he lies and looks out, feeling the busy world pass by, and seeing much of its action.

Complaining? Never! Helpless, he nevertheless enjoys healthful and heartful days. Lonesome? Not he, with those swarthy friends looking in on him, and with them, others. Through correspondence a wholesome interest is maintained with the outside world, the world that honored him long since with memberships and fellowships in learned societies and associations. Should any one use in conversation with him the name "shut-in," he smiles more brightly than ever, for he inhabits a wider world than those who pass by.

"'Worry!'" he says. "I do not worry. What about? Why should I? The person who worries is a bad patient, an im-patient. We are here to have patience."

Patient with curious visitors, with school boys who come in to be helped in their lessons, with other worldly invasions. A philosopher, who does not philosophize. A Christian, who is Christ-filled. Take it all in all, counting one thing and another, they say that there is no person in the Diocese of Connecticut more remarkable for Christ and the Church. Hence the shrine, the esteem from those of the land where he gave up living to come to this mattress tomb.

To become indifferent or insensitive to the stains of daily sin is one of the saddest things that can befall us. Little by little it puts a space between us and the Saviour, as begrimed windows seem to put the light further and further off. We must keep the class clean if we would have the cheerful light; and we must keep close touch with the pardoning blood if we would maintain the joy of salvation.—J. R. Howard.

IS THE CHURCH FREE TO PREACH A SOCIAL GOSPEL?

Answers by Leaders of the Christian Church

Recent events have brought prominently into consideration the question of the Church's message for the living problems of today. How far has the pulpit a right to bring Christian counsel into direct relationship to economic and industrial maladjustments? Bishop Williams recently preached a very plain, bold sermon in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine? Was he right in so preaching? On the other hand, the Pittsburgh Employers' Association recently passed a resolution condemning all utterance on the part of the Church concerning industrial questions except those which lay within the "zone of agreement." Were they right? The Lusk Committee of the New York Legislature recently had much to say in disapproval of preaching which has to do with social and economic reconstruction. Was that committee right?

Here are some of the answers which have come from the churches:

Rev. Harry E. Fosdick.

Preaching in the First Presbyterian Church of New York last month, Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, D. D., said:

Consider with me one other application of our morning truth. Some of us were brought up in an individualistic type of religion, where the major interest was the hope that one by one we should be landed safely in heaven. To be sure, the requirements for entrance into heaven involved the elements of right living on earth, but, for all that, the outlook of the hymns we sang and the prayers we offered and the sermons that we heard was not what Jesus said: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," but rather this: "Let earth perish, sobeit that one by one we shall come safe to heaven." Now, ethical consequences of this excessive and exclusive other-worldliness have been disastrous, for they have led multitudes of Christians utterly to misunderstand what Jesus Christ wants of them on this earth. Some time ago in an Ohio town there was an elder of the church who for years had been making money selling impure milk. He was arrested and tried by the civil authorities. The church took no action then. But one day in the court he lost his temper and broke out with an oath. Then the church put him on trial For what? For selling impure milk? Not in the least! What had religion to do with worldly affairs like that. They put him on trial because he swore. Some of us have been brought up in towns where just that thing could happen. Can you not see the Man of Nazareth standing there in that church trial and in His voice of thunder saying again: "Ye tithe mint and anise and cummin, and have left undone the weightier matters of the law, justice and mercy and faithfulness"?

One of the most amazing exhibitions of this same spirit has recently been given us in a letter published and signed by the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh. It was this same group of gentlemen who, a little while ago, attacked the Young Women's Christian Association because that beneficent organization desires, not simply to assure the young women of America a safe entrance into heaven, but to insure them decent conditions of living on earth before they get into heaven. And now this same group has attacked ferociously the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the organization that effects the co-operation of thirty great evangelical denominations in this country. Listen to this attack:

"The Radical and Bolshevik elements in the churches seem to be co-operating through the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and many of our members are expressing themselves as determined to discontinue financial support of their respective churches unless they withdraw all moral and financial support from the Federal Council."

There is no use wasting time answering a charge like that. You have in your hands today the "Social Ideals of the Churches"* of the Federal Council, a careful statement of some areas in our public life that need a fuller application of the principles of Jesus. Moreover, the president of the Federal Council is our own Dr. Robert E. Speer, and only a hopelessly hysterical mind can picture Bolshevik propaganda going on under his superintendence. But as this attack has been so widely published and so widely commented upon, it is necessary that the Christian pulpit should pay attention to it.

For one thing, the persons who have launched this attack apparently propose to settle the matter of the social application of the principles of Jesus by money. "Determined to discontinue financial support" is their proposition. "We will buy you," they say to the churches, and, in particular, to the ministers of the churches—"If you will do as we say, money; if not, no money." May I be permitted to suggest that these gentlemen have somewhat seriously misapprehended the temper of the Christian ministry of America? I am speaking for multitudes of my brethren when I say, "Before high God, not for sale!" Indeed, I suspect that there has been a crop of sermons on the social question preached throughout this country that would not have been preached if it had not been for this public attack, so that those of us who are interested in having such sermons preached might almost thank these gentlemen for their unintentional assistance. There would have been, I suppose, no Luther if there had been no Tetzel, and if there had been no George the Third there would have been no George Washington. Action and reaction are generally equal, and if any one wants to make sure that the social teaching of Jesus shall be the centrally absorbing subject of the Christian pulpit in the next year or so, the easiest way is to offer to buy our silence for money.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

So Jesus spake, "When" and "How," men asked. They were eagerly seeking. They had been dreaming of it for a thousand years, and at last it was at hand. The heavens were to open and God's angel hosts would come, streaming through like a glittering, golden flood. Wrong would be crucified and righteousness enthroned. So they dreamed —and so they were disappointed. God does not work that way.

It would have been a miracle once accomplished had their dream come true. It would have been a soul-shattering thing for those who were alive then to see it. But the event once past, and this blessed kingdom come, their wonder would have faded and their gratitude grown dim. There would have been no struggle in whose white hot flames character is forged, and soon there would have been no character without which the kingdom could not live.

Had their dream come true, it would have been a miracle once accomplished. As it is, one age-long miracle unfolds before our eyes. There was the miracle of the glorious martyrs whose happy, God-filled eyes shone brighter than the fires that burned them. There is the miracle of marching armies going forth to death that the world might be made cleaner. There is the miracle of the faithful worker, spending his life in toil that his loved ones might be happy. There is the miracle of the mother who counts it a joy to sacrifice and a privilege to die for the little one whom God hath given her.

"Thy Kingdom Come." And can we yet ask "How"? Not by the blast of the trumpet of God; not by the breath of His hot displeasure; but by the vision of a better earth with which our eyes are brightened; by the daily doing of His will for which our hands and souls are strong.

Middleton S. Barnwell.

*Obtainable from the Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York.

Pittsburgh Ministerial Association.

On June 6 the Pittsburgh Ministerial Union adopted these resolutions:

"Whereas, the Secretary of the Pittsburgh Employers' Association has issued a series of communications with the purpose of dissuading men from furnishing financial support to certain Christian organizations because they have not limited their message to a so-called 'neutral zone,' prescribed by those whom said secretary represents; and

"Whereas, this involves as a principle and as a purpose the dictation to religious bodies as to what fields of thought and human service they may enter; and as to what constitutes the gospel of the kingdom; and

"Whereas, the Church, through all its history, when true to its mission, has zealously guarded its absolute freedom to proclaim the full gospel of Jesus Christ without dictation from any outside parties or any external authority; and

"Whereas, the said organization represents itself as speaking for the employing group—an assumption which we are convinced is contrary to fact, particularly in relation to many high-type Christian employers; and

"Whereas, we fully recognize that in the industrial and economic fields there is room for a proper diversity of opinion; therefore be it

"Resolved, that we, the Pittsburgh Ministerial Union, resent this attempt of a commercial organization to prescribe limits within which alone the Church and other religious organizations may move; that we reaffirm the right and duty of the Church to proclaim the whole truth in Christ as revealed in the Scriptures and as applied under the Holy Spirit to every relationship in life; that we deny to any political, commercial, industrial or any other group or agency the right to set any restrictions on the freedom of the Christian Church or its agencies to apply the spirit and standards of the kingdom of God to the whole of life; that we declare it our solemn duty and purpose to defend this liberty of the gospel."

Rev. Henry S. Coffin.

In the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York Rev. Henry S. Coffin, D. D., spoke thus on the report of the Lusk Committee:

"This amazing committee, despite our time-honored separation of Church and State, has had the effrontery to deal with the churches. During the war we had much to say about the servility of the State-paid clergy of Germany. Is a committee of the Legislature attempting to reduce the American pulpit to a like bondage? This report treats ministers as sentimental creatures, apt to be 'carried away by false specious idealism, masquerading as progress.' It asserts 'there is an ever-growing tendency toward radicalism among the clergy' and proceeds to insult us by adding 'Much of this attitude may be explained by the fact that they have been and are grossly underpaid, and for this reason they are unable to see economic problems in their proper perspectives'. By what right has a committee of the State Legislature dared to circulate at public expense such an insinuation that if ministers of the gospel were more highly paid their view on economic questions would be more conservative? With all our faults, dare any man say that we speak from our pocket-books and not from our consciences? Is it not high time that in the face of such impudent presumption we respectfully inform this committee of the Legislature that they have overstepped their bounds, that the Church of Christ and her ministers recognize only one Supreme Authority, the one Head of the Church who is at the right hand of God, and that in our teaching we shall apply His spirit to government, industry, social conditions and the consciences of men; and, unafraid, declare, just so far as we can see it, the whole counsel of God?"

Rev. William P. Merrill.

At the recent conference of the World Alliance for International Friendship, held in Chicago, Rev. William P. Merrill, D. D., of New York, said this:

"A group which is positive in its assertion that the Church has no business with business is making its voice heard in the land. Doubtless many of them, perhaps most, are thoroughly honest in their conviction that religion and business work better if kept in separate compartments. The fact that a man is fervent in his faith or sound in moral principles does not qualify him to lay down the lines on which society must advance through the economic and industrial jungle. It is plainly an impertinence, when a minister or any other religious leader attempts to tell business men how to manage the details of their business. But it is not an impertinence, it is a rightful and a necessary act, when a minister or a council, or any body of religious folk, declare the true principles on which society must be organized in order to be right and Christian, and point out obvious applications of those principles.

"The dangerous and wrong group is made up of those who resent such action as that on the part of the Church, or even attempt to determine, by their financial power, the limits to which the Church shall go in its declaration of moral and religious ideals, and of their clear application to present conditions; who would confine the Church to the functions defined in a recent statement, 'Religion may properly act as a councillor to the individual conscience, and as a stretcher-bearer for the wounded.'

"When financial leaders in industrial sections of the United States declare that the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America are stepping out of their proper sphere in avowing their hearty adherence to social principles and ideals clearly Christian and adopted and held by practically all the leading religious denominations; when they further attempt to cut off contributions from such organizations on the plea that they are dealing in unwarranted ways with matters outside their proper sphere; when they demand that proposed religious gatherings shall cut from their program discussions of 'The Church and the Industrial Order,' under penalty of financial embarrassment; when they insist that the Church shall confine itself to the statement of abstract principles, and take no note of their application; an issue is joined which the Church cannot ignore. The Church cannot afford to take orders from any outside group or class, or from any one except its Divine Head. To allow any set of men to mark off its field, or limit its scope, or declare its function, is intolerable. The Church must fully and with all cheerfulness grant the right of any man or men to object to its words and acts, to criticize them with utmost freedom, to give or withhold support, to join the Church or leave it, to attack or defend, as one may deem best. The Church must be prepared to take the consequences, financial or other, of maintaining its independence, and asserting its proper concern in the affairs of the world. But for the Church to alter by a hair's breadth its policies, or to restrict in the least its sense of a vital function in social matters, because the power of the purse is applied, is spiritual treason."

Bishop Lines.

And ringing still with present counsel are these words of Bishop Lines, spoken in his Diocese of Newark at its convention of 1920:

"I am told that the new generation is not interested in the Church because the Church does not express the hopes and aspirations of the new generation. The Church must do that, for those hopes and aspirations and desires are worthy of respect. The Church must be able to give voice and direction to all these longings of men and women of the new time, to express what is in their minds and hearts, the deep longings of their nature, their desires for a larger chance in life, more of the good gifts for themselves and their children, a larger sense of brotherhood and the removal of the distinctions which make life hard and selfish and unbrotherly. . . . It will not do to go on just as we have been doing in the old ways. We must find voice for this new world with all its fine aspirations, longings and hopes.

"There must be a larger appreciation of what the new age is calling for in moral and spiritual leadership, a better understanding of the movements which are in the world today. These new longings and striving after greater freedom, larger privileges, freer development, are the gifts of the Church through the teaching of the infinite value of the human soul and the teaching that we are all the children of God, no matter what the distinctions among us may be. This new spirit which has manifestations which give great anxiety and threatens the existence of the old order and of much that is settled has come from the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. You may call it unreasonable, ill-directed, alarming, but it is Christian in its origin. The Church is like a mother who has brought up children whom she can neither direct nor control, who have passed beyond the old forms of restraint and discipline.

"We look out on the great multitude of those who have had the unprivileged and the subordinate places in the world, and we complain and devise plans for restraint and keeping things as they were, and we have scant understanding of our time and the meaning of these movements. The most thoughtful among us have hardly passed beyond the point which the blind man had reached in seeing men as trees walking. He cannot interpret the hopes and the desires and longings of the great multitude of our fellowmen. We are like those who disputed whether it was a voice out of heaven or whether it thundered. Most people think it is thundering, and that may be a mistake. I think myself that confusing and distracting as are the cries and the demands and the efforts of men, it is a voice out of heaven, and woe is to those who cannot hear God speaking to them. Our attitude toward the multitude of our brethren is often one of distrust and antagonism, and the attitude of our blessed Lord was one of infinite compassion and love and patience and helpfulness, and His attitude is the true one. A good many of us who are strong and rigid in our thoughts about the office of the Church, and our interpretation of our Lord's life and words, are like those disciples who stood in our Lord's way, hindering the mothers from bringing their children to be blessed by Him, and telling the blind beggar of Jericho not to trouble the Master, whose exclusive companionship belonged to them.

"Suppression and deportation and denunciation are not the final words, not the remedy, but a Christian sympathy, and a better understanding, appreciation of the causes of the movements which disturb us, more brotherly kindness in business, more co-operation, more profit-sharing, more fellowship, more justice, less patronizing, more good, practical religion. . . . Get a new spirit into the churches, a spirit of brotherly kindness. . . . Think more of justice than of charity."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

CHINA FAMINE RELIEVED.

Mr. Editor: We have received final word that the campaign for funds for China Famine Relief will not be pushed further, owing to unexpected relief due to abundant rains in China and to a large gift from the Chinese people sufficient to cover the present needs.

I take this opportunity of expressing to you the appreciation of those in New York who have had to do with the raising of funds. You have given us all the co-operation we have asked for, and the funds that have come in to us from sources reached by you have alone made it possible for us to make a great response and to send large gifts to our bishops in the field.

Mr. Lamont has telegraphed Bishop Gailor an expression of his deep appreciation for the generous assistance that we gave. I know it will be a satisfaction to you to know that your words, your editorials and your efforts to promote giving among your readers have been of invaluable help to us in this campaign.

A. B. PARSON,
Assistant Foreign Secretary.

Missions House, New York, June 10, 1921.

The Great Commission.

MEETING OF THE DEPARTMENT OF MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION.

The regular meeting of the Department of Missions and Church Extension was held in New York on June 14. The Executive Secretary, in his report, had the pleasure of announcing that Dean Davis, of St. Louis, who had been elected Domestic Secretary at the last meeting of the Council, has accepted his election, and is expected to take up his duties on October 1.

He reported the receipt of a cablegram from China stating that there had been looting by soldiers in Ichang and Wuchang in the District of Hankow, but that the mission buildings and lives of our missionaries were safe. The impression had been received from an account in the papers that Boone University in Wuchang had been razed. It was a pleasure to get this information that our work had not yet been molested.

He also reported a cablegram from Bishop Graves, who had been so closely identified with the Famine Relief in China that there was no further need for funds. Dr. Wood announced that up to the present time over $142,000 had been received by the Treasurer at the Church Missions House and forwarded for this purpose.

The disaster which had come to Colorado through the flood was brought up and a letter from Bishop Johnston was submitted. The extent of the damage to our Church property or of the distress to our Church people is not yet known. It was announced that the Rev. Benjamin D. Dagwell, rector of the Church of the Ascension in Pueblo, was chairman of the Relief Committee. The Department of Missions expressed its deep sympathy with the Bishop, clergy and people of Colorado in the damage and distress caused by this flood, and authorized the president and executive secretary of the Department of Missions to give such assistance to the Bishop as may be necessary to tide over the emergency.

The secretary reported that two gifts had been received from the Missionary Districts in Japan toward the missionary work in this country, one of $15.16 from Trinity Cathedral in Tokyo and one of $12.12 from St. John's Church in Asakusa.

The Rev. John Roberts, who for thirty-eight years had served among the Indian people in Wyoming, and in that time had accomplished so much in building up the work among the Shoshone Indians, felt it necessary to retire from active service. The department felt that it could not allow this occasion to pass without placing on record its gratitude for and admiration of Mr. Robert's devoted life.

At the invitation of Viscount Shibusawa, of Tokyo, a group of gentlemen prominent in the public life of Japan recently gathered and organized an Advisory Board to St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo. Their purpose is to give all possible aid to Dr. Rudolph B. Teusler, as he begins to carry out his plans for the erection of the new buildings.

The Advisory Board consists, among others, of: Viscount Shibusawa, chairman; Baron S. Goto, Baron K. Iwasaki; Mr. D. Inouye, president Bank of Japan; Viscount Kaneko, Imperial Privy Councillor; Baron Sakatani, member Upper House of the Diet.

Dr. Teusler says that the members of the committee are the pick of the country in business and national leadership.

Viscount Kaneko said that it would be the object of this Board to make St. Luke's Hospital a model for the entire country.

The new building plans for St. Luke's are on their way to this country. The Department of Missions appointed a committee composed of the President of the Council, Burton Mansfield, Esq., George Wharton Pepper, Esq., Dr. John W. Wood and Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, as a committee to deal with this matter.

An unusually large number of offers of service for the mission field, both at home and abroad, were received at this meeting, and many of them, their papers having been completed and the requests having been received from the bishops, were appointed. Five of these were for Alaska. Among them was Johnnie Fredson, the Italian boy who accompanied Archdeacon Stuck on his trip to Denali and who "remained with the stuff" at the foot of the mountain and refused to eat the sugar, knowing that the supply that Archdeacon Stuck took with him to the summit would be exhausted. Johnnie Fredson had come out to receive his education, has now graduated from Mt. Hermon School, and is returning to Alaska for temporary service, expecting ultimately to prepare as a medical missionary in Alaska. Another was Robert W. Tatum, who went to the summit of Denali with Archdeacon Stuck. Two were appointed to the Philippines. Ten were appointed to the three districts in China, among them the son of Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, one to Liberia and one to Cuba.

By an official proclamation known as Executive Order No. 3, the President of Liberia, acting through his Secretary of State, has appointed Bishop Overs as a member of a National Board of Education. The Board of Education, acting under the direction of the Secretary for Public Instruction, is given full power and authority to formulate such plans and policies as may be deemed best calculated to standardize and improve the efficiency of all graded schools of the republic.

THE PRESIDING BISHOP AND COUNCIL.

Statement of Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer.

For the first five months of the year the receipts applicable to appropriation items have amounted to $1,176,481.90, as against $941,273.93 for the corresponding period in 1920, an increase of $235,207.92. Of this increase $190,586.49 is accounted for by the increase in payments on the Nation-Wide Campaign, as shown on the statement and the balance by an increase in miscellaneous income. The detail of the Nation-Wide Campaign income by months is as follows:

	1921.	1920.
Jan.	$ 19,193.70	$ 50,439.80	Decrease	$ 31,246.10
Feb.	151,955.69	151,730.75	Increase	224.94
Mar.	204,307.69	127,721.91	"	76,585.78
April	274,753.97	182,400.24	"	92,353.73
May	339,068.75	286,400.61	"	52,668.14
	$989,279.80	$798,693.31		$190,586.49

The decrease in January is probably due to the fact that the diocesan parochial treasurers were making every effort to collect every possible dollar on the 1920 pledges. Our books were held open for a number of days after the first of the year, during which time all receipts were credited to 1920.

The increase in subsequent months is due chiefly to the fact that certain Dioceses, such as Massachusetts, Western New York and Michigan, did not hold their first Nation-Wide Canvass until the spring of 1920, and consequently remittances from these Dioceses were small during the early part of that year. Another reason for the increase is that undoubtedly a good many of the parochial treasurers are not keeping accurate account of delayed payments made on 1920 pledges, and these are now coming in and being credited to 1921. There are, however, a number of disturbing decreases in the figures of receipts. These mean either that there has been a distinct falling off in the pledges of the people or that the parochial treasurers are remiss in making collections and remittances. It is of vital importance that these weak spots be corrected.

Due to this gratifying increase in receipts, the Council has been able to reduce the amount of its loans at the banks since the close of the fiscal year in the amount of $100,000. This is in contrast to an increase in such loans during the corresponding period of 1920, in the amount of $132,500, a gain in the borrowed money item of $232,500. Naturally, this will result in a material saving in interest charges during the current year.

Despite the great improvement noted above, much can still be done in the way of expediting the collection of pledges and the prompt remittance of money. The fact that a parochial treasurer has in his hands $100 of Nation-Wide Campaign money may not seem to be a very important matter to him, but if some 4,000 parochial treasurers have the same idea and therefore fail to remit, the cost to the whole Church in interest charges becomes a material factor.

Church Intelligence

Consecration of the Rev. Dr. LaMothe.

The Presiding Bishop has taken order for the ordination and consecration of the Rev. John Dominique LaMothe, Bishop-elect of the Missionary District of Honolulu, as follows:

Time: Wednesday, June 29, 1921.

Place: Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, Md.

Consecrators: The Presiding Bishop, the Bishop of Southern Virginia, the Bishop of Maryland.

Preacher: The Bishop Coadjutor of Southern Virginia.

Presenters: The Bishop of Southwestern Virginia, the Bishop of Delaware.

Attending Presbyters: The Rev. E T. Helfenstein, D. D., the Rev. W. Page Dame, D. D.

Master of Ceremonies: The Rev. B. B. Lovett, D. D.

Deputy Registrar: The Rev. R. F. Humphries, D. D.

DANIEL S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

Consecration of Dr. Gardiner.

The Rev. T. Momolu Gardiner, D. D., will be consecrated Bishop Suffragan of Liberia, in the Church of the Incarnation, New York City, on Thursday morning, June 23.

Bishop Tuttle will be the consecrator and Bishop Lloyd and Bishop Overs will be the co-consecrators.

The presenting bishops will be Bishops Manning and Matthews.

The preacher will be Bishop Overs.

The attending presbyters will be the Rev. H. C. Bishop, rector of St. Philip's, New York, and the Rev. F. W. Elligor, rector of All Saints', Williams Bridge, New York. Mr. Elligor was a schoolmate of Mr. Gardiner at St. John's School, Cape Mount, Liberia. He was probably a Vey like Mr. Gardiner.

Miss Lulu Higgins, of Asheville, N. C., was formerly a teacher in St. John's School, Cape Mount, Liberia, and Mr. Gardiner was one of her pupils.

The Fourth General Synod Meeting of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui.

This Synod was held at Wuchang from April 17 to 25, in the beautiful library building of Boone University. In attendance were delegates from all parts of China, from Peking in the north to Canton, and from Shanghai to Szechuen. With the exception of Bishop White, of the Canadian Mission in Honan, who was detained by famine relief work of imperative necessity, all the Bishops were present—three Americans, seven British and one Chinese. Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, was made chairman of the House of Bishops, and Dr. Pott, also of Shanghai, chairman of the House of Delegates. There were present as visitors two missionaries of the Church Missionary Society now working in Japan among Chinese students. Among the lay delegates, one was struck by the large number of youthful faces.

Although this Synod was marked by no epoch-making legislation, it was one that did no little to set forward the work of the Church. It would hardly be of interest to narrate in detail the proceedings; but one may say that throughout, the sessions were marked by a high order of Christian thought and zeal, and by a fine Christian courtesy and mutual consideration. The procoeedings were necessarily slow, being bi-lingual; upon all was impressed afresh the need for the unification of China's languages, or rather dialects.

Perhaps the most momentous action taken was the instruction to the new Standing Committee to take steps to effect the recognition of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui as an autonomous branch of the Anglican Communion. And among the livest questions was one hardly to have been expected in staid old China, viz., the position of women in the services and ministry of the Church. One of the active forward steps taken at the time of the Synod, but not by it, was the formation of a national Woman's Missionary Band, with aims and purposes similar to those of the American Woman's Auxiliary.

Another important problem was that of providing adequate Church literature, Sunday school lessons, etc. One of the subjects dealt with most sympathetically was that of unity. Bishop Roots, of Hankow, made a fine report of the recent Lambeth Conference work on this subject.

During the meeting the delegates to the Synod were made the guests of the faculty and friends of Boone University, who most delightfully fulfilled their functions as hosts. Every day of the Synod was marked by some act of courteous entertainment for the delegates; teas, music and other entertainments being arranged. On Wednesday, April 20, was laid the cornerstone of the new James Jackson Gymnasium of Boone University, the ceremony being performed by Bishop Graves. Another incident was a visit to the great steel works at Hanyang, which are wholly Chinese; for this trip the manager kindly provided steam launches for the convenience of the visitors. On all of us a new impression was made of the commercial and manufacturing possibilities before this nation. One session was marked by an address from the Secretary of the C. M. S.

For the next Synod, to be held in 1924, many invitations were extended. On ballot, the place chosen was Canton.

E. L. A.

Note: Visitors to France and Belgium.

Visitors associated with our churches who go to France and Belgium during the summer are earnestly requested to visit the Protestant institutions and churches in these nations. There are a number of Protestant churches in the devastated regions. Those in Paris are of deep interest.

The Committee on Relations with France and Belgium of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has requested the committee in Paris, consisting of the Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, the Rev. Frederick W. Beekman and Pastor Andre Monod, to facilitate such visits. Arrangements should be made by addressing the Rev. Andre Monod, 8 Rue de la Victoire, Paris.

World Conference on Faith and Order.

Mr. Robert H. Gardiner, Secretary, writes:

"Lack of money has made it impossible to hold either of two important meetings this summer (one of the commissions in North America, and one of the world-wide Continuation Committee), and has seriously restricted the work of the Secretary's office, particularly in the matter of much-needed publications. The Subjects Committee, charged by the Geneva meeting to promote world-wide study and discussion of fundamental questions in preparation for the World Conference, has no adequate funds. Gifts may be sent to the United States Trust Company, 45 Wall Street, New York City, U. S. A., marked for the World Conference Continuation Committee."

Annual Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The thirty-sixth annual convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States will be held in Norfolk, Va., October 12-16, 1921.

Mr. George H. Randall, the convention manager, has just returned to Philadelphia, after a conference at Norfolk with the convention staff, and preliminary arrangements have been made which indicate that this will be one of the most interesting conventions yet held.

An unusually interesting program is being prepared by the Program Committee, and the Brotherhood is determined to make this convention stand out prominently as the best one ever held, and the staff will spare no trouble to attain this end.

Announcement will be made later of particulars as to hotel rates, accommodations, etc., and in the meantime this advanced notice is being given that the 1921 convention may be brought to the attention of as many people as it is possible to reach, those outside of the Brotherhood who contemplate attending, as well as the Brotherhood itself.

The members of the Brotherhood in Virginia send greeting to all members of the Brotherhood in this land, and extend to you the earnest wish that you come to Norfolk on October 12 for your annual convention. Come singly, come as chapters, only come, and center your thoughts, hearts and prayers at Norfolk.

Summer Vacation Conference.

The third annual Summer Vacation Conference of the Church in California will be held at the Y. W. C. A. conference grounds at Asilomar, Monterey County, Cal., July 29 to August 5. A most interesting and instructive program has been arranged, and there will be among other things classes on Bible Study, Religious Education, Mission Study and Social Service; devotional services will be held daily, and, under the direction of Mrs. A. F. Knudsen, of St. Mark's Parish, Berkeley, Cal., the Biblical drama "Job" will be presented. With the co-operation of people of the churches of Pacific Grove, it will be enacted in a pageant setting, reflecting the life of those olden days.

The drama will be given on Wednesday afternoon.

The conference will assemble on the afternoon of July 29. Those attending will register and enroll for classes. In the evening there will be a fireside "get-acquainted" gathering.

The chairman of the Conference Committee is the Rev. Lloyd B. Thomas, rector of Trinity Parish, Oakland, Cal., and the faculty includes such well-known men as Rev. Lester Bradner, Ph. D., Secretary National Department of Religious Education, New York City; Rev. Harold S. Brewster, rector St. Paul's Church, Modesto, Cal.; Rev. Edwin S. Lane, rector Church of the Epiphany, Los Angeles, Cal., formerly director of St. John's Settlement House, Philadelphia; Rev Edwin T. Lewis, rector St. Matthias' Church, Los Angeles; Rev. Herbert H. Powell, D. D., vice-dean Church Divinity School, San Francisco; Rev. Britton D. Weigle, Executive Secretary, Diocese of California, San Francisco.

Special speakers are: Rt. Rev. William F. Nichols, D. D., Bishop of California; Rt. Rev. William H. Moreland, D. D., Bishop of Sacramento; Rt. Rev. Louis C. Sanford, D. D., Bishop of San Joaquin; Very Rev. J. Wilmer Gresham, D. D., dean of Grace Cathedral, San Francisco; Hon. John E. Richards, San Jose, Cal.; Rev. Leslie E. Learned, D. D., All Saints' Church, Pasadena, Cal.; Professor Kenneth Saunders, Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Cal.

Those interested and who intend to attend the conference should write to the business manager, Mr. Edward March, 1800 Leavenworth Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Commencement Exercises at the Bishop Payne Divinity School.

The commencement exercises of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, Petersburg, Va., began Sunday afternoon, June 5, when the baccalaureate sermon was preached in Emmanuel Chapel by the Rev. J. W. Herritage, D. D., of Fayetteville, N. C. The Alumni Association held its public meeting in Emmanuel Chapel Wednesday evening. The Rev. S. W. Grice, warden of the school, introduced the Ven. E. L. Baskervill, of South Carolina, as the speaker from the alumni. The other speakers were the Rev. F. G. Scott, D. D., from the faculty, and the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D., dean of the school. The business meeting of the Association was held in Whittle Hall on Thursday morning. The report on the Alumni Scholarship Fund showed that good progress was being made in raising the necessary amount.

The Board of Trustees held its annual meeting in Whittle Hall at noon Thursday. The members expressed themselves as very well pleased with the reports made by the dean, the warden and the professors. Repairs and improvements on the school property to the amount of two thousand dollars were ordered to be made during the summer. The commencement exercises proper took place in Emmanuel Chapel Thursday evening. The speaker was the Rev. T. K. Nelson, D. D., of the Theological Seminary in Virginia. Short addresses were made by the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., and the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D. Certificates on work accomplished were awarded to Lemuel C. Dade, of the Diocese of Michigan, and Jocobus J. Posey, of Southern Virginia, members of the Senior class. The degree of B. D. was conferred upon the Rev. John E. Culmer, of the Diocese of Florida.

F. G. R.

Convention of Organists.

Church organists from all over the country will attend the fourteenth convention of the National Association of Organists at Philadelphia from July 26 to 29. The sessions will be at Wanamaker's, where also the great organ will be played by Charles M. Courboin and others. Among the subjects of discussion are greater co-operation between the minister and the organist, the need for all-round training, and the advantage of forming local groups of organists. E. M. Skinner and W. E. Haskell (Estey), the great organ builders and voicers, will show practically how pipes are made today and voiced.

Excursions and recitals will complete a wonderful program, including a wireless recital transmitted from the great organ at the Pittsburgh Carnegie Institute. The entire convention is open to all organists and lovers of music. Details may be obtained from the president, Henry S. Fry, St. Clement's Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

University of the South.

At the recent commencement exercises of the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., a committee was appointed to have charge of the proposed memorial to the late Rev. Williams Porcher DuBose, D. D., long time chaplain of the University and dean of the Theological Department.

The memorial to Dr. DuBose, it is proposed, shall take the form of a lectureship in the University, for the particular purpose of interpreting the theology and the philosophy of Dr. DuBose, and translating it into the thought of the day.

The Order of the Purple Ribbon was conferred upon the Rev. Stewart McQueen, rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Montgomery, Ala., for many years a member of the Board of Trustees and secretary of the Board of Regents, who during all his years of service has never missed a meeting of either board.

The Board of Trustees increases the alumni representation from three to six members, and the new members are the Rev. Walter Mitchell, of the Porter Military Academy, Charleston, S. C.; Dr. Oscar N. Torian, of Indianapolis, Ind., and William Alexander Percy, of Greenville, Miss. These trustees take office at the regular meeting of the board in June, 1922, and are elected for a term of three years.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the Rt Rev. Troy Beatty, Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Tennessee; the Rev. N. Collin Hughes, of Raleigh, N. C.; the Rev. James M. Maxon, rector of Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn.; the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker, of Houma, La., field secretary of the Board of Religious Education oof the Province of Sewanee, and the Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of South Carolina.

Northfield: The different Conference of Summer Schools meeting at Northfield this season are: Young Women's Conference, June 24-July 1; Interdenominational Women's Home Mission Summer School, July 5-11; Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, July 12-19; Summer School of Religious Education, July 21-28; General Conference of Christian Workers, July 30-August 14; Massachusetts Christian Endeavor Institute, August 15-21.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Commencement at St. Stephen's.

Commencement this year at St. Stephen's College, Annandale, the Rev. Dr. Bernard I. Bell, president, marked a new era in the life of this college. The exercises took place for the first time in the new service building, opened during the year. This building is a marvel of compactness and completeness—splendid assembly hall, gymnasium, showed baths, bowling alley, college store, all substantially constructed.

Degrees were granted Bishop Ferris, of Western New York, who gave the formal address, to Bishop Mize, of Salina, and seven men were graduated. All of the seven are to study for Holy Orders, a record hardly made by any other college this year. In his address on commencement day, and also to the Eulexian Club dinner, President Bell stated the scope of the college to be for all young men, Church men and others, and the churchmanship to be comprehensive in all things.

Graduates returning to St. Stephen's this year hardly knew the place, so greatly have things been improved. Grounds and buildings are in admirable condition, prosperity proclaimed at every turn, and graduates, undergraduates and alumni shouting the greatness of the college as they have not done in years. Plans are announced for far larger usefulness, and appeals are made for larger equipment, not that all who apply for admission may be accepted, but that fewer will have to be turned away because there is no room. Praise for the administration of President Bell was heard on every hand.

St. Stephen's College occupies an ideal site on the banks of the Hudson, a short distance north of Poughkeepsie. After careful examination by educational authorities, it is certified to rank in standing with all well-known colleges. Its equipment of beautiful campus, dormitories, library, community building, president's house, beautiful stone church which serves both college and neighborhood, dining hall and record of alumni who have served the Church and the State, industry and the professions, need only to be better known to make the college of far greater usefulness. In these days most colleges are turning men away for lack of room. St. Stephen's seeks to grow that it may meet part of this great need.

C.

Churchwoman's Club Organized.

One of the most interesting developments of Church work undertaken recently, is the organization by the Churchwoman's League for Patriotic Service of a Churchwoman's Club in New York City.

A club-house will be opened in the fall, which will contain pleasant club-rooms, bedrooms and a good restaurant. It will be centrally located and will be of real service to women coming into the city to stay overnight or for a longer visit. The club will be a rallying place where lay problems can be discussed and acted upon from the point of view of church members, a center for thought and purpose, comfort and hospitality for Churchwomen of the city and all over the country.

Members have already been enrolled as far away as Houston, Tex., and many suburban women have said that a club of this kind is just what they need in

New York. Mothers with young daughters coming into the city to go to the theatre or a dance will find the club a convenient and suitable place for them to spend the night. Busy professional and business women living in New York, or coming to the city frequently, say that this club will solve the housing problem for them, assuredly one of the worst with which they have to contend. Representatives of Church organizations coming to the city for quarterly meetings will be assured of comfortable and convenient headquarters at a minimum of expense and effort. In every place that the plan has been presented, it has met with instant success.

Any Churchwoman who desires further information about the club or who wishes to secure a membership blank is asked to apply to Mrs. Malcolm Macfarlane, 8 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City.

Trinity Church: At the meeting of the vesrty of Trinity Church, held on Monday, June 13, the committee appointed to consider nominations for the vacant rectorship, of which Colonel William Barclay Parsons is chairman, reported progress, but made no definite recommendations. The vestry requested Bishop Manning, who presided at the meeting, to continue to hold the rectorship until a successor is chosen Bishop Manning consented to do this, but stated that he was not willing to receive any salary for so doing, and the vestry passed a resolution expressing their heartfelt thanks to the rector and their due appreciation of his action.

At the suggestion of Bishop Manning, action was taken by the vestry making $2,000 with living quarters a minimum salary for the curates of the parish.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop

Bishop and Executive Council Consider Social Service and Other Important Work at First Meeting.

Plans for vigorous work in social service were presented by the Department of Christian Social Service at the meeting of the Bishop and Executive Council held in Christ Church, Savannah, June 16, and a resolution presented by the department endorsing the State Board of Public Welfare was adopted by the Council. The resolution which will be sent to the Governor and members of the Legislature from the various counties in the Diocese, calls the attention of the State to the constructive work that is being done by the Department of Public Welfare in improving the care given the helpless and dependent, urging the Legislature to give the necessary support to carry on the work.

Conferences for teacher training, the formation of parish groups for adult study of the Church's life and the organization of the Church School Service League, form part of the program of the Department of Religious Education, and the Publicity Department will plan for a larger circulation of subscriptions to the Church papers at a certain time in November, and will cooperate with the Department of Religious Education in conducting a small circulating library on Church History and other phases of religious education. The Nation-Wide Campaign Department will hold a conference the latter part of September conducted by one of the national leaders to train a group of clergy and laymen who will go out to the smaller parishes and missions to put before the people the plans of the campaign and the effective means of carrying it out. The Department of Missions and Church Extension reported on the salaries and sources of income stating that there are eighteen clergymen, including white and colored, doing missionary work in the Diocese. This is the first meeting of the Council since the organization the first of May.

E. D. J.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Boys' School of St. Paul's Closes Successful Year.

The closing exercises of the Boys' School of St. Paul's Parish, a Church boarding school for boys, now more than seventy years old, were held at 8-10 East Franklin Street, the school building, on the evening of June 9. The rector, the Rev. Dr. Kinsolving, presided, and after prayers introduced Captain Wardlaw Miles, headmaster of the Gilman Country School for Boys, who spoke delightfully and helpfully to the boys on "Personality," with a clear, ringing Christian note. The Rev. Mr. Van Duyne presented the awards. The highest award both in scholarship and deportment was bestowed upon Robert Lee Bull, Jr., of Belair, Md., who also received the History and English prize. The Latin award was won by Hugh Knox Higgins, of Baltimore, who also received the highest award in his form. In the first form the prize was won by Gordon Taylor, and in the third form by William H. Purnell.

This school for a moderate tuition, $250 for non-singing and $200 for singing boys, provides Church education for thirty-four boys. It owes an incalculable debt to the late Dr. Hodges, who fostered it during difficult years, and under the present rector and Board of Trustees has made marked progress in all its standards.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA

Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Archdeacon Cresson.

The Rev. William H. Cresson, Archdeacon of the East Coast of Southern Florida, passed to higher life on June 6, 1921, after a sudden, brief illness at Charleston, S. C.

Born in Philadelphia on July 25, 1846, Mr. Cresson moved to Southern Florida over thirty years ago and devoted himself with rare consecration and self-sacrifice to the work of the Church, serving actively and efficiently as a lay worker till made deacon by Bishop Gray in 1908 and later advanced to the priesthood.

Known and beloved along the entire East Coast section of Southern Florida, Archdeacon Cresson was sought constantly by people of all ages, classes and creeds, his presence desired in joy or in sorrow, his wise counsel asked and heeded in countless needs, his devotion to Christ and to all mankind shown throughout his life of daily service.

Keeping vigorously at his work, which included important diocesan matters beside his own extended field, Archdeacon Cresson had recently gone to near friends at Moultrieville, S. C., for a brief vacation, but within a week after his arrival became ill and everything possible was done for him in a Charleston hospital, but the Master's summons, for which his earthly life had been a faithful preparation, were given on the evening of June 6.

Memorial services, attended by large numbers of his friends, were held at several of his mission points. His removal is a keen loss and sorrow to this Missionary District, as his life here was a rich blessing.

C. R.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. H. Brent, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. D. L. Ferris, D. D., Suffragan.

Girls' Friendly Society.

The twenty-ninth annual meeting of the Western New York Diocesan organization of the Girls' Friendly Society in America will be held in Geneseo on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 28 and 29, 1921.

At the annual service Tuesday at St. Michael's Church, the preacher will be the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of Western New York, and the offering will be for the Diocesan Holiday House.

The annual Diocesan Council meeting will be held Wednesday at Diocesan Holiday House, Conesus Lake.

Associates desiring entertainment for Tuesday night, June 28, will please notify immediately Mrs. Eleanor Shaw Smith, Geneseo, N. Y.

Automobiles will meet all trains arriving at Erie Station, Geneseo, on June 28 and 29. Those arriving elsewhere please notify Mrs. C. E. Bennett, Geneseo, N. Y.

A special celebration of the Holy Communion was held in Christ Church, Rochester, and an address made by the rector, the Rev. Lewis Gouveneur Morris, D. D., Thursday morning, June 23, "The Day of Intercession and Thanksgiving for the Girls' Friendly Society all over the World," appointed by the English Incorporated Council. The offering was for the memorial of Mrs. Roberts, eleven years G. F. S. A. president.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop

Special Services at Coles Creek.

On Sunday, June 12, special services were held in St. Gabriel's Church, Coles Creek. At the service in the morning a man eighty-four years of age was baptized, twelve were confirmed and the Holy Communion was celebrated by Bishop Darlington.

In the afternoon a grove service was held, attended by hundreds of people from the neighboring country and from the parishes of Berwck, Catawssa, Bloomsburg and Danville. This service was practically a missionary mass meeting, with addresses by the Rev. Messrs. Appleton, Ph. D., Ake, Morgan and the Bishop, and by Mrs. Paul E. Wirt, president of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary, the president of the Berwick Branch, Mrs. A. H. Wooley, of Danville, and Miss Catharine Swartwout, of St. Gabriel's, Coles Creek.

L. F. B.

NORTH TEXAS

Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop.

Clerical Changes.

Several changes have recently been made in the working force of the clergy. The Rev. Milton Swift has gone to Canyon, to reside there, taking the church services there and at other mission stations; the Rev. C. E. Clarkson, formerly at Fairfax, Mo., will now reside at Sweetwater, holding services there and at other places. These two clergymen will now serve the various missionary stations, where the Rev. D. A. Sanford has supplied the vacancies. He now takes work elsewhere. At Stanford, Albany and Spur the Rev. Frank H. Stedman began work the first Sunday in June. The Bishop is now much pleased to have these vacancies filled.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Important Meeting of Executive Committee, D. M. S.

The first meeting of the Executive Committee of the Diocesan Missionary Society, after its reorganization by the recent Council, was held in St. Paul's Parish House, Richmond, on June 14, with a full attendance of members.

Under the ned canon the D. M. S., acting under boards appointed by it, is in charge of all the Religious Education, Christian Social Service and missionary work of the Diocese, and has full charge of the further conduct of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The following boards were appointed:

Board of Religious Education: The Rev. Messrs. J. F. Ribble, D. D., K. J. Hammond, D. D., E. L. Woodward, M. D., W. H. Burkhardt and G. M. Brydon; Dr. J. H. Dillard, Mr. W. W. Marston.

Board of Christian Social Service: The Rev. Messrs. W. R. Bowie, D. D., Giles B. Palmer, W. Roy Mason, Mr. John Stewart Bryan and Mr. John B. Minor.

Board of Apportionment: The Rev. Messrs. W. D. Smith, D. D., G. M. Brydon, F. W. Neve, D. D., F. D. Goodwin, Lewis C. Williams, Oliver J. Sands, Robert Beverley, John T. Ramey, Robert T. Morrison and John M. Taylor.

In each case the Board has the right to elect, as additional members, a number of men outside of the membership of the Executive Committee of the D. M. S. equal to the number elected from the Executive Committee.

The work of the Nation-Wide Campaign, including the carrying on of the campaign through the coming fall, will be under the Board of Apportionment.

A Committee on Bible and Prayer Book Distribution, consisting of the Bishop, the Treasurer of the Diocese and the Rev. J. F. Ribble, D. D., was appointed to take over the work hitherto done by the Bible and Prayer Book Distribution Society.

The Executive Committee made provision also for a Committee on Church Extension with a membership of seven to be appointed later by the Bishop.

The Bishop reported the gift, by a devoted Churchwoman of Washington, of $6,000 in cash and nine acres of land in Clark County, on which the present Morgan's Mill Mission, in the Blue Ridge Mountains, has been conducted, the money to be used for the erection of one or more buildings for the use of the mission. This generous gift was accepted with the thanks and sincere appreciation of the Executive Committee.

G. M. B.

Work on New St. Mark's Church to Begin at Once.

Plans for the new church for St. Mark's, Richmond, the Rev. W. D. Smith, rector, are complete, and work will begin immediately.

The present estimate calls for the Sunday school and church roofed in, and the congregation hopes to get in the building by Christmas. The Sunday school will be finished for immediate use.

The church is colonial in design, of pre-revolutionary type, the colonial being consistently carried out, and will give an auditorium of pleasing effect.

The Sunday school room and parish house will contain the main auditorium, morning chapel, men's and women's Bible class-rooms, infant and primary departments, single class-rooms, choir-room, kitchen and pantry; in fact, every convenience for Sunday school and parish work.

St. Mark's congregation moved from the old church at First and Clay Streets in November, 1919, and have been worshipping in the R. E. Lee School for the past eighteen months. The old members have stood by this new effort and have done splendid work in carrying forward the present plans.

A Committee on Church Extension, composed of women from all the Episcopal churches in Richmond, has raised several thousand dollars to help develop this work.

The Late Rev. John S. Hansbrough.

In the death of this venerable clergyman on Thursday, June 9, the Diocese loses its oldest presbyter. Mr. Hansbrough was in the ninetieth year of his age. He graduated at William and Mary College in 1853, and after some years spent in teaching entered the Theological Seminary in Virginia. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Johns on December 18, 1859, and priest March 22, 1861. He was rector successively of Martins-Brandon Parish, Prince George County; Cumberland Parish, Lunenburg County; Wilmer Parish, Farmville, and again at Martins-Brandon, until February, 1870, when he became rector of St. Thomas' Church, Orange. He served here for thirty-eight years, resigning and becoming rector-emeritus in 1908, and continued to live there until his death. Mr. Hansbrough attended the recent Council in Charlottesville, and the Council adopted a resolution extending to him congratulations and their good wishes. He was in many respects an almost typical Virginia clergyman of the generation past, firm and outspoken in his convictions and strong in his devotion to his Church and people.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Convention of Sunday School Institute.

Announcement is made by the Board of Religious Education of the twenty-fifth annual convention of the Sunday School Institute to be held in Epiphany Parish Hall on October 19. The principal speaker at the morning session will be the Rev. Dr. Samuel S. Drury, rector of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H. In the afternoon the Rev. James Lawrence Ware, Sunday School Field Secretary of the Province of Washington, will lead a conference of general interest. At the public meeting in the evening the address will be made by the Rev. James E. Freeman, rector of Epiphany Church.

The board is planning to conduct a series of teacher-training classes for Sunday school workers, meeting next winter on Thursday afternoons and evenings, beginning October 27. These classes will be conducted by the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of St. Matthew's Parish, Hyattsville, Md., who conducted with great success similar classes last winter.

The Rev. William B. Dent, vicar of Holy Comforter Chapel, was recently elected a member of the Board of Religious Education to succeed the Rev. Percy Foster Hall, formerly of Epiphany Parish and now rector of St. Paul's Church, Alexandria.

Open Air Service: The preacher at the people's open air service, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, June 19, was the Rev. C. R. Stetson, rector of St. Mark's Church. His sermon was strong and timely, and a very large congregation and perfect weather on such a beautiful spot made the service one of great inspiration.

M. M. W.

The McKim Memorial: Doubtless many friends and former parishioners of the late Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim outside of Washington would like to be contributors to the proposed memorial, an enlargement of the tower of the Church of the Epiphany and a great chime of bells, to cost about $60,000, of which mention was made in this correspondence last week. All contributions may be forwarded to Mr. William C. Johnson, Treasurer, care Federal National Bank, Washington, D. C.

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Educational Conferences.

The Rev. W. E. Gardner, D. D., Secretary to the General Board of Religious Education, held three conferences between June 1 and 8, the first at Spokane, the second at Walla Walla, and the third at Wenatchee. They were all well attended, and the visitor's persuasive eloquence and executive ability deepened his hearer's interest in the work of the Sunday school. The lessons put forth by the Christian Nurture System and his messages to the Woman's Auxiliary were not only most timely, but spiritually helpful. Bishop Page entertained the clergy at luncheon in Spokane in honor of Dr. Gardner.

The baccalaureate sermon to the graduates of the 1921 class of the nurses of the Deaconess Hospital was recently given by the Rev. Leonard K. Smith at St. James' Church, Spokane.

The Church of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, Northport, is shortly to have a parish hall for the purpose of the meetings of the Sunday school which has outgrown the present building, and also to be used for the social activities of the people.

The Rev. George Herbert Severance has left Oroville, Wash., for an extended trip to New Hampshire. He will return to Spokane early in the fall and take u phis duties as Archdeacon. His work at Oroville is now in charge of the Rev. Vincent Gray, formerly of New Kensington, Pa.

St. David's, Spokane, under the leadership of the Rev. John G. Larson, is outgrowing its present quarters, and it is hoped this year to erect the much needed parish hall, and also to enlarge the church.

W. A. A. S.

(Continued on page 22)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Ed to

In Time of Peace Prepare to Preserve Peace.

"Late in 1917 Dr. Willard A. Paul, a member of the Association to Abolish War, proposed to print the Sermon on the Mount, without note or comment, for free distribution. The Secretary of the Association, Mr. Wilbur K. Thomas, was officially informed that such a procedure would be regarded by the Department of Justice as 'pro-German.'"

The foregoing is typical of the effect of war upon the mental attitude of a nation. It actually brought about an order prohibiting the publication and distribution of the sublimest utterance of all time.

This, however, in itself also throws light upon war psychology for the people who now publish, and distribute the "Sermon on the Mount," and who wanted so much to do so when we were in the midst of arming to fight the Germans, would not want to publish with it the account of the cleansing of the temple, where we are presented the picture of the Same One who said, "Blessed are the meek," overturning the money changers' tables and beating the men who sat at them with a scourge of thongs.

That constitutes the true awfulness of war. It is not only the physical death and material destruction that it brings, but the mental distortion that comes with it.

When war comes those who are opposed to it think only of the peaceful utterances of the Saviour, while, on the other hand, a Christian government suppresses the circulation of the Sermon on the Mount.

All this being true, and it most assuredly is true, brings home to us the fact that the time to abolish war is not when it is upon us, when an armed enemy is at our doors, and nobody can take a normal attitude on the subject, when the pacifist is thought to be giving aid to the adversary and the government is considered tyrannical in the exercise of its authority, but when the country is at peace and we can meditate upon the awfulness of organized slaughter with a mind not upset by intense emotions.

An old saying runs, "In time of peace prepare for war." It is time for Christian people to change this so that we should say to ourselves, "In time of peace prepare to preserve peace."

We do not think that General Bliss put the case too strongly when he wrote that the ministers and Church people would be responsible for every drop of blood shed in any future war. The Christian people of this country are strong enough to bring about the attitude that Christ would have taken on this subject if they would only unite for that purpose.

One of the ways, perhaps, to awaken the sense of responsibility which we have in this matter is to keep before the public the horrors of war.

On the gate of a little cemetery on the site of the first battlefield in the War Between the States is this inscription:

"United States Cemetery. Established 1865.

Interments 54
Unknown 53
Known ..... 1"

It is a short story, but it contains the whole history of every struggle between nations. While there is one grief, one tragedy about which we know, there are fifty-three of which no one ever hears.

There stand those little tombstones not showing because nobody knows whose graves they mark, there within less than fifty miles of the capital of the country they stand as silent witnesses to the terror of that stalking monster—War.

Let us dedicate ourselves to that greatest of all causes before the world through our prayers and our propaganda. Let our motto be, "In time of peace prepare to preserve peace."

THE CHURCH AND THE DELINQUENT.

Prison records show that a larger percentage of people claim church affiliation within prison walls than outside, from which it might be argued that the majority of our criminals are bred under church influence, or, at least, that religion affords no help against temptation. But statistics, it has been said, may be used to prove any theory under the sun, and they form a dangerous tool in the hands of those who do not know their deficiencies. The fact is that a large number of men who ordinarily profess no church allegiance and give no thought to religion will give some denominational preference when they enter prison. The official record, for instance, of the Illinois State penitentiary at Joliet for 1920 shows, we are told, that 92.15 per cent. of the prisoners professed some church affiliation. The record runs surprisingly high, writes Rev. Leo Kalmer, Catholic chaplain of the prison, in the Catholic Citizen (Milwaukee). Protestants have 42.6 per cent. of the total prison population; Catholics, 45.1 per cent.; the Jews, 2.62 per cent.; the Greek and Russian Orthodox, 0.37 per cent.; whereas those of no religious affiliation show only 8.56. Yet only 40 per cent. of the total population of the country at large, according to the United States religious census of 1916, registered church affiliation of any kind."

The above is an extract from an interesting article in the Literary Digest of May 28:

As is here pointed out, the statistics show a surprisingly large number of prisoners with church affiliations, but the writer can vouch for the fact that this is an erroneous impression, because after several years intimate relations with prisoners and prisons, it is a constant source of wonder that so few of the men behind the bars have any connection with a church.

Indeed this very fact is one thing that goes to prove that the churches are functioning better than many of their critics would have us believe.

Not only does the Church as a preventive influence of far greater power than many people realize in the matter of criminal tendency, but also it is unusual that the families needing relief are rarely closely connected with churches.

This may be partly due to the fact that pauperism and medicancy are often the first steps of criminality.

However this may be, the fact remains that it is seldom that families applying to the Associated Charities have any close affiliation with churches.

It is also true, and most gratifyingly true, that when such persons, either criminal or poor, can show any claim to the help of a church that it is usually forthcoming and the religious body will assume at least some, if not all, of the responsibility for their relief.

An interesting comment on the method of relief given by churches was made by a charity worker recently.

She said the greatest trouble about the help that churches gave was that they almost invariably lacked persistent effort, that at first the Church would give more than was necessary, but without any supervision of the expenditure of the funds donated, and then become disgusted over the wastefulness or foolishness of the way such money was used, and refuse to give more.

There are many cases where a monthly and sometimes a weekly allowance is the only way to support a family sometimes for a year or so, while a mother is being taught household economy and efficiency, and it is very seldom that a church has a person capable of giving the time and the training necessary to such cases. The wisest way of handling such a case is for the church to do it through the Associated Charities.

When a boy has come to grief who has had Sunday school or church associations, it is invariably the case that some of his former teachers or classmates will come forward to help him out and it makes it much easier to get a suspended sentence from the judge, and the boy has a great deal better chance of "making good."

In the case of bad girls, however, it is much more difficult to get church workers to render the aid that is needed. Of course, there are reasons for this which even our Saviour could not overcome, and nothing so scandalized the pious people of His time as His persistent kindness toward this type of delinquent. We see it from the time when His disciples "marvelled that he talked with a woman of Samaria," on throughout His ministry, but He was evidently setting us an example that He meant us to follow.

Family Department

JUNE.

1. Wednesday.
5. Second Sunday after Trinity.
11. Saturday. S. Barnabas.
12. Third Sunday after Trinity.
19. Fourth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Friday. Nativity S. John Baptist.
26. Fifth Sunday after Trinity.
29. Wednesday. S. Peter.
30. Thursday.

Collect for Fifth Sunday After Trinity.

Grant, O Lord, we beseech Thee, that the course of this world may be so peaceably ordered by Thy governance, that Thy Church may joyfully serve Thee in all godly quietness; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Peter's Day.

O Almighty God, Who by Thy Son Jesus Christ didst give to Thy Apostle Saint Peter many excellent gifts, and commandest him earnestly to feed Thy flock; Make, we beseech Thee, all bishops and pastors diligently to preach Thy holy word, and the people obediently to follow the same, that they may receive the crown of everlasting glory; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Entrance.

Martha A. Kidder.

Outside a house the weary children cried,
Who were not strong enough to open wide
The heavy door—"Oh Father!" and again.
"Dear Father, let us in!" nor asked in vain,
In haste their father opened wide the door,
As he had often done for them before.

Outside my Father's house I also stood
And saw the people enter, bad and good.
I hesitated in my sense of sin
And faintly murmured, "Father, let me in!"
A calm fell on my spirit and I went Into His house like one by angels sent.

His love had drawn me and His tender care,
I felt the blessing of the House of Prayer;
So like the children who implored the aid
Their father gladly gave, I knelt and prayed
My Father for His help, Who heard my voice
And taught my chastened spirit to rejoice.

When I at last have reached my journey's end
Outside of heaven's gate to humbly bend,
My ransomed soul shall cry, "My Father, dear,
May I not enter who am now so near Thy many mansions?" then with tender love
He shall receive my soul in bliss above.

Teaching the Child Responsibility.

Mrs. Everett lingered anxiously in the halls. "There is no other room to put it in," she said; "if it is any place else I am afraid the gas will kill it. And the children might knock it off—"

"Never fear that any harm will come to your precious fern through the children," laughed her sister as she pinned up her hair before the glass.

"You will tell them not to touch or go near it?" inquired the other anxiously. "You will impress on their minds that it is very rare and valuable and that they must not even look at it?"

Her sister laughed quietly. "Do you remember the story that mother used to tell of the woman who told the children when she went away that they must not put beans in their nostrils, and when she came back every one of them had done that very thing? They never thought of doing it until she suggested the idea."

"You mean that if you tell the children not to touch the plant that they will?" asked the visitor in alarm. "Then, perhaps I had better stay at home."

"Nonsense! I only meant that I disapproved of that particular method. Your fern will not be touched. Please call Lillian and Fred for me."

When the children came she showed them the fern sitting on the table in the room where they generally played.

"Isn't it a beautiful thing?" she asked, putting an arm around each of them. Lillian put out a finger and touched one of the delicate fronds.

"It is just like a fairy fern," she said.

"Yes, indeed! And now Aunt Doris and I are going downtown, and we want to leave it in your care."

There was a protesting gasp from the doorway, but she did not pay any attention.

"You know it is very rare and valuable," she continued, "and we trust you to take care of it for us, so that no harm of any kind will come to it. You see, even a careless touch might break off a portion of it or a jarring of the table upset it. But I am so glad you two will be here, for I shall know it is safe."

Fred drew up his shoulders proudly. "Yes, we will take care of it," he said; "you and aunty run along and don't worry—it will be all right."

Two hours later they came home and Mrs. Everett burst anxiously into the room where they had left the fern. The children were nowhere in sight, but the precious pot and its contents stood intact and beautiful as ever. She dropped breathlessly into a chair.

"I am thankful!" she exclaimed. "I thought surely that it would be ruined You did not even tell them not to touch it."

"But they did not do it, nevertheless," said the mother in quiet triumph. "I believe in teaching the children a sense of responsibility, and there is almost no child that will not respond to the trust reposed in him. The children felt that the fern was a sacred trust with them—that they were responsible for its welfare and they have not failed to live up to that responsibility. If it had been simply a forbidden object they might have obeyed me and left it alone, but they would not have felt the same about it. Why, here they come now."

The door opened and Fred crossed over to the table and inspected the fern gravely. "We played outdoors," he said. "Of course we would not have harmed the fern, but accidents will happen when you are playing, so we thought we wouldn't take any chances. And Aunt Doris, I have been planning a case for you to carry it in when you go home. I can make it out of raffia and straw so that it will protect it from everything. You know something might happen to it on the train."

"I have been worrying about that," confessed his aunt. "What a thoughtful boy you are!"

"Mother teaches me to be thoughtful," he said earnestly. "She expects it, you know, and a fellow can't disappoint his mother. I guess if I had a mother like some fellows I would be just as careless as they are."

"Perhaps not," said his aunt, "but I think your mother's method is splendid myself."

"No bouquets," laughed the person discussed. "Remember, you were not so positive about it before."

"I am now," said her sister, "and I hope Fred will never disappoint you."

"I never will," said Fred.

"I would trust greater things than ferns, however priceless they might be, to my children," said the mother softly, with shining eyes, "for we all know they will never disappoint me. They can't—my faith in them won't let them."

Fred gulped a little. "That's just it," he said eagerly; "when a fellow knows his mother has all kinds of faith in him he just can't do what she doesn't want him to. But all mothers aren't like ours. Why, some of the boys' mothers won't believe a thing they say, and after a while they don't care whether they tell things right any more or not. But if I tell mother a thing she says she knows it is true and no one could lie to a mother like that. Could they, Aunt Doris?"

Aunt Doris wiped her eyes. "No," she said softly, "they couldn't. And I've learned something this afternoon that is more precious to me than all the ferns in creation." And she wiped her eyes again.—Faye Merriman, in Presbyterian Banner.

Man's Need and God's Answer.

If it were true that man is sufficient for himself, needing only the influence of a great Example to evoke his own inherent moral and spiritual power, then the gospel might be a poem or a picture of Incarnate Goodness, and it would satisfy all his needs. But if man is not sufficient for himself—if, as a downright fact, he is weak and helpless—if there be such a thing as sin—sin, which is more than "maladjustment to environment"—sin which is wilful lawlessness—which means that man has missed the mark." missed the end for which he was made, and that so deeply as to have drawn the very purpose of God into His finite failure—if this be so, and we believe that it is so—then man needs more than example. He needs help, redemption, rescue, healing.

All the painful, passionate yearning of forty centuries of heathenism cried out for this, and it was given to us in Christ. "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," and "While we were yet sinners Christ died for us." That is the Creed of the Church—the Divine Father and Forgiveness; the Divine Son and Redemption; the Divine Spirit and Abundant Life. Therefore, the Church still insists upon the creation of moral rectitude and spiritual character as the end and purpose of religion, aye, as the basic problem underlying all questions relating to human life—social, industrial, civic and political. The Church still preaches the gospel of the grace of God, the obligation and blessing of worship, and the meaning and virtue of the Christian sacraments. And it must be admitted that at least her system is logical and all of one piece. The sacraments are the perpetual witnesses and guarantees to us of the fact of the Incarnation of God in Christ; and the Incarnation was the supreme revelation of God's Fatherhood and forgiveness; the promise and prophecy of God's Incarnation in the race by the power of the Holy Ghost.—Bishop T. F. Gailor.

The Present Christ.

When Christ went up to heaven the apostles stayed
Gazing at heaven with sculs and wills on fire,
Their hearts on flight along the track He made,
Winged by desire.

Their silence spake: "Lord, why not follow Thee
Home is not home without Thy blessed face,
Life is not life. Remember, Lord, and see,
Look back, embrace.
Earth is one desert waste of banishment,
Life is one long-drawn anguish of decay.
Where Thou wer't wont to go we also went:
Why not today?

Nevertheless a cloud cut off their gaze:
They tarry to build up Jerusalem,
Watching for Him, while this the appointed days
He watches them.

They do His will, and doing it rejoice,
Patiently glad to spend and to be spent;
Still He speaks to them, still they hear His Voice
And are content.

—C. G. Rossett.

The Green Hat.

In the old clothes' bag at Ismid was a bright green velvet picture hat. It had been there quite a long time. It is not difficult to understand that a hand reaching into the bag for an article of clothing for a tiny white-faced orphan or a weary, starved and ragged refugee woman would thrust back with impatience such a gaudy bit of frippery. It seems as if that hat would suffer its final disintegration in its comings out of and goings back into the bag.

But there came a day when the hat came out of the bag and didn't go back in.

Six hundred refugee children begging in the streets of Ismid, obtaining food where best they could (often sharing the rations of the soldiers), were rounded up for a hot bath, warm new clothes from America, food from the soup kitchen and medical treatment at the children's clinic. After the bath six hundred suspicious-looking polls were shaved and pretty woolen caps were distributed. Alas, there proved to be only five hundred and ninety-nine caps. What was to be done about the last little naked head.

The owner of the hand concerned with the distribution of pretty woolen caps remembered suddenly the many angry encounters with that verdant horror of velvet. The hat was clapped upon the head of the last tiny person clad otherwise in new gray flannel. It could not be seen with what emotion it was being worn, for it was a large hat and its wearer was small. There need have been no apprehension; every day the hat appeared in line at the clinic.

It was a strange hat, apparently, endowed with a cameleon-like personality. Had it belonged to some actress of dramatic roles and had it taken from her the power of subtle impersonations? Every day that hat looked in some peculiar way a little different. The doctor, the nurses, the entire Near East personnel formed the habit of speculating on what character the hat would assume next. Would it swagger through the compound door? Would it peek shyly 'round the lintel and modestly take its place at the foot of the line? Would it stalk like deathless tragedy among the round, bobbing heads?

The mystery was a long time in the solving, for six hundred sheared, grayclad figures can look much alike. It takes a touch, say that of an exotic green hat, to emphasize character. Yes, revelation came at last. That gorgeous hat was going the rounds. The baths were good and so were the clean, comfortable heads in their pretty caps; the good American clothes were warm and the hot soup slowly was beginning to round out wan little cheeks; the good doctor was making sore eyes and aching bodies well, but it took the glorious green velvet hat to make the day perfect for a tiny human atom in the cue that waited daily at the doorways of Near East Relief in Ismid for all that stood between them and hunger, disease and filth.—The New Near East.

The Teacher's Warrant.

"Let him that heareth say, Come."

How can I guide these youthful, eager feet,
When mine so oft have wandered from Thy way?
How can I dare Thy wondrous truth repeat
With lips so stained by sin, from day to day?
Yet, Lord, I heard Thy loving voice say, "Come,"
And, having heard, how can I choose but tell
Of Him Whose tender heart holds ample room
For me, and for these ones I love so well?
I have no wisdom. Thine is all complete,
And Thou dost bid the needy come to Thee.
I come, and bring these dear ones to Thy feet.
Receive and bless them, Lord. Teach them and me!

—Elizabeth Brewster.

Making Prayer Definite.

A rich old Chinaman in Korea, having at last been persuaded to submit to a necessary operation, and having passed it successfully, lay bandaged and helpless in a Christian hospital. He was not a Christian himself, but the courage and skill of Christian doctors and nurses had impressed him. Casting about in his mind for some means of reassuring himself and keeping up his courage, he met the eye of the surgeon who had come to inspect his work.

"Doctor," muttered the old man, "are you praying for me?"

"Yes," said the doctor.

"But how can you pray for me? You do not know my name."

"Oh, yes, I do," said the doctor. And he recited all the quaint syllables without a slip.

A smile of pleased surprise wrinkled the yellow face, only to be followed by a dubious look. "You'd better make sure of this," said the Chinaman. And with a slow and careful enunciation he told the doctor the name and number of the street where he lived, and the fact that he was seventy-four years old. "You'd better put that in your prayers," he said; "I don't want any mistake made."

The old Chinaman has now fully recovered, and no doubt attributes his good health to the fact that he gave the doctor such definite praying instructions.—Central Christian Advocate.

Cold Churches.

"Your church is cold." We have heard that before. It has nothing to do with the heating plant in the cellar. It means a lack of warmth and cordiality to strangers. It is a common reproach of the Episcopal Church. As with all criticisms, only the truth they contain hurts. Now, the search for truth here involves, first, a correct understanding of the genius of our worship, and second, of the character of our church edifice.

Our church buildings are set apart exclusively for worship, except in the case of missions or undeveloped parishes which do not represent the norm. Consecration to such holy use instills in our hearts and minds a feeling of instinctive reverence. No age needs this virtue more pre-eminently than the present. In a certain sense America has always needed to be taught reverence, for we are a youthful nation, proud of our strength and self-reliance. It requires perspective to value what is old and enduring, and, therefore, true.

One does not expect, nor does he desire, that the Church, either before or after service, should develop into a social center. Particularly is this true after the service of Holy Communion, confirmation or other similar moments of aspiration, when one wishes to carry home something of the hush which fell on his spirit in the solemn hour so recently spent. The parish house was built very largely, to give ample room for the expression and development of the social instinct. Now, the borderland between a virtue and a vice is extremely narrow, and while one would not for a moment surrender the atmosphere of peace, calm and holiness which we have in a church set part, consecrated, to God's worship; he must beware lest this virtue involve him in a tendency to be individualistic, and finally selfish. Man is a social animal, and in the providence of God he was set upon this earth in families. The Church is, by its very constitution, a fellowship, its public worship is corporate ,and its entire life is interpenetrated by the communion of the Holy Spirit of God. The services of the Episcopal Church are drawn from a book of "Common Prayer"—a worship in which both priest and people share.

The implication is clear. If the spiritual atmosphere of our churches lacks warmth, we are indifferent to the fundamental character of the Church of Jesus Christ. The external expression of warmth is formal, but it may be entirely sincere. Ushers who stand in the vestibule of the church can give a dignified welcome to strangers, see that they are provided with a Prayer Book and Hymnal, and escort them to a comfortable place in God's house, where they can share the beauty and solemnity and the helpfulness of our worship. The normal man does not wish to be slapped on the back and asked the condition of his spiritual pulse as soon as he walks into a strange church; but he does expect, in his unfamiliarity, to be conducted to a place in the church where he will feel relatively "at home."—K. M. B., S. W. Episcopalian.

We associate the term infidel with one who is faithless in matters essential to our Christian belief. But there is another infidelity which brings our Lord's repeated denunciation. It is the infidelity in service, faithlessness in divine ideals and aspirations, in loving ministrations, in withholding consecration.—Selected.

For the Young Folks

A Child's Belief.

I believe in God the Father,
Who made us every one;
Who made the earth and heaven,
The moon, and stars, and sun.
All that we have each day
To us by Him is given;
And we call Him when we pray
"Our Father, Who art in heaven."

I believe in Jesus Christ,
The Father's only Son,
Who came to us from heaven,
And loved us every one.
He taught us to be holy,
Till on the cross He died;
And now we call Him Saviour,
And Christ, the Crucified.

I believe God's Holy Spirit
Is with us every day,
And if we do not grieve Him,
He ne'er will go away.
From heaven upon Jesus
He descended like a dove.
And dwelleth ever with us
To fill our hearts with love.

—Selected.

The Life of a Child.

Young people of America, what are you going to do with your summer?

School closes in May or June, and it does not open until September or October. Here are two to four months during which you are released from the class-room. All winter, for five days every week, you have spent five or six hours a day in the pursuit of knowledge. Five or six hours a day, five days a week, total twenty-five or thirty hours a week. How are you going to employ that time?

You are planning to fill the majority of those hours with the pleasures for which you find little time in the winter. Is it not so? Young people need pleasure. They need out-of-door exercise. They need acquaintance with the sun, with growing things, with birds and animals. And summer is the only time that most of them can have these things.

The young people of the Near East, from the puny, crying babies whom their mothers are too starved to nourish, and children whose winters should be passed in busy schools, to the older young people who should be preparing themselves with the study of sturdy vocations to enter self-respecting adult life, they, too, should have acquaintance with the sun, with growing things and with the birds and animals. They have.

They know the sun's burning rays that beat on the desert, heating sand till it blisters weary, dragging feet. They have an intimate knowledge of growing things, meagre blades of grass that they eat in their terrible hunger, torturing their starved bodies till they fall and die. With the birds and animals also they have a curious relationship, for in the end are they not a welcome find to those scavengers of the air and the wild places of the earth, when in their extremity they have dropped?

Happy girls and boys of America, what are you going to do with your summer? How will you employ all those leisure hours of every week all through the pleasant vacation time?

Does not your heart suggest that you might devote a few hours of every week to earning money that you might buy for those needy young people of the Near East, not a sunbeam, nor a beautiful flower, nor yet the song of a bird, but sterner necessities, things without which human beings cannot live—food, clothes, elementary education and training in some vocation with which they can become self-supporting?

There are many ways in which money may be earned in vacation time by the enterprising:

Plant a garden and sell its product.
Make jellies and preserves.
Take subscriptions for magazines.
Sew and sell the things you fashion.
Pick and sell berries and fruit.
Mow lawns.
Run errands.
Sell papers.
Raise a pig and sell it.
Raise and market chickens.
Run a lemonade, popcorn and peanut stand.
Work on the farm and give a part of what you earn.
Sell goods on commission.

Then there is the Near East Relief coupon book, entitled, "The Life of a Child." This little book contains sixty coupons valued at one dollar each. For one dollar an Armenian child can be fed for one week. For sixty dollars, the amount represented by the complete book, an Armenian child can be supported for a whole year. Where is the happy American boy or girl who has not friends enough so that the disposing of one of these books through the long summer would not be an easy matter? At least a part of one of the books could be sold, coupon by coupon, and no sum, however small, is too little to send to those unfortunate children in the far-away country who, without our help, would have nothing.

Can you not—no, will you not—earn and give this summer to help the children in Bible lands live on to strong and useful manhood and womanhood?—The New Near East.

When Work Was Play.

Mazie was sitting on a stool in front of an open fire. In her hand she held a little broom, as she had been sweeping up the hearth, and had sat down to consider whether she would take the corner of the dining-room which was next to the parlor, or let Lucile have it when she came over to play paper dolls. This was the favorite corner, as the parlor door opened into the dining-room in such a way as to make that corner a little room.

As she sat there thinking the matter over her mother came in with her wraps all on. "Oh," she said, "you are brushing up. That's good! When you finish you can dust, and then set the table. I'm going up the street. I won't be gone very long."

Mazie was a well-trained child and did not argue with her mother. "Yes, mother," she said, but there was a look of disappointment in her face that made her mother think, "I'll stop at Kuntz's and bring her some candy." She kissed her daughter and hurried out.

Well, no paper dolls, that was clear, unless the work was finished before mother got back. For after she came Mazie would have to help in the kitchen, and Lucile would have to go home to her dinner.

Just then a tap was heard on the window, and a face framed in a red cap looked in. Mazie jumped up and opened the side door.

"Oh, Lucile!" she exclaimed, "I was just fixing up to play paper dolls and mother came in and told me to dust the dining-room and set the table. She's gone out."

"Let's play a while first," suggested Lucile.

"I guess we'd better do the work first. Maybe there will be some time left if we hurry as fast as ever we can."

Tap, tap—another face at the window framed by two blue mittens and a fur cap. "There's Maud!" exclaimed both children at once, as they rushed to open the side door.

Again the woeful tale was told—work instead of play.

"Well," said Maud, "I know what let's do. There is a game I learned at Cousin Clara's that you can do work by."

"A game!" said Mazie. "How can you play and work at the same time?"

"Just get me a sheet of paper and a pencil and I'll show you." She tore the paper into halves, quarters, eighths, sixteenths. On each piece she wrote the name of an article of furniture—mother's chair, father's chair, high chair, mantelpiece, sideboard and so on. Then she put these pieces into a box, saying, "We'll draw these first." Mazie and Lucile watched with great interest. On other pieces she wrote the names of things to go on the table—asbestos cloth, white cloth, plates, knives and so forth. These she put into a separate box.

Taking up the first box, she held it out to Mazie and said, "Draw one." Mazie put her hand in and pulled out a piece on which was written "side table." "That means," said Maud, "that you must dust the side table."

It was not long before all three were as busy as bees, running to the box, drawing the slips and dusting the furniture. Soon the first box was empty, and they started on the second. These slips told how to set the table. Everything was on but the carving knife and fork, and Lucile and Mazie were both hurrying back for the last slip when the door opened and there stood Mazie's mother. They had been so lively they had not heard the front door open. "What is this?" she said. "You haven't put your friends to work, have you, Mazie?"

"Oh, it isn't work?" they all cried. "It's play. We've had lots of fun!"

"Perhaps, then, you don't want this?" said her mother as she handed Mazie a box of marshmallows.

"Yes, we do, too," said Mazie, "and we'll sit right down and toast them."—The Churchman.

Baby's Bath.

There's a fisherman wee, as cute as can be,
And I watch him go sailing off daily;
In his little tin boat, he's contented to float,
As he waves two wee hands to me gayly.

There's no hook and no line, yet the fishing is fine!
With his dear chubby fingers he snatches;
Why, isn't that luck? There's a swan and a duck,
While two tiny fish he next catches!

They don't seem to mind, for he is so kind,
He puts them all back with a warning;
And gurgles with glee, so certain is he
That he'll catch them again the next morning!

—Daisy D. Stephenson.

A Musical Instrument From Old Bottles.

An amusing and clever musical instrument may be made from a number of old bottles, such as we buy lime juice or vinegar in. Even medicine bottles will do, but the bottles should all be the same size.

Having collected our bottles, we take an ordinary broomstick and rest this on the backs of two chairs, placed several feet apart. Then we tie the bottles to this stick, so that they hang loosely and not too close together.

Now comes the work of tuning up, and this we may do by pouring water into the bottles, a different quantity into each, putting more water for a low note and less for a high. To get the note of each, we tap it with a stick —the edge of a box-wood rule is a very good thing for this purpose. With patience and perseverance and a little ordinary care and skill we shall at last have our bottles all tuned and ready for use, and we can now play the curious instrument by striking the bottles with the edge of the rule.

Of course the bottles need to be strong, or the striking would break them; but we need not strike very hard. It will be found that simple tunes can be played on the bottle-bells, and after some practice we can take two sticks and thus play quicker tunes.

It is ,of course, essential that the bottles should be hung at such a distance that they do not knock against each other when struck with a rule or stick.

Much fun can be obtained from this home-made instrument, which should only be used out of doors, so the water runs out on the ground in case the bottles break; although there is no need, if care be exercised, to have any such accident.—Virginia Guide.

Get Out-of-Doors.

Get out-of-doors! 'Tis there you'll find
The better things of heart and mind.
Get out beneath some stretch of sky
And watch the white clouds drifting by,
And all the petty thoughts will fade
Before the wonders God has made.

Go wade a trout stream in the spring
And brother with the birds a-wing;
Know what it means to wander far,
Your guide the sun or evening star.
Who sleeps beneath the open sky
Soon grows too big to tell a lie.

Get out-of-doors! The fields are clean,
The woods will teach you nothing mean.
Who toils beneath the summer sun
Sleeps soundest when his work is done.
If splendid manhood you would know,
Get out where you've a chance to grow.

Read deeply kindly nature's books,
Familiarize yourself with brooks
And with the majesty of trees,
The constant industry of bees,
And all that shapes the Master's plan—
They'll teach you how to be a man.
—Exchange.

Tubby Greenfrog's Mistake.

One moonlight night Tubby Greenfrog was sitting on the bank of the big pond among his brothers and sisters, all of whom were being carefully watched by Mrs. Greenfrog.

"Tubby, you talk too much," Mrs. Greenfrog was saying. "You don't give the other children a chance to make themselves heard."

When she said this, all the little Greenfrogs seemed to appreciate it, for they began talking. But they all began talking at once, and even little Tubby joined in, as if he had not been making a noise all evening. Grandpa Greenfrog added his voice, too, with his deep bass, "Jagarung." All together they made such a din that they attracted the attention of Hoot Owl, who was taking advantage of the beauty of the evening to show off to his neighbor Owls his beautiful fall suit of feathers of which he was so proud.

Hoot Owl heard the noise made by the Greenfrogs with joy, and he hurriedly turned his wings so they would take him to the big pond instead of to the pasture, where he had hoped to catch a field-mouse for his evening meal.

But just as he was coming close to the edge of the pond, Mrs. Greenfrog heard the rustling of his wings, and, looking up, saw him, not twenty yards away. "Hush, children," she cried in a hoarse whisper. She didn't have time to say anything else, for Hoot Owl had very good ears and was getting closer every moment.

Luckily for them, all the children hushed. Hoot Owl came on, to the very top of the bank, and sat down, peering over to see if he could find a fat Frog upon which to pounce. But the frogs kept still, and since they were pretty well hidden in the grassy border Hoot had trouble in finding one upon which to dine.

Just as he had about decided to leave for the meadow, because he thought that the frogs had jumped into the water, he heard Tubby say, "Mamma, what did you want us to hush for?" That was exactly what he wanted—to hear one of the Greenfrogs make a noise. So he dashed quickly towards the voice.

Mrs. Frog, however, seemed to know what was coming. Just as soon as Tubby asked his question, Mrs. Greenfrog shouted, "Jump! Jump!" And to show them she meant what she said, she jumped into the water.

All the Greenfrogs followed her, Tubby among the rest. But as Tubby was going into the water he saw, out of the corner of his eye, Hoot Owl's wicked face not six inches away from him, and he shuddered to think what would happen if Hoot should ever get hold of him.

It was a long time before the Greenfrogs came outdoors again. When they did, Hoot Owl was gone. Tubby was the last one out of the water. As he came out he looked carefully all about him before he crawled up on the bank beside his mother.

"Tubby," said Mrs. Greenfrog, when they were all settled again, "I told you you talked too much."—Presbyterian Banner.

Mules in the World War.

The poor, despised army mule, whose dynamite-like disposition and active hind legs have won him such an objectionable reputation, was just as efficient in his own little capacity as any other functionary of the late World War.

Many a dark night near the front, when shelling started in our vicinity, the unfortunate mules were often subjected to very disagreeable conditions, in some cases receiving such wounds as to necessitate shooting them before we resumed our march to the front lines. On some nights, when the enemy was unusually active with his artillery, my company lost as many as eleven head of horses and mules during a single barrage.

In some instances I have observed remarkable intelligence displayed by mules.

One afternoon in a small patch of woods, where my company was temporarily quartered, the inevitable shelling started with a reality that made us think of home. A small French village lay to our right, and in there the barrage had begun, gradually creeping toward our vicinity and jeopardizing a group of helpless mules that belonged to an artillery outfit. The poor animals seemed to scent the danger, for their ears twitched and they grew restless.

Unfortunately, a shell screeched into their midst and burst. I watched, anxiously, to see if any fell, but not a mule went down.

After a series of jumps and leaps, as they were tied, one little fellow seemed to have got loose and trotted over toward another member of the company and myself. When he reached us he stopped before us and looked straight into our eyes as though pleading for aid. We examined his wounds and found that he had received shrapnel injuries about the neck, right side and ears, his halter having been severed by a fragment of shrapnel.

We appreciated the animal's intelligence and led him to our regimental surgeon, who dressed his wounds in plenty of bandages. Later in the day I saw the little fellow grazing in a field and munching grass as coolly as though nothing unusual had occurred, his long ears bobbing around in the white bandages. The next day my company moved from the woods, and I often wondered what became of the wounded mule.

Like our indefatigable war horses, the hard-working little mules were on the job whenever there was real labor to be accomplished, and, aside from an occasional spell of stubborn balkiness, they performed their duties with satisfaction.—Joseph R. Schadel, in Our Dumb Animals.

A Day!

"It may be sunny—it may be gray—
Whatever it is, it is God's own day!
A bit of His time He has lent to you,
To learn some lesson—some task to do!
It may be bright with a sunlit track;
It may be shadowed with storm clouds black;
But take it pluckily! Make it fair!
Show you are worthy to walk just there!"

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR
CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon. Va., R. F. D. 2.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

WANTED—LADY, WITH COLLEGE DEgree, to teach high school mathematics in Southern Boarding School for girls. Address Willanow, care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A WORKER QUALIFIED TO teach for the Indian Mission in the mountains of Amherst County, Va. Will be associated with an experienced social worker. Adequate salary. Comfortable mission house. Schoolhouse and church on the grounds. Address Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, Amherst, Va.

WANTED—MOTHER AND DAUGHTER, or two sisters (white), to do cooking and laundry work in small family in the South. State salary expected in first letter. Reply "W. P.," care Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—A HOUSEKEEPER FOR HOSpital. Must be efficient, and know how to manage colored help. Give references. Address Gladys Wingfield, Social Service Worker, Hansford, W. Va., care Sheltering Arms Hospital.

SITUATION WANTED.

EXPERIENCED CLERGYMAN, GRADuate-seminarian and post-graduate, desires parish or live mission. Unmarried. Apply "E. F.," care Southern Churchman.

CLERGYMAN DESIRES PARISH IN town or country; is a Southerner; earnworkers; small family; good visitor. Address "K. J.," care Southern Churchman.

A REFINED LADY WISHES A POSITION a matron in a college, or school; to enter fall session. Address "G," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—POSITION AS MOTHER'S helper, or assistant in home. Address "E. A. P.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant principal or matron in a school, or some position of trust in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Moore: At the residence, 617 Westover Avenue, Monday, June 13, 1921, at 8:15 o'clock P. M. KATE McCLEAN, widow of Samuel P. Moore, in the 75th year of her age.

MENEFEE.

Died at his residence, Washington, Va., May 21, 1921, F. G. MENEFEE, son of the late I. T. Menefee and Mary Stribling Crawford, his wife. Mr. Menefee was a graduate of Virginia Military Institute of the class of 1870, and for twenty-two years was cashier of the Santa Cruz County National Bank. He married Miss Sarah Skinner, of Santa Cruz, who died several years ago.

A friend says of him: He lived true to every test of integrity; faithful in the performance of every obligation, with conscientious regard for his word, he had the full confidence of the people of this community, where a large number of friends will read of his death with sincere regret.

CATHARINE MEADE FLETCHER.

Entered into rest on Saturday, May 7, 1921, at "Thornton Hill," near Sperryville, Rappahannock County, Virginia, CATHERINE MEADE FLETCHER, wife of the late James W. Fletcher, and daughter of the late John Nelson Meade and Elizabeth Holmes Mackey Meade.

She is survived by two sons, Wm. Meade Fletcher and James H. Fletcher.

For over fifty years she was a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church at Woodville, Va., and her devoted love of the Church was the predominating characteristic of her life and an inspiration to others. She had kept the faith in the truest, deepest and fullest sense, and a heavenly crown awited her.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

412 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK

MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS

MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE

CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States

The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921

The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later

For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE
Florist
209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.
Flowers of Quality

"The Store That Pleases"
FOR FURNITURE
JONES BROS. & CO.
INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

Sacramental Wine
Absolutely Pure Grape Wine
Made expressly for use at the Communion Table
Established 1857
Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001
H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.
Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS
Highest grade instruments. In use in three thousand churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.
M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
08 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

Have You Made Your Will?
See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.
Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.
"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

There's a Word
frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.
The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.
The Union Bank of Richmond
1104 East Main Street

In Matters Pertaining to
Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.
RICHMOND TRUST CO.
Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.
JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832
Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company
Of Richmond, Va.
ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41
Wm. H. Palmer, President E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

Shave, Bathe and Shampoo with one Soap.— Cuticura
Cuticura Soap is the favorite for safety razor shaving.

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health. and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Executive Board Meeting.

The regular meeting of the Executive Board was held in the parish house of Christ Church, Roanoke, June 17. The following persons were present:

Bishop Jett, Mrs. Hobart, Miss Davis, the Rev. Messrs. Mead, Gibson and Block, and Messrs. Michael, Cocke and Pierce.

As this was the organization meeting, the Bishop delivered a brief charge to the Board, impressing upon them the solemnity of their duty to the Diocese and urging an even deeper sense of consecration during the coming year.

A committee was appointed to investigate the proposed construction of a community house in Campbell County. A committee was appointed to confer with the Bishop and recommend to the Board at its next meeting a suitable man to act as Secretary for the Diocese. Among other routine matters it was decided that the sum of one thousand dollars should be appropriated for the year 1921 as a donation to St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School, Lawrenceville, Va.

The secretary of the Board was instructed to send a request to the President of the United States, respectfully urging him to act with favor upon the proposed conference of certain friendly nations on the subject of disarmament, calling the same as early as possible and using the good offices of the agencies of this country toward bringing about the most desirable results.

Personal Notes

The address of the Rev. Alexander Galt is now 1614 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va.

The address of the Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, is changed from 502 Greenwood Road, Raleigh Court, to 1103 Second Street, S. W., Roanoke, Va., being the address of the property recently purchased for the Episcopal residence.

St. John's College, Annapolis, Md., conferred the degree of Doctor in Divinity upon the Rev. Wyatt Brown, Litt. D., rector of the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore, Md., at commencement exercises on June 14.

The Rev. Alexander R. Mitchell has been elected president of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of South Carolina. Any communications to the committee may be addressed to him at 204 Atwood Street, Greenville, S. C. Mr. J. Nelson Frierson was elected secretary. His address is Columbia, S. C.

The Rev. R. B. Templeton, D. D., dean of Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock, Ark., and his family are spending the months of July and August in the mountains of North Carolina. While there the dean will do some special work with Archdeacon Griffith, of District of Asheville. Dean Templeton's address is Canton, N. C. During his absence the services at Trinity Cathedral will be cared for by Bishop Winchester.

The baccalaureate sermon at Sweet Briar College was preached on Sunday, June 5, by the Rev. Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving, rector of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore.

The Rev. Thom Williamson, Jr., was instituted as rector of Advent Parish, Washington, D. C., on Sunday morning, June 19, by the Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, Bishop of the Diocese.

Bishop Lloyd has accepted the presidency of the Hebrew-Christian Publication Society, succeeding the late Bishop Burch.

The Rev. DuBose Murphy has resigned his position at the Church of the Epiphany, Dorchester, Mass., and will take charge of missions at Starkville, Macon and Brooksville, Miss.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.

Richmond, Va.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.

Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.

Richmond, Va.

HESITATING?

Make up your mind, and come right in. We are waiting to extend you a cordial welcome and to place our facilities at your disposal.

We shall be glad to have you open a Savings Account with us.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main and Twelfth Streets

The Rev. William P. S. Lander has resigned as Executive Secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign of the Diocese of Long Island and becomes the rector of St. Luke's Church, Forest Hills, L. I. His address until October 1 is 35 Slocum Crescent, Forest Hills, L. I. He continues as minister in charge of the Church of the Annunciation, Glendale, L. I.

The Rev. Alexander E. Hawke, rector of St. John's Church, Parsons, Kan., having accepted the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, Emporia, Kan., will take charge on September 1. He succeeds the Rev. Carl W. Nau, now at St. Paul's Church, Kansas City.

Ordinations.

At the Seabury Divinity School, on May 24, Messrs. Herbert Lewis Jones, George Benjamin Scriven and Arthur Chandler Baldwin were ordered deacons by Bishop McElwain, who also preached. Dr. Kramer, warden of the school, presented the candidates.

On Wednesday, May 11, in the Chapel of the Good Shepherd of the General Theological Seminary, New York, the Rev. George Rodgers Wood was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of Bethlehem. He was presented by the Very Rev. Hughell E. W. Fosbroke, and the Rev. Francis J. Hall preached. Mr. Wood will continue as a fellow at the Seminary and also in charge of the Church of St. Andrew's-by-the-Sea, Belle Harbor, L. I.

In the Seminary Chapel, Nashotah, Wis., on Monday, May 30, the Rt. Rev. R. H. Weller, D. D., Bishop of Fond du Lac, ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. Francis W. G. Parker and Bernard A. E. MacLaughlin. The Rev. Dean Larrabee presented the candidates, and the Rev. E. White, dean of Fond du Lac, preached the sermon.

On Wednesday, June 15, in St. John's Church, Huntingdon, Pa., Roy Joselyn Ford was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. He was presented by the Rev. George R. Bishop, of St. Luke's, Altoona. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Floyd Tomkins, of Holy Trinity, Philadelphia. The Rev. William Heakes, of Lewistown, read Morning Prayer, and the Litany was read by the Rev. F. T. Eastment, of Philipsburg. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop. Those clergymen present and taking part in the services were the Rev. Messrs. Tomkins, D. D., William Heakes, F. T. Eastment, F. T. Cady, E. L. B. Pielow and Jesse A. Ryan. Mr. Ford has accepted the assistantship of St. Luke's, Altoona, Pa. After the service a collation was served in the parish rooms, and addresses were made by the clergy present and by the Rev. Dr. Brumbaugh, president of Juniata College, and by Mr. Samuel A. Hamilton, a vestryman of St. John's. In the afternoon of the same day Dr. Tomkins spoke in the parish house of Trinity, Tyrone, and in the evening he spoke in the Y. M. C. A. building at the request of the local ministerium.

On June 2 Mr. Edward Moncrieff Bruce was ordained deacon in St. James' Church, South Pasadena, Cal., by the Bishop of Los Angeles, assisted by Bishop Coadjutor Stevens. The Rev. Leslie E. Learned, D. D., preached the sermon.

In the Cathedral of All Saints, Albany, N. Y., on Sunday, June 5, Bishop Nelson ordained to the deaconate Leonard Wallace Steele, of Jewett, N. Y. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Pierre McD. Bleecker, rector of Trinity Church, Ashland. Bishop Nelson preached and Dean Larned read the Epistle.

In Christ Church, Gilbertsville, N. Y., on Sunday, May 29, Bishop Nelson advanced the Rev. Leon C. Smith to the priesthood. He was presented by the Rev. George R. Van de Water, D. D., of New York City. The Rev. R. A. Ford, of Oneonta; the Rev. E. E. Hutchinson, of Morris, and the Rev. John de L. Scovil, of Bainbridge, N. Y., assisted with the service.

In St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, Del., on June 5, the Rev. Edward Henry Ford was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Cook. The candidate was presented by the rector, the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell. The Rev. John D. Skilton, D. D., assisted in the service. Mr. Ford will shortly relinquish the superintendency of the black powder department of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. to give all his time to the ministry. He continues to serve as assistant minister in St. Andrew's Church.

On Sunday, June 12, at St. Paul's Church, Milwaukee, Wis., the Bishop of the Diocese ordained as deacon Herbert Pierrepont Houghton, Ph. D., Litt. D., LL. D., who was presented by the Rev. Holmes Whitmore, rector of the parish, and the Bishop preached the sermon. Dr. Houghton will be assistant at St. Paul's Church for the present.

"The Treasure House of Song"

Church of the Redeemer
St. Louis, Missouri

"Our congregation is greatly pleased with the new book, and our congregational singing has improved fifty per cent. There are hymns to suit all occasions and for many seasons of the church year the selections have been wise and comprehensive. In my judgment the New Hymnal has greatly enriched the musical service of the Church, but it will take some years for our people to realize what a fine heritage we have in this Treasure House of Song."

(Signed) E. DUCKWORTH,
Rector.

THE NEW HYMNAL

Single copies ..... $1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more ..... 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more ..... 1.00 cash

(Carriage Charges Extra)

The Church Pension Fund

14 Wall Street, - - - - - - - New York

GIVE US YOUR OPINION OF

THE CHURCH AT WORK

The Church at Work was started as a medium through which to reach all of the

600,000 FAMILIES OF THE CHURCH and keep them informed of and interested in what is being done and planned to carry on the mission of the Church. It is believed that it is absolutely essential to do this in some way if the ground gained is to be held and if the Church is ever, as a whole, to prosecute her mission adequately.

What is your opinion?

If you believe this must be done, is The Church at Work in your opinion the best way to do it?

VARIETY OF OPINION

We are told, on the one hand, that The Church at Work is not distributed; that where distributed it is not read, and that even where it is read it is not of such a character as to meet the need.

We are told, on the other hand, that the paper is interesting and informing and is generally read and has proved effective in arousing increased interest where it has been distributed.

What is your opinion of the paper? What improvements can you suggest?

AS TO DISTRIBUTION

At first 600,000 copies were issued. They were sent in bulk to diocesan centers, there re-shipped in bulk to the parishes and missions and the parishes and missions were asked to provide distribution to all the families by adult visitors.

When it was learned that in many places there was not a thorough distribution it was announced that papers would be shipped to only those parishes and missions which would promise a thorough distribution. Such assurances have been made for a total of 425,000 copies, which is the number of the June issue sent out.

Did the parishes and missions which discontinued the paper refuse it because of the character of the paper or because of the difficulty of distribution?

If the publication of the paper is continued for the two-thirds of the Church which seems to desire it, how shall we reach the one-third of the Church which has declined to distribute it?

AN EXPERIMENT

The Church at Work is an experiment made in the effort to solve a problem of vital consequence. It has been only partially successful. Perhaps no single method can be fully and universally successful.

Do you know of a better method for use in the whole Church?

Do you know a method by which this present method may be supplemented?

We desire to know the kind of the Church. Please fill out the following blank and mail it to THE CHURCH AT WORK, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

We beg you to take this trouble for the sake of the work.

Presiding Bishop and Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church
Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City

THE CHURCH AT WORK

These questions are addressed to the readers of this paper, those who appreciate the value and necessity of reading a Church paper.

Should a thorough effort be made to reach everybody in the Church with information?.....

Can you suggest a better way then The Church at Work?.....

.....

How shall we reach those who do not receive The Church at Work?.....

.....

Can you suggest a better method of distribution?.....

.....

Remarks:.....

.....

Name..... Parish.....

Address..... Diocese.....

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMONDE, VA., JULY 2, 1921. No. 27.

Barn and Other Buildings

The Hospital

BLUE RIDGE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL---VIRGINIA

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIDLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls

1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office addres to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST AL_AYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If you can't find time for religion, make time.

A guilty conscience is better than none at all.

The creation of a thousand forests is in one acorn.—Emerson.

"Stop looking for trouble, and joy will look for you."

You can make others better only by being good yourself.

No man lives until he would gladly die for something greater than life.—Purington.

Habits are like a rolling stone upon a mountain top, which a child may first set off, but a giant cannot stop.

The smallest bird cannot light upon the greatest tree without sending a shock to its most distant fibre; every mind is at times no less sensitive to the most trifling words.—Channing.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation

CHAS. J. SMITH President

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT

Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a la ge number of scholarships to students prepa ing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

RET. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

FASSIFERN A Home School for Girls

is situated on a plateau over two thousand feet above sea level and completely surrounded by the majestic Appalachian mountains, in the city of Hendersonville, N. C., far famed for its year-round delightful and health-giving climate. Fassifern offers thorough preparatory courses for entrance to colleges of highest rank. All teachers have A. B. or A. M. degrees. University of France, Columbia University, Smith College, Tulane University, University of South Carolina represented. Music, Art, Expression. Especial care given to girls below high school courses.

MISS KATE C. SHIPP, Principal Hendersonville, N. C.

EDUCATIONAL

Plan Your Vacation to Include

THE HOLIDAY HOUSE

OF THE

Girls Friendly Society

Wrightsville Beach, N. C.

RATES:

All members.....$5 00
Associates..... 7 00
Non-members..... 8 00

For reservations, address MISS ROSA DAIL, Housemother.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920
FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

HOLDERNESS SCHOOL for Boys

Five buildings. 20 acres. Prepares for Colleges and Technical Schools. Ranks with highest grade schools of New England, yet by reason of endowment the tuition is moderate. Modern gymnasium. Skating. All winter sports. 41st year.

REV. LORIN WEBSTER, L. H. D.,
Rector, Plymouth, N. H.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

A Girls' School with a Religious Atmosphere

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Pres. Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

A School which offers a thorough education at a moderate cost. Its location, on main line Southern R. R., is healthful and beautiful; the modern buildings are excellently equipped and surrounded by a ten-acre campus. The School maintains a gymnasium, with provision for outdoor athletics.

The curriculum embraces College Preparatory and Business Courses, Literary, Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all Colleges. Catalogue and views may be obtained by addressing

ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., Principal, Box 13, Chatham, Va

Collegiate School for Girlf

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.

Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

CAMP OKAHAHWIS

Senior Unit for Women Over 20

Near Rockbridge Baths, in the Blue Ridge, on the banks of North River.

R. R. Stations: Lexington and Goshen, Va.

Boating and swimming, drills, hikes, games and good comradeship.

Season, July 23-September 1st.

MISS MARY E. FRAYSER, Head
1636 West Grace, Richmond, Va.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida. Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street .....

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.

Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South

We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)

264-268 Bank St., Norfolk.

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color

REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF

Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out

MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS

For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail

XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.

Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 2, 1921. No. 27.

IT IS UP TO US

Are the people of this Church of ours willing to contemplate its gradual extinction? Do we want the churches closed up, and the congregations scattered, because there will be no ministers?

If not, what are we going to do about these facts?

In the year 1916 there were 256 students in five typical seminaries of our Church; in 1920 there were 179, a loss of 31 per cent.

Church papers can write about this as much as they please, but the situation will not be met until fathers and mothers begin to try to pray their own boys into the ministry, and vestrymen and other Church leaders try deliberately to pick out the best boys in the congregation and bring a personal suggestion of the ministry squarely up to them.

It is not a question any more of what we think; but of what we are going to do.

BELIEVING THE BEST

In our thinking on international questions, we Christian people can learn a lesson from the familiar little Japanese statuette of the three monkeys, with the hands of one over his mouth, of another over his eyes, and of the third over his ears—meaning "speak no evil, see no evil, hear no evil."

There is too much loose talk, rolled out by people who do not know anything and deliver themselves as though they knew it all—talk about how "we must fight Japan," talk about "the next war," about "human nature making it impossible to avoid wars," and other large-sounding declarations. This human race of ours would not be as far along as it is from its primeval savagery if the talkers about what we cannot do and what we cannot avoid had prevailed. It has made such progress as it has achieved, through those who have listened for goodness, and looked ahead, and had faith in the finer hopes.

The prospect for the Disarmament Conference is brightening. The Senate and the House of Representatives have agreed in conference upon the naval bill which includes the resolution asking the President to call it. A tremendous public sentiment has rallied to the cause.

Those who fear the conference may try to defeat it by spreading abroad, as a skillful propaganda can easily do, suggestions of this and that utterance in another nation, or action by another nation capable of evil interpretation, which rouses our own distrust. Let us remember that other nations, like ourselves, have two elements. There are the men of good-will, who are trying to find a way toward international peace; and there are the jingoes and demagogues—in no whit different from some whom we are cursed with—who play to the passions of the crowd. Let us listen for the wiser voices, believe in these, and strengthen among their own people all friendly forces everywhere by the response which we give to them.

PLAYING THE GAME

There are some boys who will never play the game unless they are "it." They will not follow somebody else's lead because they want to be the leaders themselves; and if the rules are not to their liking, they sulk on the sidelines. Moreover, there are a lot of people in the Church who in this respect are like the boys—only worse, because at their adult time of life they ought to have grown in grace.

We imagine that Dr. Freeman had this sort of men and women in mind when he wrote the article which is printed on another page. The weakness of our Church often is in the people who will not "play the game." They are satisfied that they know more than anybody else can teach them. If new plans are put forward, there must be something the matter with the plans because they did not think of them first.

It was this state of mind which robbed many dioceses of the finest blessing of the Nation-Wide Campaign. It was a venture which went beyond their accustomed thinking. It challenged an heroic simplicity of faith which they looked at askance as "mere enthusiasm." The leaders had made such-and-such suggestions; but why should they follow those leaders? "Were not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus ,better than all the waters of Israel?" What foolishness was this to expect that the undramatic business of getting people together in neighborhood groups to study and pray, and distributing literature by hand to people's homes instead of by mail, and training committees for a simultaneous canvass, would get results that a Wall Street organization could never match! Those who were said to be prophets might talk of their Jordan as much as they pleased, but they had local rivers of their own ideas which they preferred to bathe in. But if those local rivers have performed any miracles yet, they are not part of the record.

This is simply an example. What happened in the Nation-Wide Campaign happens in other instances. We are too slow to heed those who speak to us as the accredited messengers of the Church, and so—it may be hoped—of the plans of God. We have our Boards of Missions and Religious Education and Social Service, and our Department on the Nation-Wide Campaign, but we pay too little attention to what they say. They are not infallible, but the chances are that they know more than the rest of us. They are the leaders, and they have a right to expect that at their call we will play the game.

THE NATIONAL SOCIAL SERVICE CONFERENCE

The first Nation-Wide Conference of representatives of the Diocesan Social Service Commissions of the Church was a success which went beyond the hopes of its most optimistic friends.

It was a success, first of all, because of the attendance. Ninety-odd men and women came, and they came from every quarter of the country. On the wall by the door of the auditorium, where the conference assembled, there was a map of the United States, which showed also the dioceses and missionary districts of the Church. On sixty-one of these was the red mark indicating that the diocese or district was represented at the conference, and out of the forty-eight States of the Union thirty-six had some one present to answer to its name. Nor were the States represented only those States which were most accessible. The conference was held in Milwaukee, in the Central Northwest, not far from the Canadian line, but there were men and women present from Maine, from Florida, from Texas, and from California, as well as from all the regions scattered in between.

The conference was a success, in the second place, because of the admirable choice of place and time. It met in the handsome and comfortable buildings of the Milwaukee-Downer College, which had been graciously placed at the disposal of Dean Lathrop, Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service of the Church. It convened two days before the great National Conference of Social Work, which brings together each year the foremost experts of the nation in every kind of social endeavor. Some of the finest speakers at the Church Conference were available because of the fact that they were coming to Milwauke for the larger conference that was to follow, and many of the Church delegates remained for a part or all of the more general gathering.

The conference was a success, in the third place, because of the eager spirit which men and women brought to it, and the fine, frank interchange of opinion, and sharing of practical experience. Every one was anxious to make the most of every discussion and find out just what Social Service Commissions in every part of the country had done that was most valuable, what aims a commission should set before itself, what programs of service are practical. To a remarkable degree, both the prepared papers which were read, and the informal discussions, went straight to their point, were clear, definite and full of immediate suggestion for those who listened with their own problems and possibilities in mind.

The conference began on the evening of Monday, June 20, with admirable papers from Mr. John M. Glenn, of the Russell Sage Foundation, in New York City, and Dean White, of the Cathedral, in Fond-du-lac. Most of the delegates had arrived for this first session, and it was apparent at the outset that the conference had really succeeded in bringing together a representative body of the whole Church in the continental United States.

Tuesday morning the general subject was, "The Scope and Work of the Social Service Commission." Archdeacon Vernon, of Toronto, Can., was the first speaker, and he outlined the achievements of the Commission which represents the Church of England in all the Canadian provinces. Much of what he told about, of course—just as was true with every speaker for a particular commission—had been attempted by others, but there were particular experiments which he could tell of—and this was what was happening constantly, and was the thing which gave its living helpfulness to the whole program—which were wholly new to those who heard of them. For example, he described the remarkable organization which the Commission had worked out for discovering and welcoming newcomers of the Church of England into Canada. It has placed permanent workers at the great ports into which the trans-Atlantic lines to Canada come in—at Halifax, St. John and Quebec—and in a year 31,000 members of the Church of England were welcomed, and their names sent ahead to the clergyman in the town in Canada where they expected to locate. In the largest cities of the Dominion, also, workers have been located for service similar to that which the Travelers' Aid gives in this country, and Archdeacon Vernon told vivid personal experiences of those who had been helped by these representatives of th Church.

The report from the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Newark was notable particularly for its rapid development of the Church Mission of Help. In one year it had come into contact with 236 girls. From the Newark Commission, also, came the account of the binding together of the various organizations of the Diocese, such as the Girls' Friendly Society, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and others, in a definite responsibility of helpfulness for some of the Church institutions.

The Social Service Commissions of Connecticut, Kentucky and California also reported at this meeting.

Tuesday afternoon there were four papers on "The Church's Relation to Dependents, Delinquents and Defectives," of which the most striking was that of Mrs. John M. Glenn, former President of the National Conference on Social Work, on "The Wayward and Delinquent Girl." The Rev. L. E. Sunderland, Superintendent of the City Missionary Society of New York, spoke upon what the society is doing, dwelling especially, and with a wealth of personal incidents, upon the service rendered by the chaplains in the hospitals.

Unlike some other conferences, this one did not weaken toward its close. On the contrary, the last day was the most interesting and rewarding of all. It began with a remarkable paper read by the Rev. Samuel Tyler, D. D., of the Diocese of Western New York—printed elsewhere in this issue of the "Southern Churchman"—on "How Best to Get Social Service Into the Parishes." This was followed by a two-hour discussion into which flashed swift accounts from many men of what their own parishes were attempting, the whole of which kindled in everybody a new sense of the greatness in community service to which this Church of ours is alrady beginning to reach out.

On Wednesday afternoon Bishop Johnson, of Colorado, in his witty and attractive fashion, spoke on, "Is It a Responsibility for Social Service Commissions to Express the Conscience of the Church in Important Public Questions?" The Bishop believed that the Church, as a whole, could not do this. It is the Church's business, he thought, not to be drawn into questions where material values are at stake, but to produce righteous-minded citizens whose business it shall be to make the necessary righteous laws.

Following him came Miss Van Kleeck, in a speech which swept the conference into the most notable enthusiasm and applause of the whole three days. She took the opposite view from the Bishop. "There is," she said, "no value in pronouncements which mean all things to all men. The conscience of the Church ought to be like the conscience of the individual, not a text on Sunday, but something telling us what is wrong in the immediate questions of every day." What was said both by Miss Van Kleeck and the Bishop was taken down by the official stenographer of the conference, and we shall hope to print extracts from the addresses of both in the Southern Churchman.

The social pleasure of the conference was greatly added to by the hospitality of the people of St. Mark's Church, and of All Saints' Cathedral, by whom the members of the conference were invited to supper on Monday and Tuesday afternoons.

Each day the practical considerations of the conference were liften up into the atmosphere of the Presence of God. There was early communion in the chapel of the Milwaukee-Dower College on Tuesday and Thursday mornings, and corporate communion in St. Mark's Church on the mornng of Wednesday, which had been preceded by a devotional service led by Bishop Brent in the cathedral the evening before.

God grant me these: the strength to do
Some needed service here;
The wisdom to be brave and true;
The gift of vision clear,
That in each task that comes to me
Some purpose I may plainly see.

——Edgar Guest.

Get your Pledge Card Punched! Bishop Morris, of the Canal zone, has found pledge cards, instead of envelopes, in use among the English-trained natives of the West Indies who make up so large a part of his constituency. The cards are duly punched when they make their offerings. "These cards are as precious to them as anything they possess, and often they are buried with the owners."

THE CHURCH'S SOLIDARITY

By the Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, Rector of Epiphany Church, Washington

The war emphasized the need for greater national unity. There were those in our country who felt, when the call to arms was sounded, that lack of unity might be our undoing. We were happily surprised, however, to find that, once the call was issued, every State in the Union responded, and a polyglot and heterogeneous people became as one. Nothing in our generation, or indeed in any other period, has disclosed more fully the sense of the unity of the nation.

It is growing increasingly evident that there must come about a like unity in the Church. We are not speaking now of that unity that is thought for through our Commission on Faith and Order, but rather unity within our own body. It has seemed to us that we shall be more successful in pressing the claims of faith and order upon the other religious bodies about us if we recognize in all their fulness the meaning and significance of these terms as applied to our own household of faith. Obviously, there can be neither faith nor order without the sense of unity and solidarity. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." Today we are split up into dioceses and parishes, and in many respects we are more congregational than the body that bears that name. This has been repeatedly illustrated in efforts that have been made in recent years to effect great national movements.

The General Convention sets up central bodies for handling the Church's affairs at home and abroad, vests them with authority, furnishes them with all the means for doing a national and international work, and before the new body has been under way a few months, it becomes evident that it is difficult, if not impossible, for it to work efficiently in the interests of the whole Church, because its authority is questioned, its leadership impugned and its influence vastly curtailed. The Nation-Wide Campaign and the recent attempt at a Nation-Wide Preaching Mission are in demonstration of all this. Bishops themselves, in their own dioceses, claim that their authority as chosen leaders is questioned, and while diocesan interests receive a ready hearing, they receive but scant consideration at the hands of the parochial clergy. The spirit of parochial and diocesan independence and the sense of congregational autonomy repudiate any effort made to solidify, co-ordinate and unify the great common interests of the Church.

The great secular concerns over the land are beginning to realize that in union there is strength, and that without it there is weakness and inefficiency. No one is asking for an autocratic form of Church government, but there must be a happy meaning between such a form and that which today exists, in which there is a lack of the sense of national Church consciousness. In the other great professions, notably that of medicine and surgery, even the most outstanding representatives feel the need of not only having fellowship with their colleagues, but frequent and intimate conferences upon those vital questions that concern the common things in which they are engaged. In practically every walk of life the so-called get-together spirit is becoming more and more widely recognized. The time has come when our Church, if it is to take a great forward step, must recognize that the very first principle that predetermines a successful and efficient administration, general, diocesan and parochial, is a sense of the Church's solidarity. There will of necessity be differences of administration and possibly differences of interpretation. But notwithstanding these differences, there is no reason why there should not be a greater fraternity of interests, a greater recognition of the common responsibility of every bishop, priest and deacon for the maintenance of the Church's fundemanetl ideals and a clear obligation to uphold and sustain those well-defined and authoritative organizations and systems that are designed for the carrying forward of its plans.

Let us be frank about it and not side-step the question. Today we not only lack confidence in our leaders and in the organizations that the General Church has established for our direction and guidance, but we also lack cohesion and the evident desire to co-ordinate our work for the advancement of the common concerns of the kingdom whose Master we serve. We believe profoundly that the day has come when we must, for the saving of our house, and indeed for the saving of the nation itself, put away all party rivalries and strife, all petty diocesan and parochial differences and, recognizing the fundamental things of our faith and polity as a Church, come together, and with united strength press forward the great claims of the kingdom.

The laity will hardly be inspired with a sense of the Church's authority as an exemplar of truth, or with the refinements and beauty of its system and polity, or indeed with its essential unity as a body, unless the clergy disclosses a more evident devotion to these things.

A few strong churches here and there in our larger towns and cities, prosecuting their tasks, however splendidly and effectively, in an insular way, without the sense of obligation to the weaker or even to the stronger things of the Church, will not and cannot, no matter how successful their enterprise, save the whole Church from ultimate failure nor its far-flung battle line from rout and defeat.

The closing years of the war disclosed the need of the centralization of authority in a general staff, and not until the unrelated divisions of the battle front were federated together, acting in harmony, co-ordinating all their efforts and striking as one body, did the great gray lines of the enemy yield and break and the day of peace come. It was a mighty lesson for the Church to learn and profit by.

We believe that the day is coming when there will be a larger fellowship of the Christian bodies of every name, but before that day comes, if we in our Protestant Episcopal Church are to hasten it, we shall have to stand more compactly together than we do today, recognizing far more fully than we now do our authoritative bodies and officers, and through more concerted effort, impress the world about us with the unity within our own ranks. We shall always have to make allowances for temperamental and other differences, for the influence of tradition and training that enters so largely into our so-called point of view. All this we may do, but we dare not, if we are to really become a truly national Church, with a national consciousness, treat with indifference or unconcern those things that are related to our vital unity and our indispensable solidarity.

We believe the time has come when this Church of ours must set its house in order, and by the house we mean the whole house, and not a part of it. Bishops and clergy, committees and organizations, large and small, will make mistakes. They are not infallible. But notwithstanding this, if the battle against the common enemy is to be won, we must have leaders, staffs and an organization, and, above all else, obedience in the ranks.

ONWARD AND UPWARD.

Up the long slope of this low sandy shore
  Are rolled the tidal waters day by day;
  Traces of wandering feet are washed away,
Reliefs of busy hands are seen no more.
The soiled and trampled surface is smooth'd o'er
  By punctual waves that high behests obey;
  Once and again the tides assert their sway,
And o'er the sands their cleansing waters pour.
  Even so, Lord, daily, hourly, o'er my soul
Sin-stained and care-worn, let Thy heavenly grace—
  A blest, atoning flood—divinely roll,
And all the footsteps of the world efface,
  That like the wave-washed sand this soul of mine,
  Spotless and fair, smooth and serene, may shine.

—Richard Wilton.

What Is It to Know Christ? It is to have Him pressing Himself, with all the power that ever was in Him still in Him, upon our hearts today. It is to be conscious that He is forever taking my life afresh and impressing Himself upon it afresh. It is to hear Him calling to me not down the centuries from long ago, but from here, close at my side, with a voice that is newly lifted today, an invitation that is newly given today. It is not to be inspired by what He was, but to feel His power now coming straight from the living heart of Him to me. It is to experience, not the reflex influence of what He did far back in the history of mankind, but the direct influence of what He does. It is to discern, among the figures which crowd the canvas of our life, that One Figure moving ceaselessly to and fro. The Real Presence, if you like. To know Christ in this sense—that every moment He comes with a new ministry to snatch me out of my littleness into His greatness—that is eternal life. To know Christ in this sense—that He gives the secret of life newly to me ever and ever again—that is eternal life. To know Christ in this sense—that He repeats today every blessing He bestowed in other days, changing the form of it to meet the changing need, answering to every hour's requirement with grace newly-born out of His great and loving heart—to know Him so is to take life from Him now, is eternal life.—H. W. Clark.

HOW BEST TO GET SOCIAL SERVICE INTO THE PARISH

By the Rev. Samuel Tyler. D. D.

[This article is the report read by Dr. Tyler in Milwaukee last week at the first Conference of Diocesan Social Service Commissions of the Church. The other members of the committee, of which Dr. Tyler was the chairman and spokesman, appointed to formulate the report for the Conference on this subject, were the Rev. William Sheafe Chase, D. D., the Rev. Henry E. Hubbard, the Rev. G. Croft Williams, and the Rev. George H. B. Wright.]

The first step necessary to getting Social Service into the average parish today is to get the social point of view into the rector. You must "get" the parson if you would "get" the parish. Or, to use another popular expression, only a comparatively small number of the clergy have, as yet, been sold the social service idea, as far as its application to the Church is concerned. One correspondent, writing on this subject, says, "The satisfied ignorance of the clergy has astonished me."

Now such a condition leads us at once to ask the question, "Why is it that many of the official leaders of organized religion know or care so little about the relation of the Church to the social problem?" The answer is simple: To their minds "Social Service" as we call it, isn't the business of the Church, and the average clergyman feels that, already, within the recognized sphere of the Church's activities, he has troubles enough of his own, without going abroad to hunt up new ones. How such a conception as this as to the nature and work of the Christian Church ever came to be, we need not now take time to consider. Suffice it to say that all here will readily acknowledge its falseness.

As a matter of fact, the Church is the steward of a religion essentially social in character, and the type of service termed "social" constitutes one of the simplest and most fundamental expressions of the spirit of Christianity. Indeed, one of the most significant signs in our contemporaneous religions and social life is the increasing recognition of the need to have social reform and social work informed and guided by the spirit of religion. Herein lies one of the greatest opportunities, and at the same time one of the greatest responsibilities before the Christian Church today. In a remarkable communication sent to an international labor meeting, held just before the war in connection with the annual Labor Week celebration in England, which has recognized the definitely religious basis of the labor movement—a Socialist member of the French Chamber of Deputies, and none other than a grandson of Karl Marx—said that he had come to repudiate the conviction of his youth, that reform of social conditions was sufficient to insure the well-being of society, and that he now believed that we must reform the soul in order to make men worthy of the new order. And since he looked to Christianity to effect this inner change, he was throwing social reform back upon religion, as having the only sure guarantee of its thorough-going accomplishment and permanence. Social service, therefore, is dependent upon religion for its fundamental motive and dynamic, and the Church as the exponent of a social religion must go forth, as did the Master, in service of the widest sort, if she would be true to her mission—yes, if she would save her soul alive.

And, as for the clergy, who, as yet, are not alive to their responsibility in this matter, and who, therefore, constitute a great stumbling block in the way of getting social service into the parishes—well, in the first place, they should be made the objects of prayer, should they not? For in some cases it would seem as though only the Almighty Himself could overcome their indifference or active opposition to a social program in the Church. Then by conference and discussion, by the suggestion of helpful books to be read, by bringing before them concrete instances of real service rendered by some parish with stimulating effect upon its own life—by these and other means, they must finally be won to what we believe to be the truth.

And then, when the parson has been converted, there still remains the problem of the parish which we must now consider.

How can the parish be set on fire with the desire to influence for good the community life which sweeps around it?

I would ask the ministers present: Can your preaching so transform a parish? The answer may safely be given in the negative. The preaching of the social mission of the Church has its place, of course—and a very important place it is—but in the great majority of cases it will take something more than preaching to convert a parish—even the unrivalled power to illuminate and inspire of Christian service itself. "If any man will do His will he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." Contrive to put some members of the flock, as many as possible, face to face with a vital, throbbing human need and leave them with it for a time. Something is bound to happen. The process of conversion to social-mindedness will commence. You can preach to such persons with a new effectiveness. The right motive for social action will begin to get in its transforming work.

Now, as we begin to discuss in detail the organization of a parish for social action, it should be remembered that the suggestions as to plan and method which we shall offer will pre-suppose that the surest and most fruitful way of approach to a congregation is along the line of the human appeal just referred to. Coming to the social problem by way of concrete human needs is most apt to win, first, the interest of the average parishioner and the much to be desired response in social action.

Sounding the Call to Action.

In spite of what has been said about the insufficiency of preaching alone, in the matter of bringing a parish to feel its social responsibility, there is nevertheless no better way in which to begin a definite campaign to get social service into a parish than to have the call to action first sounded from the pulpit. Let the rector raise the social service issue—setting forth the essentially social character of the Christian religion, and the consequent call to the Church, as the organized expression of such a religion, to seek to bring all of the myriad relationships, as between man and man, under the influence of the Christian truth. Let him further show how within the last few years the Church has, in a wonderful way, been awakening to her responsibility in this matter. Three or four Sunday morning sermons, we make bold to say, can very properly and very profitably be devoted thus to the preaching of the social gospel.

Making Some One Responsible.

The above series of sermons will very likely bring a greater degree of conviction with them, if the congregation (and this means especially the older and more "settled" members of the same) can be made aware of the fact that the aforesaid sermons were not simply the offspring of a highly modernized and possibly radically inclined clerical brain, but were preached at the particular request of the parochial group, specially charged with caring for the social service interests of the parish; and this brings up the necessity of forming, as the first step in the carrying out of a parish program, a Social Service Committee, or the more ambitious Department of Social Service. Let the rector get together those in the parish most interested in social questions, and put upon them the responsibility of working out a parish program and of putting it into effect. And fortunate is the parish, if it has within its membership one or more socially minded people with purses large enough to admit of their employing on whole or part time (since the parish budget will hardly include this item at first), a trained social worker to act as the executive head of the Social Service Committee or Department. And let it be said at the outset that a primary requisite for such a social worker will be the possession of decidedly more than an ordinary amount of personal religion, a deep love for the Church, and the conviction that the Church has a real and distinctive part to play in the solution of the social problem. None others need apply! In case it is not possible to have a paid worker, much help in the way of suggestion and direction can be gotten from the local charity organization society or welfare agency. The workers in such an organization welcome signs of awakening interest in the churches and are usually only too glad to help on the good work.

In some cases where the parish is not able, single handed, to provide for the full time service of a trained social worker, it will undoubtedly be possible to have two or more parishes divide the expense of such a worker. Social work lends itself to such a co-operative plan, more readily than does ordinary parish work.

The Spiritual Character of the Work.

Your committee would, at this point, bring out the need of emphasizing, as strongly as possible, the spiritual side of the Church's social work. The task of the Church is always and everywhere a religious task. This does not mean, of course, that her work is never done in any but formally religious terms, but it does mean that something akin to the Master's passion to touch the human will for good, and to give to the individual needing it, the More Abundant Life, should be the animating force in it all.

Activities which do not have a distinctly moral or religious significance, belong to the Church, only in times of emergency. Generally speaking, they should be left to the various welfare agencies, which are to be found today in almost every community of reasonable size.

As an aid to keeping before the parish the spiritual character of the social work, it is suggested that the week day celebrations of the Holy Communion, as on Saints' Days, be considered as corporate communions for those engaged in the social work of the parish.

Who Is Who in the Parish.

The next step in the parish program is to find out who is likely to be interested in the new work. In case a general service canvass of the parish has not been made, a social service census can easily be taken—for instance, through the use of return postal cards. Those willing to help in social work should be asked to sign and return the card, indicating also whether they are already engaged in any social service activities, either within or without the parish. Such parish roll calls often reveal unexpected sources of interest and aid.

The Way to the Heart of the Problem.

* * *From the list of those signifying their willingness to help in the social work of the parish, a Friendly Visitors' Committee should be formed to consider the wisest methods of administering the necessary parish relief, and of helping families which may come from without the parish. Upon investigation, and it should be made by the social worker, if there be one, the families will be found to have fallen upon evil times from a variety of causes—sickness, intemperance, desertion by father or mother, mental defectiveness, unemployment and the like—and at the meetings of the committee the cases of these families are brought up and studied from every point of view. After the most careful diagnosis possible, a constructive plan is decided upon, to be carried out by the members of the committee, acting in the capacity of Friendly Visitors. Such work is oftentimes of the most intimate and delicate sort, and the visitors ought, therefore, to be instructed in the principles and practice of family rehabilitation, and should the parish have no social worker to give this very necessary instruction, the local relief giving agency will, without doubt, be glad to help in such training.

Co-operation the Keynote.

Too often, when the Church does such work, it wants to flock by itself. One of the criticisms most often leveled at Church workers is: "It is so hard to get them to co-operate." For instance, when they are asked for aid by new and strange families, they probably do not think of using the Confidential Exchange, if there be one, to see if the families are already being cared for by some other organization or have been helped in the past.

As a general principle, the greatest care should be exercised to prevent the Church from undertaking work already being well done by other agencies in the community. Unnecessary duplication of effort means waste of effort, and waste is immoral, even when encouraged by the Church.

A Many-Sided Problem! Study It!

So fundamental is this work of searching the very heights and depths of family life, and so, of the lives of the individuals composing the family, that it leads out naturally into a consideration of practically all of the great social problems in any given community. What may seem at the outset a rather restricted form of social work is soon seen to be really encyclopedic in its comprehensiveness and significance. And the members of the Friendly Visitors' Committee and with them, it is to be hoped, a larger group within the parish, will almost inevitably be drawn into a serious study of the questions involved. For example, one of the families cared for brings to the front the problem of feeble-mindedness, another that of child welfare, another that of the social evil, and so on, and through the interest aroused in these concrete cases, the general problems with their possible solutions will be studied and discussed. It can readily be seen how valuable such study will prove to be in making a parish intelligent upon social questions, and it is well to remember that such parish Study Classes had best be graded accordng to the different interests and abilities of the members.

As supplementing the usual methods of educating the parish to an understanding of social service, the play or pageant, setting forth some social service principle or program, is rapidly gaining in favor.

Then "Know your city" expeditions, being personally conducted tours to the various city departments dealing with social problems, and to the different philanthropic institutions of the community, can be used with marked success. It is startling—how little the average citizen knows about the institutions which belong to him.

Let Action Follow Study.

Two Christmases ago a small boy, touched by the holiday spirit, said to his father, "Daddy, I love you, and I want to do something about it." Quite a proper reaction, don't you think? And in the same way they who, by studying such as we have been considering, have been admitted into a deeper understanding of the vast sea of social need which surrounds them, and who, as Christians, love their fellows, must want to do something about it—something more than they have done, or the Church of the living God has done, to help their brothers in their extremity. That is to say, the work of the Study Class should, as far as possible, be directed toward the meeting of some community need. To take an example or two from life: here is a church, some of whose members in the work of the Social Service Department made a study of intemperance and the methods of treating it; and so impressed were they by the inadequate way in which their city was handling the problem, that they secured legislation in the City Council looking toward the establishment of a Farm Colony for Inebriates. In another church the problem of feeble-mindedness was raised by conditions in one or more of the families cared for by their Social Service Committee, and a group of parishioners is now working to secure the establishment of a psycopathic clinic for the city—something which is sorely needed. So, we repeat: Let action follow study. This is sound pedagogy and sound Christianity.

A Community Survey.

As a part of the parish program on its educational side, a Community Survey should be made at the earliest possible moment. Community conditions should be studied in relation to the different sides of the social problem, i. e., health, recreation, housing, industrial conditions, public institutions, etc., and the place the Church ought to play in meeting community needs should be determined upon. A most necessary and beautiful ministry to the inmates of city, county and State institutions can and should be fostered by the parishes.

The Church and Public Opinion.

If there were time, we could very properly dwell at this point on the part which the Church should play in the formation of an enlightened and socialized public opinion. If only the rank and file of the churches were reasonably informed upon social questions, and felt deeply the duty of the Church to register her influence on the side of social progress, what an immense effect corporate action on the part of the different congregations would have in bringing to pass needed social changes. This is one phase of social service which we very much need to get into the parishes of the land.

The Church an Aid to Secular Organizations.

The parish organized for social action can often help local welfare agencies, whose workers have more than they can carry, by furnishing volunteer workers. Take the case of the average society which administers relief. There is no more delicate and serious work in the world than the re-upbuilding of a human family. Only a certain amount of it should be attempted at any one time by any single individual. If too much is undertaken, it must be done in a hurried, wholesale way which violates the very nature of such intimate, careful work, and which in fact may leave the family worse off than it was originally.

From present indications, unemployment and the resulting distress are going to create an appalling situation in the months that are ahead. A terrible winter, it is to be feared, is in store for God's poor. The relief giving agencies will probably be swamped with work. What are the churches going to do about it? This brings us to:

The Church's Distinctive Mission.

There is one part of the field of social service into which it would seem that the Church could enter without subjecting herself to criticism, even by the most ardent disciple of the old individualistic faith. Let an actual happening show what is meant. A representative of a C. O. S. challenged the Social Service Committee of a certain parish in the following words: "We have a problem in regard to which we would like your help. One of our families is in continual trouble because of the actions of the father. He needs associations and influences which will keep him straight morally. His greatest trouble is gambling. We've done all we can for him. We don't want you to put in any money here. We will attend to that. What we do want you, as a Church, to do is to give the moral help which we are not equipped to offer."

Wasn't that Church given a challenge? And isn't it true that in a very great many cases the need for the physical rehabilitation of a family goes back, in the last analysis, to a need for spiritual rehabilitation? Indeed it is true, and here lies a great and peculiarly legitimate field for social service work on the part of the Christian Church.

To sit down alongside of an individual or a family, as the average social worker has not the time to do, and patiently endeavor to give a higher, nobler direction to thought and feeling, to steady the irresolute will, and to replace despair with cheerful courage—could the members of the Christian Church be engaged in a more Christ-like work than this? And, we repeat, how vast is the need for it in the field of social service. Moreover, how grateful many workers already in the field would be if the Church would give herself seriously to the special training of volunteers for this particularly difficult task.

The Church, a specialist in the field of spiritual instead of physical rehabilitation—this constitutes the distinctive contribution which the Church can make to the Social Service cause.

The Church and Industry.

The problem of industry is a part, and a very important part, of the larger social problem. What shall be the attitude of the Christian Church toward the great world movement, which is seeking to make more just and righteous, the relations which obtain between the employer and the employe today? This is a much mooted question. But we venture to say that it cannot be denied that industrial questions, dealing as they do with the welfare of human beings, are, at bottom, social and moral questions, and that they are, therefore, the rightful concern of religion and the Church. This being so, it follows that the promotion of industrial well-being and peace must find a place in the social program of every living and awakened parish. The members of the parish must study industrial problems from the moral point of view. Real good would undoubtedly come from the holding, under parish auspices, of conferences between employers and employees. But such conferences would have to be carefully arranged for, and wisely and skilfully handled. Then the industrial forum plan has been tried with success as part of a parish program.

The Church cannot take sides with either the employer or employe as such; she must study both sides, and fearlessly use her great influence to help bring in justice and righteousness wherever they are lacking, and to safeguard them when threatened. Nowhere has the Church a graver social responsibility than in relation to the industrial problem of today. May she be given strength to meet it worthily.

Social Service in the Rural Parish.

One parson with an extensive experience in the country to back up his opinion, says: "I feel that social service in the rural communities can solve the problem of the rural Church." Especially in country towns should the truth of the following maxims be recoognized and lived up to: "The Church owes a debt to the community. The Church is in the community to serve. A clergyman should be a community man." And while the social service program, as already outlined, was planned with special reference to the city parish, its underlying principles are equally applicable to parishes in the country. For instance, nowhere is there greater need for friendly visiting than among families in isolated country dstricts. Let a socially minded clergyman take a rural parish and see what happens. Here are a few things which actually did come to pass: In one community the rector became the master of the Grange. He brought in lecturers, a library, and tackled many of the local social problems. Instead of keeping his religion apart from the Grange, he built up his church through his connection with that fine organization, and the church in turn splendidly served the community. In another country town, high-class movies, shown in the parish house, brought the community to desire better pictures, and compelled the theatres to select their films with greater care. Here was a fine service rendered the community by the church. In still another rural parish, through boys' work carried on by the rector, the whole moral tone of the little community was elevated, and the town came to have a new idea of and respect for the Church as a social force.

Thus in country, as well as city, there is need to get social service into the parish. And what a mighty work will the Church do for the kingdom of God when her countless parishes are thoroughly alive to their social mission.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN THE PARISH.

Mr. Editor: In 1916 the State Board of Education of Virginia, following the lead of a number of other States, issued a syllabus of Bible Study for the use of high school students. It was offered as a high school elective with one unit of credit towards graduation.

The syllabus contains three courses of ninety lessons each. Course I is Old Testament History; Course II, Old Testament Literature, and Course III, New Testament History and Literature. Each of these courses is valued at one-half a unit credit, though not more than one whole unit is allowed for Bible study.

The plan offers a wonderful opportunity for thorough and systematic Bible instruction. The syllabus was prepared by a committee of which the Rev. Professor W. M. Forrest, of the University of Virginia, was chairman. It follows similar outlines published several years earlier by North Dakota and Colorado, pioneer leaders in work of Bible study for high school credit.

The possibilities of the plan as a means of religious education seem to have been overlooked by most of our clergy and our Diocesan Boards of Religious Education.

Three years ago I organized a class of about twelve in the Old Testament History in the high school here. Last year the class numbered twenty-two, and this year, in the course in New Testament History and Literature, the class had thirty-three members, which was about one-third of the total enrollment of the high school. The work was not opened to the first-year students. Eliminating these, we had enrolled about one-half of the high school body. Seventeen out of the thirty-three were boys.

The interest was sustained throughout the year, and some splendid, earnest work was done by the students.

The State Board of Education finishes the final examination questions, and this year they were graded by Professor Forrest, of the University. Fifteen of our class here took the examination. Thirteen of them passed, many of their grades ranging from eighty-five to ninety-five.

Some of the results which inevitably follow such work are, a much deeper interest on the part of the students in sermons, because they understand them better; a decided toning up of the work done in the Sunday schools; and its value to our public school system, in a literary way, is seen in the better understanding of literature and history which it gives to the students.

But above this we believe that God's Word thus implanted in the minds of the young will affect the ideals and standards of their lives and will mightily influence their future.

It takes time for a clergyman to do this teaching work. Many will feel that they cannot do it. But it is hard to conceive of a work more far-reaching or one through which he can be drawn into a closer relationship with the young people of his community.

One of the greatest needs before the Church today is Christian education. The Church's Commission reads: "Go, teach." She must begin with the young if the fundamental principles of Christianity are to be known and held with sufficient conviction to influence the life.

Just after the World War the Archbishop of Canterbury appointed a committee of distinguished men of the English Church to study conditions and to report on the state of the Church. That committee reported that in their opinion the cause of the alienation from the Church of so large a part of the population of Christian lands today is due primarily to the fact that the Church has failed to exercise her teaching function.

The clergy as the Church's trained and commissioned teachers must lead, and lead actively, in this great work.

Large opportunities are awaiting us. In small towns these opportunities frequently bring us into touch with the whole community.

For the past nine months we have conducted here a community Sunday School Teacher Training class, with representatives in it of the Methodist, Baptist, Disciples and Lutheran churches, besides our own.

It has afforded an inspiring opportunity to help forward the cause of Christian education in all the churches of the community. Special courses on the Church, Prayer Book, etc., for our own teachers supplement this general course.

Amherst, Va., June 23, 1921. Thomas D. Lewis.

MARRIAGE OF DIVORCED PERSONS.

Mr. Editor: It seems to me that the laws of our own Church might well be called to the attention of some of our brethren by this article from the front page of a late morning paper:

"When the Duke of Marlborough marries Miss Gladys Deacon next Saturday, the ceremony will be performed by an American pastor especially imported for the occasion. Under the rules of the Church of England, the guilty party in a divorce cannot remarry.

"On account of this, the Duke failed to find a Bishop or minister of his Church who would perform the ceremony. The identity of the American clergyman who will wed the Duke to the American sportswoman and bridesmaids for the former Duchess is being kept secret."

Well might we clergymen follow more carefully the example of our brothers of the mother Church. God help the nation and the Church which forgets His eternal and fundamental laws.

Elmer C. Pedrick.

Richmond, Va., June 20, 1921.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

SUMMER SUGGESTIONS.

"How charming is divine philosophy
—not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose.
But musical as Apollo's lute."

Thus sung Milton some three centuries ago, and it is a pity that our clergy don't peruse these lines more frequently and earnestly, and see to it that their discourses and their conduct are "charming" by their freedom from both harshness and crabbedness.

This should be the case at all times, but especially so upon the occasion of the annual Sunday school outing, when every one should have their good-time clothes on.

It is always more or less true that you get out of life what you put into it, but altogether the case with trips for the pleasure of young people.

If you make up your mind to go for the purpose of enjoyment, to have a bright, happy time yourself, and to see to it that others do, then you will be sure to find it, but if you go from a sense of duty, and feeling at the start that you wished you didn't have to go, and that you are "getting too old for that sort of thing," then you will find yourself in for one of the longest days you ever spent.

These occasions are an important part of Sunday school activities, and it is the duty of parents and officers to co-operate.

We suggest the following recipes in this connection.

For a Good Time.

Five Episcopal Sunday schools.
Six Episcopal ministers.
Ten empty passenger coaches.
Seven hundred and fifty bathing suits.
One ton of Christian love and good will.
Mix well and flavor with sunburn to taste.

Reserved Seats
(On a picnic train).

One small boy with large feet and long arms, one lunch basket. Spread thin over four seats turned face to face.

(The usual method for a family of four is for each one to get into a different coach on the excursion train and each hold four seats in each coach, hence the foregoing recipe.)

CORRECTING AN EVIL.

We have bureaus for the study and development of all sorts of domestic animals. We have numerous governmental agencies for the investigation of plant diseases. Now at last a bill is in Congress looking to better instruction of human mothers and making provision to do something to protect infants and to help to relieve suffering by preventing it.

It is an admitted fact that more women die at child birth in the United States than in most of the other civilized countries of the world, and it is to prevent this lamentable situation that the Sheppard-Towner maternity bill has been drawn.

The Survey gives the following account of its provisions:

"The bill is very simple. In its latest form—that reported by the Senate Committee on Education on May 20—it authorizes the annual appropriation of $1,480,000 'to be paid to the several States for the purpose of co-operating with them in promoting the care of maternity and infancy.' Of this sum, $10,000 is to be paid annually to each State, and the remaining $1,000,000 is to be 'apportioned among the States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States,' provided that no State shall receive its share of this additional appropriation until its Legislature shall have appropriated an equal sum 'for the maintenance of the services and facilities provided for in this act.' (This is the so-called '50-50' plan, which is already in effect under the act for vocational education, the act for agricultural extension, the act for the rehabilitation of industrial cripples, the Good Roads Act, and the act creating the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board.)

The Children's Bureau 'shall be charged with the carrying out of the provisions of this act.' An advisory committee consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, and the Commissioner of Education is to advise with the chief of the Children's Bureau concerning problems arising from this work. The Children's Bureau 'shall have charge of all matters concerning the administration of this act and shall have power to co-operate with the State agencies authorized to carry out the provisions of this act. It shall be the duty of the Children's Bureau to make, or cause to be made, such studies, investigations and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this act.' The amount the Children's Bureau may spend for administration is limited to 3 per cent. of the additional appropriation authorized, or $30,000.

The State agency shall submit its plans to the Children's Bureau, and 'if these plans shall be in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes, due notice of approval shall be sent to the State agency by the chief of the Children's Bureau.' These plans shall include 'provision for instruction in the hygiene of maternity and infancy through public health nurses, consultation centers and other suitable methods.' Sums not exceeding 25 per cent. of a State's share may be spent by it to provide instruction in the hygiene of infancy and maternity through extension courses by qualified lecturers—this by arrangement with any educational institution.

The 'facilities provided by any State agencies co-operating under the provisions of this act shall be available for all residents of the State.' A special provision inserted by the Senate Committee on Education states that the act does not give authority to any agent to enter 'any home over the objection of the parents or either of them, or the person standing in loco parentis.'

This is what the bill is, as it has been reported to the Senate. The House bill, now before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, differs only in a few words and phrases, not at all in its main provisions."

THE WORD OF GOD AT THE CIRCUS.

The big circus has been showing at Madison Square Garden for several weeks to tremendous crowds of people, and they have had the Bible in their midst. Day after day a colporteur of the American Bible Society, Robert Rein, sky pilot of the show people, has taken the Book to these troopers of the tent, who are often seen by him sitting on the ground perusing the Scriptures.

Robert Rein has been with the show people in almost every kind of a situation. He has preached the gospel to them in season and out of season. He has distributed portions of the Bible in almost every language, as these great circuses carry people of many nationalities. He has officiated for them at the marriage ceremony and the funeral. Only recently, when one of the showmen died, they turned to Mr. Rein to conduct the service. Accordingly, through the chill and rain, he made his way over to New York, and down in a little East Side funeral parlor, before a group of friends of the departed, he preached a modest but most beautiful sermon, which touched the hearts of the listeners, who had tears in thei reyes, as he spoke on the subject, "What Is Your Life?" And as he read a few fitting passages from the Bible and in the name of the American Bible Society p'aced the little Book upon the breast of the departed friend, the quiet audience felt that it was good for the showmen to have such a friend.

So this man, working not in the ordinary way, but in his own way, is spreading the Word and teaching "all nations." If one could have a panoramic glimpse today of the hundreds of kinds of people and tongues and customs and methods, which are being used by the Lord at this moment all over the world, through the agency of the American Bible Society, for getting the Book to the people, he would be impelled to say that truly "God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform."

On April 21 of this year Mr. Rein met an appointment with Mr. John Ringling, principal owner of Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey shows, and after a few minutes of earnest appeal, setting forth the world-wide Bible work and the great cause of the American Bible Society, he induced Mr. Ringling to contribute to this work. He handed him his personal check for a hundred dollars.

Church Intelligence

Consecration of Suffragan-Bishop of Liberia.

"The consecration to the bishopric of a man who is the first aboriginal fruit of the Liberian vineyard is a significant event in this centennial year of our missionary society," declared the Rev. Walter H. Overs, Episcopal Bishop of Liberia, in his sermon at the consecration of the Rt. Rev. T. Momolu Gardiner, a full-blooded member of the Vey tribe of East Africa, who became Suffragan-Bishop of Liberia.

The consecration service was held Thursday morning, June 23, in the Church of the Incarnation, New York, the venerable Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church, the Rt. Rev. Daniel Sylvester Tuttle, Bishop of Missouri, being the consecrator. Other bishops who took part in the "laying on of hands" were the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, Bishop of Tennessee and President of the National Council; the Rt. Rev. William T. Manning, Bishop of New York; the Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, Bishop of New Jersey; the Rt. Rev. Walter H. Overs, Bishop of Liberia, and the Rt. Rev. Arthur S. Lloyd, Bishop-Suffragan of New York. This is the eighty-fifth consecration in which Bishop Tuttle has taken part, and it is Bishop Manning's first. Nearly fifty priests of the Episcopal Church in their vestments were in the procession.

"Such an event as this," said Bishop Overs," can no more be separated from the great missionary purpose of the Church than can the harvest be separated from the seed time. The fruit of our hundred years of missionary endeavor to which we can point today fills us with encouragement and is an occasion for inspiration.

Dr. Gardiner's particular work in Liberia will be among his own tribesmen, the Veys. In referring to the new Bishop's field, Bishop Overs said in his charge:

"You are a member of the Vey tribe, one of the most promising tribes in Liberia. But it is the only tribe in the republic that is influenced by Mohammedanism. Your name is Momolu, which means in English, Mohammed. Your father, a Mohammedan priest, gave you that name, but he also sent you to a Christian School, St. John's, Cape Mount, to learn letters. You learned to be a Christian. Gradually you have come to the position you now hold. What a responsibility is yours. You must claim your tribe for Christ.

"Just before I came from Monrovia, last month, one of your chiefs, a Mohammedan, came to me and said, 'The mosque in my town is falling down; if you will send me a teacher, I will build a Christian church in the very place where the mosque stood!' It is prophetic; it will come. You particularly represent these people. Your task is tremendous, but the opportunity is magnificent."

Dr. Gardiner holds his first service after his consecration Sunday, June 26, at St. David's Church, New York, celebrating the Holy Communion and preaching the sermon.

This trip to New York has been the first time he has ever been away from East Africa, and street cars, the subways, the railroads, were things of which he had read and dreamed, but never seen. He has taken in New York with all the eagerness of a youngster for a new toy—yet he holds the city in awe and will not trust himself without a guide. Fifty years ago he was a product of the jungle, uncultured and uncouth; today he is a Bishop, speaks English perfectly, and is as well versed in both Latin and Greek.

Conference of City Mission Officers at National Conference.

The National Conference of City Mission Executives and Allied Agents was to have been held this year at Richmond, Va. An effort of Dean Lathrop to combine this conference with that of the Social Service Workers failed, so that no City Mission Conference this year was held. However, it was found at the Church Conference of Social Service Work that at least nine city mission organizations were represented by their executive officers so that an informal meeting was held during the sessions of this Church conference.

Archdeacon Romilly Humphries, of Baltimore, vice-president of the City Mission Conference, acted as chairman of the informal meeting. It was decided by this informal gathering that the City Mission Conference should meet next year in conjunction with the Church Conference on Social Work. It was also resolved to ask Dean Lathrop, Executive Secretary of the Department of Christian Social Service, to make plans for including city mission work on his program, and also to use his office and organization for the extension of city mission organizations wherever possible throughout the country, calling upon any of the present city mission executives to assist him in this extension work.

City mission work was ably presented at the conference by the Rev. L. E. Sunderland, Superintendent of the City Mission Society of New York City. Various phases of hospital chaplaincy work, work in the correctional institutions, homes for the aged and sanitoria, were presented, showing the exceptional opportunity for religious and social service ministration to the dependent, defective and the delinquent.

Apart from the fundamental questions involved in a discussion of industrial relations, there is no field that offers so large an opportunity for real Christian service as the field of city mission work. At the present time there are no less than twenty-three city mission organizations in the Church where men on whole time are doing this work. Many are the stories of partially ruined and wrecked lives that have been turned to see and know the power of Christ to help and save, and many a restored life today looks back with grateful heart to the time when some city mission chaplain gave him or her a new vision and a new hope.

Hobart College Commencement Exercises.

The most successful commencement Hobart College ever had took place June 11 to 13, when, with the largest and most enthusiastic alumni attendance in many years, nearly $100,000 was pledged with little effort and by a comparatively small group of alumni to Hobart's Million-Dollar Centennial Fund. The fund now totals nearly $400,000 without general solicitation.

This was the ninety-sixth annual commencement and the ninety-ninth anniversary of the founding of Hobart College.

The noteworthy feature of the commencement was the commencement exercises themselves, at which, in the presence of four Bishops, including the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Western New York and Chancellor of Hobart College, the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon Major General Charles P. Summerall, commander of the First Division, U. S. A., who has just been given command of Hawaii. General Summerall has been a life-long Churchman. General Summerall delivered the commencement address on the subject of "Legacies of the War" before a large audience on the Hobart campus.

The honorary degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology was conferred upon the Rt. Rev. George William Davenport (Hobart, 1893), Bishop of Easton, and the Rt. Rev. Herbert Henry Heywood Fox (Hobart, 1897), Suffragan Bishop of Montana, two of the nine living Bishops Hobart has given to the Church. The Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris (Hobart, 1888), Suffragan Bishop of Western New York, was seated upon the platform. The honorary degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology was also given the Rev. Pierre Cushing (Hobart, 1881), of LeRoy, N. Y.

The degree of Doctor of Laws was also awarded to Dr. Brandreth Symonds (Hobart, 1881), chief medical director of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, and to Professor J. Nelson Frierson (Hobart, 1896), dean of the Law Department of the University of South Carolina, who delivered the commencement address at the tenth annual commencement of William Smith College. Hobart's co-ordinate institution for women.

On Saturday, June 11, was held the first meeting of the Advisory Council of the Hobart Centennial Campaign, composed of one hundred notable alumni and friends of the college, with Bishop Ferris presiding. Important decisions were taken regarding the prosecution of the campaign for a million dollars, and a feature of the meeting was the reading of endorsements of the Centennial Campaign by thirty-five Bishops of the Church.

Subscriptions to the fund were made at the alumni smoker on Saturday night, the most enthusiastic gathering of its kind ever held at Hobart.

At the commencement dinner on Monday noon the Rev. Alexander Mann, D. D., '81, of Boston, acted as toastmaster, and among the speakers were the Rt. Rev. H. H. H. Fox, '97, Suffragan Bishop of Montana; the Rev. Edwin K. Buttolph, '81, of Mt. Clemens, Mich.; the Rev. Simon Blinn Blunt, '91, of Dorchester, Mass.; the Rev. A. G. Richards, '96, of Athens, Ga.; the Rev. W. C. Compton, '04, of Rochester, N. Y., and the Rev. Norman O. Hutton, '03, of Chicago, Ill.

The two most striking speeches were delivered by Bishop Brent and Major General Summerall, who spoke of the idealism of the A. E. F. Bishop Brent said: "I wish simply to add that so far as our campaign is concerned, I myself am confident that it is going to succeed, because Hobart College for a hundred years has had the confidence of Churchmen and of the Church, and it is going to have a similar confidence for the next hundred years."

Commencement, St. Faith's School.

Commencement Day at St. Faith's, in Saratoga, the Provincial School for Girls of the Province of New York and New Jersey, was both a record of accomplishment and a promise of greater usefulness in the future. A class of eleven, the largest in the school's history, was graduated and announcements were made of the purchase of a valuable piece of property, and of the payment of the mortgage on Shackelford Hall. The cornerstone of this building, which is named for the founder of the school, was laid three years ago. Its erection and the final paying off of the mortgage was shared in by many former pupils, friends and citizens of Saratoga.

Earlier in the week an outdoor production of "As You Like It," the commencement musical and other events added to the well-deserved reputation of St. Faith's girls for thorough and artistic work. The two principal prizes, the Faithful Cross and the Alumnae Prize for Perseverance, were both won by daughters of clergymen, the former by Miss Charlotte Parkman, of Baltimore; the latter by Miss Louise Stowell, of East Maunch Chunk, Pa.

St. Faith's begins its thirty-second year with its property free of indebtedness and with its trustees beginning a vigorous campaign to raise $75,000 by a bond issue for the purpose of enlarging the school.

KENTUCKY

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

Nineteenth Anniversary of the Rev. G. C. Abbitt Observed.

The first Sunday in June was celebrated in Grace Church, Hopkinsville, as the nineteenth anniversary of its rector, the Rev. George Chapman Abbitt. At late communion a special offering was given to be added to funds already invested, for memorials to two of its benefactors. Mrs. E. C. Glass, during her lifetime, erected the parish house, without which it is hard to conceive of the activities of Grace Church. Mr. John C. Latham left a legacy of fifty thousand dollars as endowment.

Mr. Abbitt's leadership in the Christian work in Hopkinsville is a recognized fact. His ability to fulfill the financial obligations of his own parish is well known. The churches with which he is connected, the Mission of St. Mary, which he built at Madisonville; the colored mission, the Church of the Good Shepherd, and Grace Church, at Hopkinsville, were the first to turn in their pledges in the Nation-Wide Campaign, and they stand first in the Diocesan Drive. Grace Church's percentage rivals the famous St. James' Parish, New York, but never received the publicity. Within the last five years Mr. Abbitt has successfully carried his church over the top in the drives for the Bishop Dudley Memorial Endowment, Pension Fund and the two drives for the University of the South, at Sewanee. In his calm way he has accomplished these things so quietly that for a long time they passed unheralded. Now Grace Church is referred to in diocesan affairs as the 100 per cent. parish.

Mr. Abbitt is beloved by the community in which he occupies a position as unique as that in his own parish. Whenever a minister of another denomination is needed Mr. Abbitt is called. His ministrations are always sought where grief and distress are found.

F. B. F.

MARYLAND

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Memorial Window Presented to St. Paul's.

On Sunday, June 12, a handsome memorial window was presented to St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, in loving memory of the late William Smith Gittings Williams, who died on August 7, 1918. It is the gift of Mrs. Thomas Marean Chatard, of Washington, a sister. Mr. Williams was the son of the late George Hawkins Williams. He was sent as a boy to the famous Charterhouse in London, and afterwards studied at Oxford. The rector, Dr. Kinsolving, spoke of him as a man of patrician distinction, of beautiful courtesy, lovable, gentle, loyal to friends, of whom he had many, with a rare patience, humility and a real spirit of devotion. The window is by Clayton & Bell, of London, and the subject is the "Angel's Message to Cornelius." It is one of the best pieces of glass in a church rich already in such treasures largely through the gifts of this same family.

WESTERN MICHIGAN

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

Diocesan Convention, Battle Creek.

The forty-sixth annual convention of the Diocese of Western Michigan was made specially refreshing and valuable by the presence of the Very Rev. Warren L. Rogers, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, and the Rev. B. F. Kemerer, Field Secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign. A banquet at which the Bishop, clergy, lay delegates and other laymen assembled after roll call and the appointment of the Committee on Credentials was given by the people of St. Thomas' Church at Post Tavern on Tuesday evening, June 7, and was a very elegant and enjoyable affair. The rector of the parish, the Rev. William C. Studwell, introduced Bishop McCormick as toastmaster and served most efficiently as leader on the enlivening songs.

The Rev. Mr. Kemerer gave an illuminating address on the subject of organization, and Dean Rogers, the chief speaker of the occasion, spoke inspiringly of the larger vision.

Under the reorganization of the Diocese the routine took on a new form, and the first report of the Bishop and Executive Council was listened to with interest. This disclosed some of the advantages of the new arrangement. Unused and practically abandoned property of extinct missions has been, or is about to be, sold and the income turned to good account in the building up of work in promising fields. All but two of the missionary parishes are now supplied with clergymen; the decision has been formed to relinquish help from the General Board of Missions, and a plan has been devised by which the income of the Nation-Wide Campaign in the Diocese is to be divided half and half with the general Church without discredit for selfishness or disloyalty.

Reports of the different Departments of Publicity, Missions, Finance and Education commanded absorbed attention and stimulated odtimism.

The Bishop, in his address, dwelt on the condition and prospects of the Diocese; gave some account of his work during the year; spoke appreciatively of the help received from such organizations as the Bishop's League and of the gratifying observance of his fifteenth anniversary; approved of patriotic co-operation in building the Washington Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul as a Church of the American people; advocated the amendment to the diocesan constitution so as to place women on an equal footing with men in all Church affairs; encouraged the Nation-Wide Campaign and explained the diocesan relation to the quota; dealt earnestly with the problem of increasing the ministry in this time of difficulty; proposed a Diocesan League of Lay Readers; gave a charming account of the relation to the Lambeth Conference, urging all Church people to procure and study the published report of the proceedings and stressing particularly the reunion of Christendom.

The following resolution, offered by the Rev. F. O. Granniss, of St. Joseph, was unanimously adopted without discussion:

Resolved, that we, the Bishop, clergy and lay delegates of the Diocese of Western Michigan of the Episcopal Church, in convention assembled, praying for the peace of the world and desiring that the United States of America may play a worthy and leading part in securing this blessing for mankind, respectfully urge upon the President of the United States and upon our Senators and members in Congress, that they do all in their power, as our representatives, to hasten the assembling of a conference of nations on the subject of disarmament, and to bring about an international agreement that will abolish rivalry in the matter of armaments, relieve the peoples from the burden of wasteful taxation, and remove or greatly diminish the peril of war.

The Rev. B. F. Kemerer, present at the convention by invitation of the Bishop, and heartily welcomed by all, created renewed interest and enthusiasm for the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The amendment to the Constitution of the Diocese by dropping the word "male" and thereby giving all rights and duties to communicants regardless of sex, was unanimously approved and handed over to the next convention for ratification.

Mrs. D. H. Beardsley, of Battle Creek, Secretary of the Girls' Friendly Society, very ably presented the nature and purpose and value of this organization for the welfare of our young women.

The convention was most hospitably and charmingly entertained by the rector and people of St. Thomas', Battle Creek.

Officers were elected as follows: Secretary, the Rev. James T. Wilkinson, Ph. D.; Assistant Secretary, the Rev. Harold Holt.

Standing Committee — The Rev. Messrs. G. P. T. Sargent, W. A. Munday, W. C. Studwell, W. F. Tunks, Dr. Charles E. Hooker, Messrs. Charles R. Wilkes and H. C. Angell.

The Executive Council of the Diocese of last year were re-elected.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod—The Rev. Messrs. G. P. T. Sargent, B. F. P. Ivins, W. C. Studwell and J. H. Bishop. Alternates—The Rev. Messrs. J. E. Wilkinson, Ph. D., F. A. Patterson, H. Holt and M. L. Tate. Lay Delegates—Messrs. C. L. Dibble, William Hatton, Charles Centner and C. R. Wilkes. Alternates—Messrs. B. C. Leavenworth, C. F. Field, A. D. Swain and Sidney Mosier.

F O. G.

NEWARK

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

News Notes of Interest.

The Rev. Worcester perkins becomes rector of St. John's Church, Jersey City, July 1.

The Rev. A. T. Doughty has entered upon the care of St. Alban's, Newark, and of St. George's, Vailsburg.

The twentieth anniversary of the ordination of the Rev. R. D. Brown, rector of St. Philip's, Newark, was observed on June 19, and the Bishop of the Diocese preached the sermon. Nine years of Mr. Brown's service have marked a great advance in the strength of the church.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Blue Ridge Industrial School, Dyke, Va.

To All Whom It May Concern:

The Rev. George P. Mayo, after many years of devoted labor, has succeeded in building up an institution in Greene County, Va., known as the Blue Ridge Industrial School. This institution has done and is doing a splendid work for the uplift of the mountain people. More than a year ago the school suffered a serious loss in destruction by fire of its largest building, containing auditorium, class-rooms, etc. It is most important, for the future of the work, that this building be replaced as soon as possible. The General Church has recognized the worth of this school by including its needs in the budget of the Nation-Wide Campaign, and the Committee on Priority Claims has also recognized its great importance by placing its needs as one of the first objects that ought to be met from the funds of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

Girls' Dormitory and Main Building, Burned.

Unfortunately, thus far no help has been obtained from this source, and, acting under resolutions of the Presiding Bishop and Council, which are appended, I have advised Mr. Mayo to make a special appeal for the funds to rebuild and develop the school. A careful reading of the resolutions will show how such help may be extended, and yet have due credit on Diocesan quotas.

William Cabell Brown,
Bishop of Virginia.

The resolution of the Presiding Bishop and Council referred to is as follows:

"Resolved, that gifts for objects in the Nation-Wide Campaign Survey, for which no appropriation has been made, that are requested to be applied on the Diocesan quotas, be immediately appropriated for the designated object."

Mr. Mayo, in making the appeal authorized by the Bishop's letter, says:

"The approved askings for the Blue Ridge Industrial School from the General Church amounted to about $29,000, none of which has as yet been granted. Twenty thousand of the total was for the building referred to in the Bishop's letter. The only way the school can secure the whole or any part of the $29,000 is through individuals designating their contributions for that purpose. I sincerely trust that some will avail themselves of this privilege and thus enable this important branch of our mountain mission work to go forward."

Annual Meetings of the Trustees of the Church Schools.

The annual meeting of the trustees of the Church schools in the Diocese was held in St. Paul's Parish House, Richmond, on Tuesday evening, June 21.

Reports made by St. Christopher's and St. Catherine's Schools at Westhampton, and St. Anne's School at Charlottesville, the three schools at present in operation, showed that a most gratifying measure of success has been attained in these schools during the past year, which in each case is the first under Church ownership.

The Rev. C. G. Chamberlayne, Ph. D., was re-elected headmaster of St. Christopher's School; Miss Rosalie H. Noland as principal of St. Catherine's School, and Miss Emma S. Yerby as principal of St. Anne's School. Miss Bertha S. Latane, of Troy, Ala., has been elected principal of the school to be established at Tappahannock. The headmaster of the Christchurch School, in Middlesex County, will be selected shortly. At both the Christchurch School and at Tappahannock property has been purchased, and construction work is being rushed, with a view to opening these two schools next autumn, if possible to do so.

The trustees established the office of dean of the Church schools in the Diocese of Virginia, and elected to that position the Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D., rector of Whittle Parish, The Plains, Fauquier County, and dean of the Rappahannock Convocation. Dr. Woodward will undertake the duties of this office about July 1, and will reside in Richmond.

Dr. Woodward, a native of Richmond, is a graduate, B. A., M. A. and M. D. of the University of Virginia, and of the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria, from which he later received the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He was for a number of years a medical missionary in China, during which time he built St. James' Hospital at Anking. After his ordination to the ministry he became the dean of the Cathedral at Anking, and a member of the Standing Committee of that Missionary Jurisdiction. He was for a number of years the superintendent of a system of schools in the Anking District.

Dr. Woodward has been for the past seven years the rector of Whittle Parish, and has made that, in its community work, one of the outstanding country churches of the United States; his work having attracted the attention not only of the Episcopal Church, but also of leaders of rural welfare work throughout the country.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Anniversary of Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society Celebrated in Old St. Peter's.

A large congregation gathered at old St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, to attend the service which celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of the organization of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church. The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor preached the sermon, and the choir of St. Peter's, at the request of the President and Council, sang a Te Deum on the occasion as an expression of the Church's thanksgiving for a century of missionary effort and God's blessing on the work.

The service was held in St. Peter's Church, because it was in that edifice that the society was organized in 1821. The Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland also spoke.

The service was held as a preliminary to the general commemoration that will be conducted all through the country between now and November, and it was attended by many leading Churchmen of Philadelphia and vicinity, representing both the clergy and the laity.

Break Ground for New Building at Church Farm School.

Bishop Rhinelander officiated Sunday afternoon, July 19, at services in connection with breaking the ground for the new administration building of the Church Farm School of the Diocese, at Glen Lock, Pa.

The Bishop also dedicated three cottages already completed and occupied by pupils. The school has an enrollment of sixty boys.

The principal addresses were made by Edward W. Mumford, secretary of the University of Pennsylvania, and Clarence Sears Kates, secretary of the Rural Progress Association.

The Rev. Charles W. Shreiner, headmaster of the school, awarded watches to Phineas Jones and Gibson Carter. Five other prizes were given by the Board of Trustees to William Turish, of the second class; William Kyle, of the middle class, and to Stanley Carter, in the primary grade.

Commencement at Church Training and Deaconess' House.

Seven young women who will serve in widely separated parts of the world were graduated from the Church Training and Deaconess' House of the Diocese, at commencement exercises in the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary.

The five regular course graduates are Gladys Spencer, who will go to Japan; Susan B. Smith, who will serve in Alaska; Florence Huban, who will remain here as an assistant in the schools; Beulah Dobbin, who will go to the Diocese of North Carolina, and Letea Tafton, who will continue training at the Episcopal Hospital.

Special students graduated are Esther L. Houghton and Amelia H. Hill, who prepared for work in China.

Bishop Rhinelander presided, and the Rev. Dr. J. DeWolf Perry was the commencement speaker.

The Rev. H. L. Hanna, rector of All Saints' Church, Norristown, was elected president of the Clerical Brotherhood of the Diocese at its last meeting of the season at the Church House.

The other officers are: Secretary, the Rev. Charles R. Rantz, Claymont, Del.; Treasurer, the Rev. C. S. Lyons, Roxborough; Executive Committee, the Rev. William McClelland, the Rev. George S. Gassner, D. D., the Rev. Charles Long, the Rev. Joseph Manuel and the Rev. R. G. Osborn.

The annual parish day of old St. Peter's Church, Great Valley, near Valley Forge, was observed with special services Sunday, June 26. Invitations were extended to all former parishioners to attend. One of the features of the occasion was an address by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Prevost, on the life and services of General Patrick Anderson, one of Washington's officers during the Revolution.

Outdoor services at the Church Farm of the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany began Sunday afternoon, June 19, at 4 o'clock. These services are conducted in the orchard and are planned especially for children, young people and others who will pass the week-end at the farm.

The Rev. Dr. David M. Steele has offered the use of the Church Farm for annual Sunday school picnics to several other parishes.

The ninth anniversary of the Rev. H. Cresson McHenry as minister in charge of the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Philadelphia, was celebrated with special services Sunday, June 19. Mayor Moore and Councilman Von Tagen spoke at the evening service.

The Episcopal Academy property, at 1324 Locust Street, Philadelphia, has been sold, it is understood, for about $500,000, and the stone building will be torn down and a modern office building erected.

The school is moving into new quarters, the twelve-acre estate of the late John O. Gilmore, City Avenue, Overbrook. Dr. Granville Haslam is the headmaster.

A stone tablet in honor o the members who were in the service during the World War was recently dedicated at St. Peter's Church, Wayne Avenue and Harvey Street.

The tablet has been placed in a wall of the church, and contains the names of ninety-six members who were in the service. Six of them lost their lives during the war. The dedication was in charge of the rector, the Rev. Stewart P. Keeting. Henry H. Houston Post, No. 2, attended the service.

The Rev. H. St. Clair Hathaway, of Norristown, was the speaker at the Episcopal open air services Sunday afternoon, June 19, at Twenty-third Street and the Parkway. His subject was "Spiritual Healing." The services began at 4 o'clock. Rev. Mr. Hathaway recently conducted a series of healing services at the Church of St. John the Baptist, Germantown, Philadelphia.

Death of Prominent Churchwoman: Funeral services for Miss Mary J. Burk, who died June 17, were held on Monday in Holy Trinity Memorial Chapel, Philadelphia. Miss Burk, who was sixty-nine years old, had been superintendent of the Seventh Ward charity organization for thirty years. During most of that period she was also active in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Harrison Day Nursery and many other organizations of similar character. She was also active in the work of Trinity Chapel, of which she was a member most of her life.

The tenth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. B. N. Bird, of the Church of the Messiah, Gwynedd, Pa., was observed by special services Sunday, June 19th.

R. R. W.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Tuttle Visits Washington.

The Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, was in Washington on Sunday, June 26, and was the preacher at Grace Church, Silver Spring Parish, at the 11 o'clock service and at St. Stephen's Church in the evening.

New Chancel for Christ Church.

Plans for the building of a new chancel in Christ Church, Southeast, the Rev. William Curtis White, rector, have been completed, and it is expected that the work will be finished about the middle of September. Christ Church is one of the oldest churches in Washington, having been organized as a parish, consisting of the city of Washington, together with Georgetown, in 1795, but prior to that having held services as early as 1780 in what had been formerly a tobacco warehouse. According to the custom at the time Christ Church was built, the choir and organ were placed at the back of the church. The new plans, prepared by the architect, Delos H. Smith, provide a larger sanctuary and seating capacity for the choir, a longer communion rail and the removal of the organ to the northwest corner of the addition. The congregation has so arranged the financial side of this project that it may be carried through without incurring debt. Various organizations and individual members of the parish are providing choir stalls or clergy seats, and great interest in the undertaking is being manifested by the whole congregation.

The Church of Our Saviour, Brookland Parish and St. Barnabas' Chapel will be consolidated and a large church in a central location will be built in their stead, according to arrangements completed by the vestry and approved by the Bishop. A church, parish house and rectory will be erected. The Rev. Robert Alexander Tufft is the rector.

M. M. W.

The Daughters of the King in the Diocese have, during the past year, held what they termed "visitations," i. e., each month all the chapters would meet one evening in a certain church. On June 7, by special invitation, the visitation was held in Alexandria, with St. Hilda's Chapter. One hundred and seventy-six members from twenty-three chapters were present, and the opening services were held in Grace Church, the rector, the Rev. Edgar Carpenter, officiating. Mr. Carpenter made a beautiful and appropriate address, encouraging the Daughters in their work.

After a short business session of St. Hilda's Chapter, presided over by its president, Mrs. C. E. Emmert, Mrs. Bontea addressed the Daughters, expressing her pleasure at the large number present.

Other addresses were made by Mrs. William Davenport, of Anacostia, and the Rev. Percy Foster Hall, who has recently taken charge of St. Paul's, Alexandria.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. J. P. Tyler, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

The thirty-seventh annual convocation of the Church in North Dakota convened in Gethsemane Cathedral on Sunday morning, May 22. At 11 A. M. the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop, assisted by the Rev. Alexander Coffin, the Rev. N. E. Elsworth, the Rev. W. M. Walton and the Rev. H. H. Welsh, Indian priest. The Bishop read his annual address at this service, and gave a detailed account of the condition of the district.

In the afternoon a largely attended conference of the delegates to the convocation and the Woman's Auxiliary and Guilds was led by the Rev. B. T. Kemerer, Field Secretary, who delivered an inspiring address on the Nation-Wide Campaign.

After Evening Prayer, Mr. Kemerer also made a stirring address on the Church at Work.

The convocation was honored by the presence of Miss Alice Wright, one of our missionaries from Alaska, who gave an interesting account of her work in Alaska.

The next address was from the Archdeacon, who told in an interesting and happy way of his "Travels as an Ecclesiastical Hobo," which had carried him over 15,000 miles by railway, auto, horse and afoot.

The Bishop, in his address, after speaking of a number of debts paid and improvements made upon the Church property throughout the district, said that the outstanding accomplishments in 1920 had been the building of the beautiful All Saints' Church at Minet, at a cost of almost $50,000, three-fifths of which had been contributed and paid by the congregation; the enlargement and reconstruction of the parish house in Grand Forks at a cost of several thousand dollars; the rebuilding of the rectory at Cannon Ball; the erection of St. Paul's Chapel for the Indians, Fort Berthold Reservation; a new roof and other improvements upon St. James' Indian Chapel, Cannon Ball.

The Bishop spoke of the great benefit the Nation-Wide Campaign had been to the Church in North Dakota. He mentioned first the remarkable increase in the interest and pride which the congregations feel and manifest in their responsibility for the local support. During the year the salaries of all the clergy in the district, with two exceptions, were increased. Lastly, and greatest of all, is the increasing realization of their duty in the extension of the kingdom beyond their own parishes. This is manifest and most encouraging.

The outstanding features of this meeting of the convocation were the admirable arrangements made by the official committee in charge, the quietness with which everything was done and the abounding hospitality extended by the Cathedral congregation; the splendid combined attendance of the delegates to the convocation and of those to the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and Guild; the legislation enacting the canon for the guidance of the Bishop and Council; the canon for the Board of Examining Chaplains; and the resolution which was thoroughly discussed and unanimously passed, looking toward the enlargement of the annual gathering of the convocation and inaugurating work among the young people throughout the district and holding an annual camp of instruction and pleasure for them; the unanimous agreement to use the Easter offerings made throughout the district for this purpose; the number of fine reports made of good work done during the year by all departments of the Church. The laymen's dinner was the largest and most successful yet held, delegations being present from a number of Church clubs which had been established in the district during the

Family Department

JULY.

1. Friday.
3. Sixth Sunday after Trinity.
10. Seventh Sunday after Trinity.
17. Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Ninth Sunday after Trinity.
25. Monday. St. James.
31. Tenth Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Sixth Sunday After Trinity.

O God, Who hast prepared for those who love Thee, such good things as pass man's understanding, pour into our hearts such love toward Thee that we, loving Thee above all things, may obtain Thy promises, which exceed all that we can desire, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

"America, Befriend."

O Lord, our God, Thy mighty hand
Hath made our country free;
From all her broad and happy land
May worship rise to Thee;
Fulfill the promise of her youth,
Her liberty defend,
By law and order, love and truth,
America, befriend.

The strength of every State increase,
In Union's golden chain,
Her thousand cities fill with peace,
Her million fields with grain;
The virtues of her mingled blood
In one new people blend.
By unity and brotherhood,
America, befriend.

O suffer not her feet to stray,
But guide her untaught might,
That she may walk in peaceful day
And lead the world in light.
Bring down the proud, lift up the poor,
Unequal ways amend,
By justice, nation-wide and sure,
America, befriend.

Through all the waiting land proclaim
The gospel of goodwill;
And may the joy of Jesus' name
In every bosom thrill.
O'er hill and vale, from sea to sea,
The holy reign extend,
By faith and hope and charity,
America, befriend.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Marjorie Goes Bartering.

Half an hour later, when she drove a sleepy and satisfied little red-headed boy into town and gave him into his mother's hands at the door of the small white house on Centre Street, she was still rather thoughtful.

"If only the days of barter would come back again," she said to herself on the drive home, for a daring little notion had popped suddenly out of nowhere into her brown head. She fell nervously to twisting a soft strand of hair about her fingers as the idea began to unfold before her ready imagination.

"I've got something Mr. Watts needs, for of course he must want Meddie and his sister to have the things that will keep them strong; and he's got what I need, oh, so much! I wonder—"

If she only dared to suggest to Mr. George Medill Watts the idea of renewing the old-fashioned custom of barter and exchange.

Then abruptly she curled up her lip at herself scornfully. "Oh, of course," she thought, "if you're going to sit still and wait without any work or effort for that assistant's job to fall into your hand, Marjorie Mason, by all means just make up your mind to be a flabby failure for the rest of your life!"

While the old mare jogged through the farm gate and round to the barn her young driver fought a battle with shyness, fear of ridicule and half a dozen other timidities.

"He can laugh if he likes, and so can his wife," Marjorie said finally, setting her teeth hard against her underlip, "but I'm not going to give up without trying."

She unharnessed old Nancy and walked to the kitchen door soberly. From the pantry shelf she selected a small market basket, which she lined carefully with a clean fringed napkin. Then she began to pack the basket with the special "arguments" that she thought would weigh with the Watts family.

First, there was a white porcelain quart pail with a cover that she filled with milk from the same pan that she had drawn Meddie's glassful from earlier in the day. Then there was a neat golden print of butter wrapped in paper, a jar of currant jam and a small glass saucer of fresh pot cheese covered with a fringed napkin. And last of all into the basket went a head of crisp, curly-edged lettuce from Marjorie's own garden, half a dozen big ripe tomatoes from the same place, and several bunches of young beets.

"O me!" Marjorie sighed nervously, surveying her work. "Suppose he hates tomatoes and never eats beets!" Then, angry at herself, she added, "Oh, buck up—you make me tired!"

When she spoke in that tone the cowardly, put-it-off part of her knew that it was beaten. She reached for her hat, took the basket over one arm and set out with a brisk step on the two-mile walk to town.

The sun had slipped down in a bright rose-pink glow behind the low range of hills west of the village when she finally mounted the three white steps to Mr. Watts' front door. Darkness would not come for at least an hour.

Meddie Watts, tired from his afternoon's adventures, had been tucked off to slumberland a little while before; and, having finished supper, Mr. and Mrs. Watts were still sitting at the table talking, when Marjorie's knock announced her presence.

The front door stood open, for the evening was warm, and by glancing through the little living-room they could see who their visitor was.

Mrs. Watts jumped up hospitably and ran to bring the girl inside, thanking her again in an eager little torrent of words for her kindness to Meddie that afternoon.

"Come right in, Miss Marjorie," Mr. Watts called after his wife pleasantly. "Have you had supper yet? Mary, isn't there some cake and jelly left?"

"Oh, I can't stay, Mr. Watts, thank you!" Marjorie replied hurriedly as she followed Mrs. Watts into the dining-room. "Mother and father will be waiting. I only—that is, you see, I wish—"

Her voice trailed off into embarrassed silence. There was a big lump in her throat, and her cheeks were burning miserably. The basket on her arm seemed to weigh a ton and to be growing in size until it threatened to become the most prominent object in the room.

She felt sure that both Mr. and Mrs. Watts must be wondering why she had come to call with a market basket. Perhaps they would be offended when she told her errand. It might even prejudice Mr. Watts so that he would not have her for an assistant in any circumstances; and perhaps, too, he might not be willing to give lessons.

If she could only make him understand how she had always loved working with figures and what good marks she had had in mathematics at high school, he might not think that it would be so hard to teach her.

"Sit down, my dear," Mrs. Watts was saying kindly. "You said you wished something—"

She glanced at the table helplessly, hoping there was a piece of cake left to offer her unexpected guest, but the plate was disconcertingly empty. It had been the last of a cake baked two days ago. She flushed a little and smiled at Marjorie ruefully.

"You were saying," she repeated, hoping her husband would not think about cake and jelly again.

"I was wishing," Marjorie burst out with the boldness of desperation, "that we were living back in the times when people didn't need money so much, but could go to market and barter what they had for what they wanted."

Her listeners turned two pairs of astonished eyes in her direction

"Well," said Mr. Watts at last, smiling, "I don't see how that would help an old chap like me who hasn't anything to barter, but—"

"Oh, but you have! That's just it," Marjorie flung at him. Her eyes were bright and her hands were clasped nervously on the edge of the table. "It's because of you I'm wishing it. Please—please try to understand and not think me forward or—or impertinent—" She drew a frightened breath, and then the whole story came out in a headlong rush: her need of earning money, the wonderful opening the coveted position at the bank would mean in the fall, her love for just that special kind of work, and even Meddie's innocent disclosure that suggested the plan.

"You see, we haven't enough garden truck and milk and that kind of thing to pay us to sell in town," she finished, without looking at her audience, "but there would be plenty to keep your family supplied. I could come over three evenings a week with a basket; and if you would give me an hour's coaching for that position—"

She pushed the basket across the table. There was silence in the room for a moment.

Marjorie waited, holding her breath; her heart was pumping violently. If, Watts began to unpack the basket.

"Medill," she said, "look at this butter and this milk! You blessed child! If Medill doesn't agree to do some bartering, Marjorie Mason, I'll teach you myself. I used to teach in a business college before I was married."

"This isn't your affair, Mary," her husband interposed. "This is Miss Marjorie's and my barter—only I feel that I am getting the better of the bargain. It never occurred to me before to train my own assistant, but it certainly has its advantages. Why, you have an excellent business head already; I can see that right now."

Marjorie looked up shyly; her face was radiant.

"Oh—oh, you don't mean you'll actually consider me for the position, too," she faltered. "Why, really, I hadn't expected you to think about that at all till—till—"

"That part will depend entirely on yourself," Mr. Watts said gravely, though his eyes twinkled encouragingly. "You shall have your chance at the position—if you earn it. The board won't begrudge me the choice of my assistant. We'll have to see how you work, my dear."

"I'll work," Marjorie said simply. She looked as if she were taking a vow of some kind, she was so solemn and so much in earnest. Then her lips broke into an astonished little smile.

"Why, you can do—almost anything, can't you," she said, half in a whisper, "if you make up your mind hard enough? There really does seem to be a way, if you've got the will."—Marguerite Aspinwall, in Youth's Companion.

The Sacrifice of Christ.

Our Lord's life on earth, strong and beautiful though it was, was really at the same time His procedure toward death. He lived as one laying down His life, not merely in one great sacrifice at the close, but from step to step along His whole earthly history. With no touch of the morbid or the fanatical, yet His course, in practice, had to be one of self-impoverishment, of loneliness, of acquaintance with energetic hostility of sin and sinners. It had to be so if it was to be faithful. He knew not where to lay His head; He endured the contradiction of sinners against Himself; He came unto His own, and His own received Him not. Even His friends, whom He so loved and who loved Him in their imperfect way, did not love Him wisely or magnanimously, and constantly became occasions of temptation which had to be resisted. Pain and trial were the inevitable characters of the work given Him to do. All this He had steadily to postpone to a period beyond the grave, and meanwhile to make His way to the final crisis, at which, under a mysterious burden of extreme sorrow, accepted as the Saviour's proper proportion, He died for our sins.—Robert Rainy.

For the Southern Churchman.

I Would Not Live Alway.

Jesse Jouette.

I would not live alway, because
Tarth thoughts and earthly care
Beset my soul with many ills,
And steal my heart from prayer.

I would not li evalway, because
The world so much demands,
And keeps me from the heavenly paths
And thoughts of heavenly lands.

I would not live alway, because
Sometimes the shadows fall,
And gropingly I find my way,
And doubts so oft appall.

I would not live alway, because
He hath prepared a place
Where doubt, nor care, nor anything,
Shall hide from he His face.

"As One That Findeth Great Spoil."

In the little magazine called The Lamp is found this surprising combination of ancient fact and modern fortune:

"The fact that the Standard Oil Company has discovered oil and is operating wells in Egypt is generally known, but its reason for going to that ancient land to look for oil is probably not so well known.

"It is asserted that the attention of some one connected with the company was attracted by the statement in Exodus 2:2-5, that the ark of bulrushes that the mother of Moses made for her child was daubed with slime and with pitch.' Reasoning that where there was pitch there was oil, and that if there ever was oil in Egypt it was probably still there, the company sent out Charles Whitshott, its geologist and oil expert, to make investigations, with the result that oil was discovered. Three wells are now in operation and others are to be opened."

Mr. Babson, recognized throughout the business world as one of the leading economists, recently declared that he would like to see some one make a million dollars by prayer because such a thing is possible. Above is a sample of modern business enterprise making a fortune out of Bible reading! Aye, there is untold wealth buried between the covers of many a dusty Bible, waiting some earnest seeker—a wealth which pays not only in dollars and cents, but in the abiding riches of grace in Christ Jesus.

King David had only a fragment of the Word we possess, but that fragment made him infinitely rich. His joyful testimony is recorded in the 119th Psalm, "I rejoice at Thy word as one that findeth great spoil."—Selected.

The Old Loveliness.

Old books, old friends are best,
Old things are loveliest:
Old houses, and the glamour of old days,
The olden peace, the olden, quiet ways.

Old gospels, and old dreams!
With new delight life teems
When these are read, when these are told:
All youth at last grows old.

In bleak December, lo!
A whirlwind of white snow.
O heart! lost April then
Seems wonderful again.

Yet dream new dreams, be glad
For all the soul once had.
Old books, old friends are best—
Old love is loveliest!
—Charles Hanson Towne, in Good Housekeeping.

Hinderers of God's Work.

There are still a good many who harp against the Nation-Wide Campaign and all that goes with it. They even deride the results as insignificant, although all the evidences have been and are that the Church because of it has been stirred to her depths as never before.

But there is something very significant about these deriders and obstructionists. First, in nine cases out of ten they do not know what they are talking about. The average obstructionist and derider is of that type of vestryman or so-called "church worker"—happily becoming extinct—who reads nothing and learns little respecting the Church and her work outside his own parish limits. Second, he is of the kind who would do nothing to help even if he knew what to do and how to do it. To use almost a vulgarity, he is a "grouch."

It is unfortunate that in order to get the Church's business done, business methods have to be employed, but it is so. It would be fine if, instead of having to employ office workers and other help, keep books and records, make reports and submit statistics, and in other ways conform to accurate and methodical business procedure, we could by some hocus-pocus bring results out of the air without trying to get them. It would relieve the Church of the irksome part of its work, and the people from being prodded to their duty and urged to learn of the things being done. But, still members of the Church Militant, we are not yet in that glorious future Church that shall be triumphant over these earthly things.

Unfortunately, we find more inconsistency among the criers-out against the Nation-Wide Campaign and other forms of Church progress than among any other class of men. As, for instance, the prominent vestryman of whom we know—and he is but a type of, shall we say, thousands like him—who loudly proclaims his belief that the Church should drop its drives and campaigns and canvasses and other organized work, and be simply spiritual. And yet that vestryman—this particular one—not only does no parish work, but so far as is known he has never been seen at an early celebration of the Holy Communion, is never present at devotional meetings and seldom present at special services.

Let his kind talk and talk loudly. It will help all good causes of the Church, and inspire those who think and really pray to a deeper devotion. It will help along the growing inclination of our communicants to show and increase their faith by a reverent and loyal participation in the Church's works. So prate on, loud vestryman and "parish worker," of "the way they ought to do it," while others pass you by. You are trailing on behind the procession because you are not needed. The work is being done without you and in spite of you.—St. Andrew's Cross.

The Two Kinds of Folks.

There are two kinds of folks in the world:

(a) Those who are thankful for what they have.

(b) Those who are discontented for what they lack.

So one person is contented with the bare necessities of life, another who has most everything is unhappy because he or she lacks an automobile or a new hat.

The one is thankful to be alive and to think and to love and to be grateful; the other is discontented because some one thing has been denied.

The former is truly rich, the latter is really poor, for riches consist in that which we are capable of enjoying. —St. Mark's Outlook.

A Good Korean Plan.

A Korean came into the study of a missionary one day and said, "I have been memorizing some verses in the Bible, and thought I would come and recite them to you." The missionary listened while the convert repeated in Korean, without a verbal error, the entire Sermon on the Mount. Feeling that some practical advice might be helpful, the missionary said, "You have a marvelous memory to be able to repeat this long passage without a mistake. However, if you simply memorize it, it will do you no good. You must practice it." The Korean Christian smiled as he replied, "That's the way I learned it." Somewhat surprised, the missionary asked him what he meant, and he said, "I am only a stupid farmer, and when I tried to memorize it the verses wouldn't stick. So I hit upon this plan. I memorized one verse and then went out and practiced that verse on my neighbors until I had it; then I took the next verse and repeated the process, and the experience has been such a blessed one that I determined to learn the entire gospel of St. Matthew that way." And he did it.—Hartman's "Popular Aspects of Oriental Religion."

For the Young Folks

A Patriotic Wish.

I'd like to be the sort of man the flag could boast about;
I'd like to be the sort of man it cannot live without;
I'd like to be the type of man
That really is American:
The head-erect and shoulders-square,
Clean-minded fellow, just and fair,
That all men picture when they see
The glorious banner of the free.

I'd like to be the sort of man the flag now typifies,
The kind of man we really want the flag to symbolize;
The loyal brother to a trust,
The big, unselfish soul and just,
The friend of every man oppressed,
The strong support of all that's best,
The sturdy chap the banner's meant,
Where'er it flies, to represent.

I'd like to be the sort of man the flag's supposed to mean,
The man that all in fancy see wherever it is seen,
The chap that's ready for a fight
Whenever there's a wrong to right,
The friend in every time of need,
The doer of the daring deed,
The clean and generous handed man
That is a real American.

—Edgar A. Guest.

When Fourth of July Was a Day of Joy.

Long Tail, the squirrel that lived in the oak tree in Swan's Field, had never seen a Fourth of July. The older squirrels had and were very much puzzled over it.

"There's a day coming soon," said Grandpa Short Hair—you see, squirrels name themselves after oddities and qualities, just as the Indians do; that accounts for his name—"when nearly every man and boy goes suddenly crazy. They set everything afire that can burn and they make great noises, which shake off leaves and boughs of the trees. They get all over it in a day and a night, though, and then they act just as they did before. It's the queerest thing about these very queer two-legged people."

"When does it happen, grandpa?" asked interested little Long Tail.

"When the cherries are ripe," said his grandfather; "very soon now. We must stay indoors at least twenty-four hours, for it's not safe to be out while this madness lasts."

"And why do they do it, grandpa?" asked the curious little squirrel.

"No squirrel has ever been able to find out," said the venerable Short Hair, "but your Great-grandfather Bright-eyes, who was very wise, thought it was done to help the doctors. Doctors are two-legged people who cure other two-legs when they are sick or get hurt, and he noticed that after and during one of the Big Noise and Fire Days the doctor who lived in that white nest over across the road was called upon or went out almost every hour. Then again, he thought it might be there were too many two-legged creatures and that they had this fire day once a year to kill them off, as he noticed that many of them were never seen around after that day each year."

"How dreadful!" exclaimed Long Tail. "Surely these creatures would not do such things as that—kill their own young!"

"I don't know, only many of them get hurt or die on that day," said grandfather, "and these two-legged people are very, very queer.

A week later the cherries began to turn red.

"Will the Noisy Day of Fire come soon?" asked the little squirrel, and he was told that the wise ones of his tribe thought it was near, for it had always come when the topmost branches of the trees were red with ripened fruit, and old Uncle Big Ears, who could understand what people said, had sent word over from Jones' Hill, where another squirrel colony lived, that it was only two days to Fourth of July, another name for the Noisy Fire-day.

The morning of the great day came. The squirrels had laid in a supply of food. They were not going out during the season of danger, but Sharp Nose, a bright little gray squirrel, couldn't be kept in, and when once he poked his head out all the others had to look also, for squirrels are very curious creatures.

"The field is covered with great white boxes, and pieces of colored cloth are on each one," said Sharp Nose, "and there ain't a mite of noise or fire either."

"O-oh," said Sweet Tongue, "I smell such good things to eat, too."

The grandfather made them all go back while he investigated.

"The boxes are what they call tents," he declared, "and the other things are flags, and it looks as if they were not going to have any of their young killed today, but just have a good time, instead."

The squirrels were not allowed to go out, however, until night, when, after the tents and flags and tables which had held ice cream and lemonade and all kinds of cake and candies were gone, and some rockets and Roman candles had been sent up, Grandfather Short Hair said they might sniff around and see if they could find any crumbs.

The next day the squirrels found lots of nice things to eat in the field, and little Long Tail remarked that he thought a Field Day with speeches and games and races and all sorts of nice things to eat, as well as music and a few bangs at night, must be much nicer than the old way the elder squirrels told about.

"I don't believe that two-legged medicine-man likes it," said Gray Beard, "for I never saw him called once all day, and I kept my eye out towards his house, for he's a nice man and often throws us nuts and corn in the winter when snow comes. I don't believe he liked Field Day."

But the squirrel was wrong. It was the "medicine-man" who had advised it, for he had little ones of his own and he feared lest some of them might be blinded or burned on the Great Day. It was he who helped bring the families of his neighborhood into a clan to celebrate with good times the hours usually given over to riot and ruin.

Of course, even the wisest squirrel didn't know this, and some of them, little Long Tail among them, rather disbelieved the stories of noise and fire.

"So silly," said Swiftfeet; "we wouldn't do such mad things! 'Tain't a bit likely that these folks who are so big and smart would all go mad once a year. I guess Gran'ther Gray Beard was telling a make-b'lieve."

"An awful big one, too," agreed Long Tail.—Edith Wallace, in Our Dumb Animals.

The Ragged Little Flag.

By Bertha Harding Allen.

Little Gold-and--Silver was a Chinese house boy in the family of a missionary. It was his duty to come down early every morning and light the dining-room fire. As he leaned over the grate to strike a match one chilly morning, he saw a small flag on top of the pile of wood. It was ragged and soiled, for it had headed many a little procession round the mission yard. It had often been hoisted to the top of the high piazza pillar; it had flown from the bamboo poles of the children's sedan chair when they went out into the country; and it had waved from the roof of the sampan—the funny little house-boat on which the whole family lived when they went down the river to the big city.

Now a new flag was on the way from America to take its place; but Gold-and-Silver knew that the ragged little flag did not belong to the coal hod: the Chinese maid must have thrown it there. He picked it up and dusted off its folds.

When the missionary's wife came down he asked in his queer, stumbling speech if he might have the flag to show to his neighbors when he went back to his little fishing village at the mouth of the big river.

When she saw how carefully he handled the worn-out bit of bunting she smiled and said, "Jiang say," which is the Chinese for "yes."

That is how it happened that the little flag was neatly folded and put away with Gold-and-Silver's few possessions. The next time the house boy made a trip home he carried his treasure with him.

The men, women and children of the fishing village, and the dogs and pigs as well, all crowded round to give him welcome. Gold-and-Silver drew himself up proudly as he showed them his prize. It shone in the sun and fluttered in the breeze. "This is the foreigners' flag," he said. "The Flowery Flag!"

One day soon afterwards Gold-and-Silver went out in a fishing-boat with some of his friends. Suddenly, while they fished, he saw a wonderful sight—a big American gunboat out at sea. The little group stopped their work and watched the great boat as it came majestically toward them. Yes—no—yes, it was actually rounding the point at the mouth of the river! The fishermen had to row nearer the shore to get out of the way of the big waves that it made.

Gold-and-Silver sat in the stern of the small boat with his eyes growing wider and wider. The gunboat turned a little, and he came to his feet, with a cry. The beautiful Stars and Stripes at the stern of the boat was blowing back on the breeze—the foreigners' Flowery Flag.

All at once Gold-and-Silver remembered the little ragged flag in his pocket. He whipped it out and held it high with a salute.

The gunboat now was just opposite them. Suddenly a loud whistle blew. Gold-and-Silver shaded his eyes with his hand. He wondered why all the sailors were lined at the rail. Then in a flash he knew that they were looking at his flag, and that the whistle had been blown in answer to his salute. It was a proud moment in his life.

As the gunboat grew smaller in the distance the fishermen took the small flag and looked it over carefully with much curiosity. They could not exactly make out what all this fuss was about.

Gold-and-Silver tried to explain. "I think," he said as he put the ragged little flag back into his pocket, "it is because the American people very much love their country."—Selected.

Apple Blossoms.

Each spring they come with gentle blush
Like fairies in the night,
Decking the dark and scraggy boughs
In bloom of beauty bright.

With scent of rarest, sweet perfume,
They call the busy bees
To labor from the dawn till dusk
Among the apple-trees.

Short be their days of sunny life,
Until, like flames of snow,
They flutter to the kindly earth,
And then the apples grow!
—Don Seitz, in St. Nicholas.

"I Can't."

"Oh, I can't! I know I can't!" said Mabel.

"Yes, you can," said her Cousin George. "Why, it's just as easy! Look!"

And he ran back and forth several times on the big log that made a bridge across the stream.

Mabel's home was in the city, and she had never been in the country until that summer. Cross that stream on a slippery, mossy log? She never could do it, she knew.

"I can't," she said again.

"Just try it," coaxed George. "You want to see that big rock I've been telling you about, don't you? Then come on."

"Well, I'll try," said Mabel slowly. "But please carry Florine across first, and, oh, do be careful of her."

Florine was Mabel's best-loved doll. Indeed, she was a doll that no little girl could have helped loving, for she had curling yellow hair, rounded rosy cheeks and big blue eyes that could open and close. Even George said that for a doll Florine wasn't "half bad."

George carried Florine safe across the stream. Then he ran back to Mabel and steadied her wtih both hands while she slowly and carefully crossed. There really was not much danger of her slipping, for the log was wide, and it was firmly placed; but she gave a big sigh of relief when she stepped off on the bank.

"Now show me the rock," she said; and, carrying Floorine tenderly in her arms, she followed George.

Up a hill they went, across a big pasture lot, over a rail fence, along a little winding path that ran through a grove of birches, and then they turned a corner.

"There it is," said George.

Mabel stared in wonder. The rock was the biggest that she had ever seen, though it was only twice as high as she was. But the most astonishing thing of all was that trees and bushes were growing right out of its flat top.

"Well, I never!" cried Mabel. "How can trees grow up there?"

"There's dirt up there," explained George. "It's made out of rock that's been crumbling up finer and finer every year for years. Of course there isn't much dirt; but those are cedar trees, and they'll stick their roots down into a crack and manage to live if there's any chance at all. Come on up on top."

"What? Climb up there? Why, I can't!" cried Mabel.

"You said you couldn't cross the log, but you did," said George. "This isn't much harder. Look! I'll show you how to start. Take hold here, then put one foot in this crack and your George was climbing as he spoke. other one on that little ledge there." In less than a minute he had scrambled to the top of the rock and climbed down again.

"There, did that look hard?"

"No," Mabel admitted.

"Shall I take Florine up?" asked George.

"I guess I'll leave her down here," said Mabel. "She might fall off, and I just couldn't bear to have anything happen to her."

So she put Florine to sleep on a soft bed of ferns.

Mabel found climbing the rock hard work. She did a great deal of slipping and sliding, but George did plenty of pushing and pulling, and so she managed to reach the top at last.

They explored every inch of the top. Besides the cedars, there were little wild-cherry trees, blackberry vines, big clumps of feathery fern and some columbines. Mabel thought she had never seen anything so pretty as the delicate yellow, lavender and pink flowers.

But when it was time to start for home there was trouble.

"You go down first," said George.

Mabel put one foot over the edge, then she looked down and drew it back quickly.

"I can't," she said.

"Don't be always saying that," said George. "Go ahead."

"I can't," repeated Mabel. "This time I really can't. It makes me dizzy just to look down."

George coaxed and urged, but it was no use. He saw that Mabel really was afraid.

"Well," he said at last, "you can't stay here all night. Can you climb down on a ladder if I go home and get one?"

"Yes," said Mabel. "O George! I hate to be such a bother!"

"We've got a short ladder at home that won't be very heavy to carry," George answered.

He climbed quickly down the rock and disappeared along the path at a run.

Mabel sat still for a few minutes. How quiet it was there in the woods! The leaves hung silent in the sunlight; the flowers and mosses seemed to be asleep. Suddenly there was a loud rustling in the leaves. It sounded near the place where she had left Florine.

Mabel peeped over the edge of the rock. She found that she did not feel dizzy unless she looked straight down; but the ground still looked far away. She could see Florine sleeping soundly in her sweet, ferny bed. Just then the rustling grew louder, and a moment later a big brown dog came walking out of the woods. He was big and brown and woolly.

Mabel watched him as he nosed round here and there. All at once he saw Florine. He stood still a moment, then going close, he began to sniff at her. A second more and he picked her up in his mouth and was trotting off with her.

"Stop it! Drop her!" Mabel screamed.

At the sound of her voice the big dog looked back and wagged his tail in a friendly way. Then he turned and went on again.

Mabel did not wait a second, but scrambled over the edge of the rock. She had no thought now of being dizzy and no fear of falling. She had only one idea—to save her precious Florine. She did not even try to find the footholds that George had pointed out to her. Half sliding, half falling, she reached the ground in less time than it had taken George himself to reach it.

Catching up a big stick that lay near, she ran after Florine and the dog. The dog looked back again, and when he saw the stick that Mabel was waving in the air he dropped Florine and broke into a run. His woolly tail was between his legs, and his woolly ears were flapping backward.

Mabel picked Florine up tenderly.

"Oh, my darling dolly! Did the bad dog hurt you? He's torn your dress and mussed up your pretty curls, but I guess that's all."

Suddenly Mabel thought of George.

"I must run and stop him from bringing the ladder," she thought. And with Florine in her arms she hurried down the path.

George was just crossing the stream when he caught sight of Mabel running toward him. In his astonishment he dropped the ladder and almost tumbled off the log.

"How in the world—" he began.

"Really," Mabel broke in, "I was sure I couldn't get down, George, and then something happened."

And as they walked back to the house, carrying the ladder between them, she told him about Florine's adventure.

"That must have been Joe Lane's dog," said George. "He carries home all sorts of things. He took a cushion from our porch once, and another time he stole one of my rubber boots. First time I ever heard of his running away with a doll, though."

"He didn't get far with my precious child," said Mabel, giving Florine a squeeze. "I tell you, after this, George, I'm not going to say 'I can't' so much, because I found out this afternoon that if I really have to I can."

"I wondered how long you were going to take to find that out," said George.—Elsa Baker, in Youth's Companion.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

R. L. Christian & Company
514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.
Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse abd veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, 2604 Thirty-sixth Street N. W., Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

COUNTRY BOARD.

IN PRIVATE FAMILY, ON LARGE plantation near Rapidan, Va. Shady porches and lawn; large, comfortable house; modern conveniences. No children. Address Box 64, Rapidan, Va.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCAtion and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—LADY, WITH COLLEGE DEgree, to teach high school mathematics in Southern Boarding School for girls. Address Willanow, care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A TEACHER IN PRIVATE family. A refined Christian woman to teach three children in first, fifth and sixth grades. Music and French desired. References exchanged. Give references and salary desired in first letter. Mrs. J. S. Cochran, Brookewood, Augusta County, Va.

SITUATION WANTED.

EXPERIENCED CLERGYMAN, GRADuate-seminarian and post-graduate, desires parish or live mission. Unmarried. Apply "E. F.," care Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant principal or matron in a school, or some position of trust in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Carter: Died, May 2, at the Episcopal Eye, Ear and Throat Hospital, Washington, D. C., WILLIAM HUNTER CARTER, of near Middleburg, Loudoun County, Va.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

112 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

The Richmond Mica Co.

Oldest Ground Mica Factory in the World

Manufacturers of

GROUND MICA OF UNSURPASSED PURITY AND LUSTRE

BY EXCLUSIVE PROCESS

Factory, 321-323 S. Ninth St.

Office, Cor. Eighth and Main Sts.

RICHMOND, VA.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over here.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK

MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS

MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE

CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States

The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921

The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later

For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.
Special attention to out-of-town orders.
Samples sent upon request.
615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

Stevens Anti-Amebic Dentifrice

For Prevention and Treatment of PYORRHOEA OR RIGG'S DISEASE
Guaranteed to contain 3% fluid extract of Ipecac
Price, 50c per Tube, Postage Paid
Stevens Medical Mfg. Co.
17 Kent Avenue Brooklyn, N. Y

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.
Banking Hours-
Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)
Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning

FEET

that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

Thomas Gill Soap Co.
711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE
Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.
Flowers of Quality

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

CHURCH PEWS

PULPIT FURNITURE

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAIRS, BLACKBOARDS, ETC.

Virginia School Supply Company

2010-12 West Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia
AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE
President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.
Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.
General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

Cuticura Talcum

Fascinatingly Fragrant

Always Healthful

Sample free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass. Everywhere 25c.

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

year. The Men's Church Club of the district was more thoroughly organized, officers for the year elected and a program of work decided upon.

Personal Notes

The summer address of the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, is Virginia Beach, Va.

The Rev. E. W. Halleck, formerly rector of St. Stephen's Church, Louisville, Ky., has accepted a call to Grace Church, Waycross, Ga., and entered upon his new duties Sunday, June 19.

The many friends of the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, of Red Springs, N. C., will be distressed to hear of his recent operation for appendicitis. His condition is most favorable, and a speedy recovery is anticipated and hoped for.

For the Sunday mornings of August, All Saints' Church, Great Neck, L. I., has carried out its custom, covering a number of years, of inviting the Rev. William Porkess, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., to be the summer preacher.

The Rev. J. J. D. Hall will be in Philadelphia during July, and will serve as chaplain of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew Camp, Camp Bonsall, which will open Tuesday, July 5, in the beautiful hills near Downingtown.

At the recent commencement of Dickenson College, Carlisle, the degree of Doctor in Sacred Theology was conferred upon the Rev. Charles Noyes Tyndell, rector of Christ Church, Williamsport, Pa.

The Rev. Charles Henry Arndt, rector of Christ Church, Germantown, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity at Kenyon College, Gambier, O., June 20, when his son, John Falkner Arndt, received the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

The Rev. C. L. Monroe, recently ordained deacon, has been assigned by the Bishop of Virginia to Trinity Parish, Louisa County, Va., with residence at Mineral.

Services at the Memorial Church at St. Paul, Overbrook, Philadelphia, will be conducted by the Rev. John R. Hart, Jr., during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Robert Norwood, who will return from his lecture tour about August 20.

The Rev. Douglas Neff, recently ordained to the diaconate, will take charge of Ware and Abingdon Parishes, Gloucester County, Va. His address is Gloucester, Va.

The Rev. Bernard Jenkins, curate of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Rosemont, Pa., Rev. Charles Townsend, rector, sailed for England recently to resume work in the Church of England. The Rev. Charles Stromborn has been appointed to succeed him at the Church of the Good Shepherd.

The Rev. R. A. Magill, who was recently ordained deacon, expects to sail from San Francisco August 17 to take up his work as a missionary in China.

The Rev. George F. Dudley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Washington, D. C., has had conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, by Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio. Dr. Dudley is a graduate of that college.

The Rev. Alexander G. Cummins, A. M., Litt. D., rector of Christ Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and editor and founder of The Chronicle, has been honored with the degree of Doctor of Divinity by Washington College, Chestertown, Md. The honor was bestowed at the one hundred and thirty-ninth commencement of this college.

Ordinations.

On Saturday, June 11, the Rev. Walter J. Marshfield, a Methodist minister, was ordained deacon at the Chapel of the Incarnation, New York City, by Bishop Wilson R. Stearly, D. D., for Bishop James Wise, of Kansas. He was

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

JUST READY

More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"

By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.

SUNNY WINDOWS

Author of "The Children's Year"

AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl—while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by

Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

presented by the Rev. E. Reginald Williams.

Mr. Marshfield, while a Methodist minister of Muscoda, Wis., was attracted to the Protestant Episcopal Church by literature and publicity sent out two years ago by the Department of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

After several conferences with the Rev. E. Reginald Williams, of St. Mark's Church, Milwaukee, he decided to enter training for the Church's ministry, and was confirmed shortly thereafter, together with his wife, by the Bishop-Suffragan of Chicago, and went back to his Methodist parish until such time as he could get ready to enter the seminary. The parish offered him the charge if he would come back to them after he had been ordained.

He entered the General Theological Seminary a year ago, sending his wife and three children to England, their former home. He was an honor pupil at the seminary.

Mr. Marshfield has gone to England to bring back his family, and on his return will be assigned to missionary work in the Diocese of Kansas.

On the fourth Sunday after Trinity there were ordained at the Church of the Holy Communion, St. Louis, Mo., by the Rt. Rev. James Wise, Roy Spencer Rawson to the diaconate and Carl A. G. Heiligstedt to the priesthood. Mr. Rawson was presented by the rector of the parish, the Rev. E. S. White, who also preached the sermon. Mr. Heiligstedt was presented by the Rev. J. Boyd Coxe, who read the Litany. Mr. Rawson will return for one year to the Theological Seminary, while Mr. Heiligstedt expects to be assigned work in the Diocese of Kansas.

On the second Sunday in June Bishop Lines ordained the Rev. George P. Dougherty to the diaconate in Christ Church, Bloomfield. He has been serving in the parish for the last half year with Rev. Archdeacon Carter, and will remain in the work, which has greatly prospered under him.

In the Church of the Holy Spirit, Gambier, being the chapel of Kenyon College, on Sunday, June 19, 1921, Messrs. Raymond J. Harkin and Guong Heick Diong (a Chinese gentleman) were ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. William A. Leonard, D. D., Bishop of Ohio. The presenter was the Rev. Canon Louis E. Daniels, and the preacher, the Very Rev. Francis S. White. Mr. Diong was ordained for the Diocese of Fuhkien, and at the request of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Hind. These gentlemen are graduates of Bexley Hall.

On Sunday, June 12, in St. Stephen's Church, Middlebury, Vt., Mr. Henry Hamblin Chapman was ordained deacon by Bishop Hall, the Rev. E. B. Holmes, rector of the parish, presenting the candidate. Mr. Chapman was educated in the public schools of the village and at Middlebury College, before going to the General Theological Seminary. He will slpend his diaconate in Vermont before joining his father, the Rev. Dr. John W. Chapman, in Alaska.

Deaths.

The Rev. Robert Edmund Pendleton, rector of Christ Church, Cuba, N. Y., died suddenly at that place on June 4. Bishop Brent conducted the funeral service, assisted by the Rev. Frederic Clark Bentley, and the lay reader of the parish.

The Rev. F. C. Coolbaugh, D. D., rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Superior, Wis., died suddenly on Sunday, June 5.

Dr. Coolbaugh was educated at Hobart College, where he received the degrees of A. B. and A. M., and at Seabury Divinity School, with the degree of B. D. In later years he received that of D. D. from Hobart College. He was ordained both as deacon and as priest by Bishop Whipple in 1870, and celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination last year. He had been deputy to several General Conventions, and was a member of the Minnesota State Historical Society.

The Rev. Luke P. Holmes, retired, died on Monday, June 6, at the home of his sister in Burlington, Wis. The funeral service was held from the church at Sussex, where at one time he was rector. Mr. Holmes had retained his canonical residence in Wyoming.

The Rev. Addison M. Sherman, missionary at Platteville and Darlington, Wis., since 1910, died recently at his home in Platteville. Mr. Sherman had retained his canonical connection with the Diocese of Western New York to the last, and the body was taken to Batavia, N. Y., for burial.

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Do You Know

How many Episcopalians there are in the United States?
The population of the various countries of the world?
The chief auto pleasure routes in the United States, and their distances?
The yearly production of the various crops for the last ten years?
The laws governing marriage and divorce?
The military and navy data of all countries?

All these questions, and thousands of others, are answered in the "World Almanac and Encyclopedia," which we are giving away to our customers and to all those starting new accounts.

National State and City Bank

1111 EAST MAIN STREET, -:- RICHMOND, VA.

STAMMERING CAN BE CURED

YOUR MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

We leave it to you absolutely: if you say you are not satisfied, that settles it, you may have your money back. Not a single one to date who has come has asked that the money be returned. Write for booklet and references.

SCHOOL FOR STAMMERERS, Tyler, Texas

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

Posse Normal School for Gymnastic

Massachusetts, Boston, 779 Beacon Street. 53d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to the Secretary.

CENTENNIAL OBJECTIVES

A Century of Missionary Work

The main object of the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society is to call to mind with thankfulness the day when this Church, itself not much more than an aggregation of missions, recognized and assumed its corporate missionary responsibility, and to draw from the story of the growth of the work, now world-wide and vast in extent, inspiration for greater achievements in the years to come.

It was felt that the people of the Church would be glad to express their gratitude and renewed devotion in some concrete way, and so there have been named certain specific objectives in connection with the centennial, and opportunity will be given for a thanksgiving offering.

SPECIFIC OBJECTIVES

1. To secure by Easter, 1922, at least 100 qualified missionaries, both men and women, to meet some of the calls for reinforcements at home and abroad.

   This refers to both the domestic and foreign field and includes doctors, nurses, teachers and other workers as well as clergymen.

2. To complete the enrollment of the first 100,000 proportionate givers by Easter, 1922.

   This centennial year is a most appropriate time to re-emphasize the subject of stewardship Not only the support of the 100 new missionaries, but all the pressing needs of the field could be taken care of adequately if all the members of the Church would adopt the system of propor, tionate giving. A proportionate giver is one who at the beginning of a year determines that he will give to Church and benevolence at least a certain percentage of his income during the year. Literature on this subject and enrollment cards will be issued later.

3. To complete the enrollment of the first 100,000 intercessors by Easter, 1922.

   A missionary intercessor is one who regularly and definitely remembers the Church's mission in his prayers and who prays for particular missionaries and for particular missionary efforts. While there are doubtless hundreds of thousands who have been praying for the Church's missions it is desired to make an enrollment for those who will engage to pray regularly and definitely. Objects for prayer will be suggested. Literature on this subject and enrollment cards will be issued later.

It is asked that a thanksgiving offering be taken at the main service on Sunday, November 6th, the culmination of the centennial observance.

It is proposed to use this offering to complete a number of large and important building projects now under way or planned for, both at home and abroad, but delayed for lack of funds.

Full particulars will be announced later as to these projects. Each building erected with the aid of this centennial offering will bear a tablet citing the fact that it was so built.

Presiding Bishops and Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church
Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, - - - - New York City

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 9, 1921. No. 28.

A Prayer

Lord God, who thinkest even on me,
Grant me this grace, that I may prove
To some soul, doubting, Thou art Love;
That I may help some blind to see.

Yet if I fall through mine own sin
Let me not turn aside their eyes
Who look past me to Paradise,
Nor bar my brother, entering in!

M. L. G.

EDUCATIONAL

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to
REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean
Petersburg, Va.

The Virginian Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.
A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.
Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address
REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector
Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.
(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal.
Charlottesville, Va.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.
B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.
Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.
Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.
For information address the Rev George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5067 Woodland Avenue.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.
A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation
CHAS. J. SMITH, President

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Just as there is a potential statue in every block of marble, so is there an ideal self in every man. Be, then, the sculptor of your own character.

There would be more success in life if more of us were willing for God to tell us where and how to work.—E. J. Brown.

Many kinds of people doing their work are as essential to a healthy church as many kinds of organs functioning properly are to a healthy body.

Since we have to be our own constant companions, not only in this world, but in the next as well, nothing can make up to us for doing a thing which impairs character.

When thou feelest thyself most indisposed to prayer yield not to it, but strive and endeavor to pray even when thou thinkest thou canst not pray.—Hildersam.

The organ of prayer must be developed by praying, as the grace of generosity by the habit of giving. It belongs to every human being and it is the duty of all to cultivate it.

Peace is the root of all holiness. To believe that you are pardoned, to be at leisure from the retrospect, to carry a conscience at ease, to take the unruffled reflection of Christ, even as Christ did of the Father—that is the atmosphere of a daily religious life, and that is the secret of every good thing.—J. Vaughan.

Religion is the need of the soul for God. And the place where the Christian finds God is just where he feels the need—in that inmost recess of his being, where he finds that he can connect with God, by mutual speaking and listening. This is prayer.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,
REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.
A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.
MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D.,
CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D.,
PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

EDUCATIONAL

To know
Rather consists in opening out a way
Whence the imprisoned splendor may escape,
Then in effecting entry for a light
Supposed to be without.
—Browning.

Thank God for a new truth, a beautiful idea, a glowing experience; but remember that unless we bring it down to the ground and teach it to walk with feet, work with hands, and stand the strain of daily life, we have worse than lost it; we have been hurt by it.—Maltbie D. Babcock.

GUNSTON HALL,
1906 Florida Avenue, Washington, D. C.
A School for Girls.
Established 1892.
Preparatory and Academic Courses. Two years' post-graduate and college work. Music, Art and Expression; Domestic Science; Business and Secretarial Courses. Required athletics under trained supervision. Mrs. Beverley R. Mason, Principal.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

The cheerful giver is the happiest man on earth.

It is not the dark, but the brightness of a day that overwhelms our fevered eye. But make us whole and joy will banish pain.

What surprise of joy there will be in heaven when the faithful workers meet there, for the first time, the results of their work on earth.—I. B. Silcox.

If any of you should die today, could you say to God, "Lord, here is my life work. Thou didst send me into life with a handful of seeds, and here is my heart, like a garden, full of flowers"?—H. W. Beecher.

"Is there nothing, then, but Love, search we sky or earth?
There is nothing out of Love hath perpetual worth?
All things flag, but only love, all things fail or flee;
There is nothing left but Love worthy you and me."

What embitters the heart is not the thought of the ambitions which one cherished and could not for his weakness and limitation achieve, but the remembrance of the opportunities which his heedlessness let slip, the precious and abiding heritage which he bartered away for the profitless indulgence of a passing hour.

If God would give us the best and greatest gift, that which above all others we might long for and aspire after, it is this that He must give us, to be used and sacrificed for the best and greatest end.—Dr. James Hinton.

Physical science is promoted and extolled amongst us. But compared with this knowledge, all else is a meteor flash. I only really know the man with whose character I have an intense sympathy. Only so can I know God, and thus knowing God, I have eternal life.—D. Thomas.

Truth is sometimes hidden in order that we may have the blessing of the search, and that the truth found after the search may be more precious. The tropics, with their easy, luxuriant growth, grow languid men, and our less smiling latitude grows strenuous ones.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.
Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.
For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.
EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.
1843 1920
FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.
In the city of Richmond, Va.
A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Service

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson

Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

You Can Send Your Boy or Girl to Any College in This State

At but small sacrifice to yourself through our "COLLEGE PLAN"

If you will begin to prepare while they are young

Ask or write for booklet

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK

Tenth and Main Sts. Richmond, Virginia

"The Bank with the Three Doors of Opportunity"

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 9, 1921. No. 28.

THE PROTEST AGAINST DR. SHIPMAN

Some weeks ago the Diocese of New York, in an election for two Suffragan Bishops, chose Bishop Arthur S. Lloyd and Rev. Herbert Shipman. A vigorous protest has been launched in the Church at large against the ratification of Dr. Shipman's election. "The Living Church" has declared its opinion that "the best interests of the Church will be served in the event that the standing committees and the bishops decline assent to his consecration." It is reported that many letters are being written to the standing committees—and probably to the bishops, too—asking them to refuse endorsement to Dr. Shipman; and without the consent of the majority of the bishops and standing committees, the consecration of Dr. Shipman would of course be impossible, and the choice of New York in this respect would be denied.

The ground on which the protest is being made is the association which Dr. Shipman has had with "The Chronicle." "The Chronicle" is a monthly magazine published in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., under a Board of Editors of whom Dr. Shipman is one. Furthermore, "The Chronicle" has been made the official organ of the Protestant Episcopal Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge, of which Dr. Shipman is president, and this society, according to its purpose as printed in "The Chronicle," "insists on the Protestant nature of this Church," with an insistence which "implies resistance to all attempts to recall the Church to so-called 'catholic doctrines and practices.'" The statement goes on to say that the disavowal by the "catholic" party "of the Protestant nature of the Protestant Episcopal Church is a repudiation of its character and a wilful denial of its principles. It is a conspiracy against its life, which, if successful, will practically destroy it. This attempt, which is openly acknowledged, is an act of disloyalty and dishonor."

Naturally, "The Living Church" and all others who belong to the "catholic" party do not like that sort of language. They do not like the whole tone of "The Chronicle." They accuse it of an attitude which is "intolerant" and of editorials which are "venomous." Probably, if "The Living Church" had less of the controlled courtesy which even in its most tense utterances it never forgets, it would be tempted to remind its readers that somebody once fastened upon "The Chronicle" the name of "The Chronic-hell!"

For our own part, we have of course more sympathy with the aims of the Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge and its spokesmen than have those who are now fighting the consecration of Dr. Shipman. We want to see preserved in this Church all the frank contrast to mediaevalism, all the fine emphasis upon the simplicity of an immediate religious experience as against the paraphernalia of sacerdotal ritual, all the sympathetic contact with the great free Churches of western Christendom, for which the word "Protestant" is a flag. We do not like either the forms or the phrases in which the group who call themselves "catholic" set forth the appeal of Christianity and the Church, and we do not believe that they have a prevailing message for America in this modern time. But for all that, we recognize that "The Chronicle" has often been satirical, bitter and almost deliberately insulting. It has used language which would make men against whom it was directed feel a sense of indignant outrage. We do not wonder that such men oppose the promotion in the Church of any person whom they hold responsible for "The Chronicle."

We say we do not wonder that they feel that way. They are hot all through with accumulated anger at "The Chronicle's" attacks, and to keep silence now would be almost more than human. They are like the man in charge of the steam calliope of a circus parade who was hailed before a judge, after he had apparently ignored the judge's peremptory orders to stop that noise outside his court. "Jédge," said he, "when that thing hez got its steam up, it jest has to play, or bust!"

We can understand, therefore, the protest against Dr. Shipman's consecration. We can understand it on the basis of plain, human hostility. We can understand it also on the basis of men who genuinely and conscientiously believe, as does the editor of "The Living Church," that a man who has been identified with—what at any rate the other side regards as—insultingly partisan utterances, is not qualified to be a bishop and shepherd of souls to all men in the Church.

Yet, nevertheless, we hope "The Living Church" and all those for whom it speaks will think with a little further discrimination. It is true that Dr. Shipman is prominently associated on paper with "The Chronicle," and therefore, abstractly cannot escape blame for whatever one finds blameworthy in that journal. But practically is this of necessity true? A man may approve and support the general aims of a periodical without sanctioning all the style and manner which the idiosyncrasy of the active editor may give to it. Though Dr. Shipman cannot escape serious criticism from many quarters for his apparent endorsement of the contents of "The Chronicle," we question whether there is ground here for so serious a matter as the denial of the right of a great Diocese to choose him for one of its bishops.

The position of the antagonists to Dr. Shipman is that "the best interests of the Church will be served in the event that the standing committees and the bishops decline assent to his consecration." For our part, we have never so much as seen Dr. Shipman. We hold, therefore, no personal brief for him, even as also we have no grievance against him. As a man and as a minister, he has had a fine record of service. Our position, therefore, is that bishops and standing committees ought not to commit themselves to antagonism against him on any basis of conjecture. Unless they are convinced that Dr. Herbert Shipman, individually and personally, is such a man as would in his service as Bishop-Suffragan antagonize and embitter a part of the Church, they have no right to block the choice of the Diocese of New York, to whose members best of all the man is known.

THE BEAUTY OF SIMPLICITY

"In the evening He cometh with the twelve. * * * And as they did eat, Jesus took bread and blessed and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And He took the cup: and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them; and they all drank of it. And He said unto them, This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many. * * * And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the Mount of Olives."—From the gospel of St. Mark.

"During the General Synod of the Chinese Holy Catholic Church, in Wuchang, on April 24, there was offered in St. Michael's Church (Rev. R. E. Wood, priest in charge), a votive mass of the Holy Ghost for God's blessing on the work of the Synod. The Rt. Rev. D. T. Huntington, Bishop of Anking, vested in cope and purple biretta, supported with deacons of honor in dalmatic and tunicle, assisted pontifically. Solemn procession, during which the metrical Litany of the Holy Ghost was sung, preceded a solemn high celebration."—From a Church news Item of June 25, 1921.

If one of the apostles had appeared in Wuchang while the "deacons of honor assisted pontifically," would he have understood that they and their "votive mass" represented the beautiful simplicity of that first gathering round the table in the upper room?

We honor the sincerity of many of those in our Church today to whom all this elaboration of ritual has meaning. We can respect their earnestness. But none the less we remember what a dear old man of God said to a younger friend of his whom he had seen for the first time "pontificate"—"the voice was the voice of Jacob, but the clothes were the clothes of Esau!"

Sometimes we can almost understand the naughty "Ch ronicle"!

GOING AFTER THE PEOPLE

Dr. Washington Gladden, in his notable book on "The Christian Pastor," wrote—if we remember the phrase correctly—that "a home-going pastor makes a church-going people." What he said is true. It is not the eloquence of a preacher that brings people most steadily to church. It is their trust in a man whom they have known in personal contacts, through sorrow and through joy, and from whom, whether he preach with the smoothness of the accomplished speaker or not, they feel that they will hear something which they believe in because they believe in the man, and by which they will be helped to better living and braver faith.

In building up a church also it is the man who goes out and gets in touch with people who will succeed. Observers of churches are astonished sometimes when they see a particular congregation flourishing under the leadership of a minister who seems of only average ability. He may not preach any better than his neighbors; he may not seem to have any particular genius; but people flock into his fold. Why is it? It is because he goes and gets them. He values people, and he is not afraid of hard, patient work in order to win them for the Church and the Church's Lord.

The other day we picked up near a park bench a typewritten circular which had apparently been dropped by some traveling salesman. It was some advice from his firm. Its language is rather more breezy than one usually finds in pastoral theologies, but its message is not the less appropriate for those who can take a business-like suggestion and apply it to the business of the King. Here is part of it:

"It has been proven time and again that when a salesman pins his hopes for business on a few deals he may have hanging fire, he will surely come out at the small end of the horn.

"It is an easy matter to waste a whole day on a few choice prospects and repeat the same performance one day after another as they fade away one by one—putting in your time honestly and earnestly, to be sure, but overlooking the fact that selling is a percentage proposition pure and simple.

"If you do not make the calls you cannot do the business. No man living is smart enough to pick out the live ones in advance and skip others here and there who may not look so sure with any degree of certainty—except the certainty oof drawing mostly 'blanks.'

"Many a good, high-class man starts out some mornings when he does not feel his best—there are times when all of us have to drive ourselves to do the things we know should be done, but it is those who are able to drive themselves that make the big successes in selling or any other work.

"If it is possible to make ten calls a day, the thing to do is to start out in the morning with that many names on your list, regardless of the fact that you may sometimes spend over an hour on one deal and not be able to see every prospect you have in your vest pocket.

"But by going out every day with the resolution to make your maximum number of calls, you are sure to come home with the roast beef under your arm.

"The man who does the business is the man who makes the calls."

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF MISSIONS

Bishop Gailor's Address in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, at the Service Inaugurating the Centenary of the Missionary Society

It is most appropriate that the first service in anticipation of the commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society should be held in this city and in this church.

Memories sacred and inspiring crowd upon us, as we recall the history of the struggles and heroisms of those early days.

Christ Church and St. Peter's—the United Churches, as they were called—were under the same relationship for about seventy-one years, and with them is indisolubly associated the life and character of Bishop White, to whom more than to any one man, we are indebted for the organization of the American Episcopal Church.

It was in Christ Church that the Continental Congress in 1775 assembled for divine worship, and here for six years President Washington was an habitual worshipper, while three signers of the Declaration of Independence, Benjamin Franklin, Francis Hopkinson and Robert Morris, served as vestrymen.

It was in Christ Church that the first General Convention of the Church was held, and here in 1789 a convention met at which the Prayer Book and Constitution of the Church were adopted.

Hardly less memorable are the traditions of St. Peter's Church. It was in St. Peter's that Bishop White served as assistant minister, and it was near this church that he had his residence, where all the conferences concerning the organization of the National Church were held. It was in St. Peter's that Bishop White preached his first sermon on his return from England as Bishop, and here he preached his last sermon before he died, and held his first confirmation.

The perspective of the years does not dim nor depreciate, but rather brings into stronger light the real greatness of this noble Bishop, who for nearly fifty years guided the destinies of the Episcopal Church. As a friend of Washington and for many years chaplain of the Congress, a patriot of clear convictions and resolute spirit, and a Churchman of very definite loyalty and Christian charity, he seemed to be specially chosen by the providence of God to be the Church's leader in that day when foundations had to be laid and essential truth maintained.

There can be no doubt in the mind of the student that what seemed native meekness in Bishop White was the lofty magnanimity oo fa great soul, and what some have called indefiniteness ofo theological teaching in him was really the appreciation by a well-trained and well-stored intellect oof the supreme value of fundamental principles.

It is not to be wondered at that the Episcopal Church waited for about thirty-two years to enter upon an organized effort for domestic and foreign missionary work. The Church could hardly be said to be organized until 1801, and, twenty years after that, its leaders felt strong enough to send missionaries not only to the home field, but into foreign lands. It was in 1830 that these first missionaries sailed for the foreign field, and it was in 1835 that the first Domestic Missionary Bishop was consecrated.

From the day when, in 1607, the first religious service in the American colonies was held at Jamestown, Va., by a clergyman of the Church of England, or, as we say, the Episcopal Church—and that was thirteen years before the Puritans brought their religion to America—that Church was subjected to almost continuous persescution by scheming politicians in England and hostile religionists at home—a persecution all the more deadly because it was for the most part subtle and indirect. Only the heroic adventure and the splendid sacrifices of the representatives of the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel saved the Church from extinction. For a people whose ecclesiastical existence depended upon the ministrations of Bishops and who for one hundred and fifty years had no Bishops to minister to them, for these people to keep their faith in spite of it all, so that their descendants were able to come together and establish a National Church, was one of the miracles of history.

We have no just cause to find fault with Churchmen because they waited until 1821 to organize the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society.

When they did wake up to their responsibility for making known the gospel message to all peoples everywhere, the clergy of the Episcopal Church showed a self-sacrificing devotion and an ardent faith, worthy of a place among the noblest records of missionary enterprise in the history of Christianiity. For heroic adventure and lofty enthusiasms and glorious unselfishness, Cobbs and Chase and Otey and Kemper and their fellow-workers have no superiors in history. They do honor to the name American.

Bishop Kemper's life, written by Greenough White, is the portrait of one of the great apostles of all time. He was a disciple and an assistant to Bishop White. His consecration as first Missioonary Bishoop was the twenty-seventh and last consecration at which Bishop White officiated. He was nearly sixty years in the ministry. He traveled, by stage or boat, on horseback and on foot, more than 300,000 miles. For nearly thirty-five years he was a Bishop. He organized six dioceses, consecrated one hundred church buildings, ordained more than two hundred men to the ministry, and confirmed more than ten thousand souls upon the frontier of our country. Of him it was said, "His death was like a summer sunset that ends the day—a visitation of God's eternal order among the uncertainties and confusions of time."

A Church that could produce and inspire a man like Kemper could not remain a laggard in missionary service. In 1835 Bishop G. W. Doane struck the keynote by declaring that the Church itself is a missionary society and every baptized member of it pledged to missions—and the General Convention endorsed the declaration. In 1871 the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions was organized under Dr. Twing, with Miss Mary A. Emery as secretary, and in 1899 the "United Offering" of the Woman's Auxiliary was inaugurated; and that organization of women in the fifty years of its existence has contributed fifteen million dollars to the cause of missions, besides the immortal and inestimable impulse it has given to the spiritual life of the Church.

In 1877 the children in Philadelphia were enlisted in the missionary forward movement, and that Sunday school offering, beginning with $200, has spread over the Church and increased a thousand-fold.

In conclusion, I may say that the income of the Missionary Society, when it was organized in 1821, was exactly $7,000, and last year the Church contributed over $2,700,000 to missions and $1,000000 more to other extra diocesan activities, including education and social service.

Today the American Episcopal Church finds herself facing a tremendous but wonderful and glorious opportunity of service. In a peculiar sense and degree she is an American Church; not only because her constitution reflects the democracy of the founders of the republic in its lay representation and its bi-cameral legislature, but because it is one Church from one end of the republic to the other, and there is no land where the flag floats that is not ministered to by one of her Bishops.

Vast, indeed, is the responsibility whch in God's providence has devolved upon us, and I am happy in the faith that our people are slowly but surely responding to the call. Only last Sunday I presided at a meeting in Milwaukee, where the representatives of sixty dioceses of the Episcopal Church, some of them coming a thousand miles, had assembled for a National Church Conference on Social Service, and all over the country, as never before, our people are showing glad appreciation of the forward movement. And doubtless the need is great. The standards of our civilization, the moral ideals of our society, the very safety of the republic are at stake, and only the Christian forces can prevent disaster. There are millions of our brother Americans, foreign-born but loyal to the flag, who want the eencouragement and inspiration oof Christian fellowship. There are eleven million Americans of the Negro race who need the sympathy and help and leadership of Christian men and women. There are a hundred and fifty thousand of our chosen young men and women in colleges and universities for whose Christian training and loyalty the churches must hold themselves responsible.

And when we look beyond our own borders—and let me say that it is a paltry and hunger-bitten love of the brethren that begins and stays at home—our hearts and minds are stirred and thrilled with the knowledge of the heaving, throbbing, seething changes, mental, moral and spiritual, that are making this century of ours the birth-time of a new world.

Therefore must the Church, as an army, organize and gird herself for unpreceedented efficiency of service, to be able to call upon and to use every ounce, every atom of power which the Holy Spirit may grant to her, that every individual man and woman who acknowledges the name of Christian may justify the life that God has given them by rendering service to His name and cause.

We speak sometimes of the second and third centuries, when men and women and children died for the crooss oof Christ, as the age of persecution, but we know now that it was the age of advance and progress, of victory through sacrifice. And only so can our victory come—through sacrifice, for sacrifice alone is fruitful, love alone shall last.

God gives the harvest. All He asks of us is the honest will to serve, the honest will to give, the honest will to believe and follow Christ. And this much every man can do. He can clear away the weeds and rubbish that have overgrown his nobler, better self. He can create for himself the habits of prayer and communion, the eternal acts of reverence for noble and high and beautiful things, and then trust God to bring the blade, the ear and the full corn in the ear. For He has promised, "He that willeth to do My will shall know." And so we pray:

"Grant us the will to fashion as we feel:
Grant us the strength to labor as we know:
Grant us the purpose—ribbed and edged with steel—
To strike the blow.

"Knowledge we ask not. Knowledge Thou hast lent:
But, Lord, the will—there lies our bitter need:
Give us to build, above the deep intent,
The deed, the deed."

THE CLAIM OF WAYWARD YOUTH

Mary Willcox Glenn

Youth's pre-occupations, necessarily, are the Church's concern. When the conventional holds its place unchallenged, Churchmen may not realize the importance of considering the new generation in terms of its desire to be different. But in an era of shifting standards of behavior, as the old moulds of conduct begin to crack, youth takes courage to assert itself, and, in process of finding new, desirable forms of erpressions, presents itself as a problem to its elders. Then youth's actions are classified under the heading, license; its ambitions under the heading, rebellion.

The Church, pre-eminently, in such periods of moral and social upheaval, should give youth the assurance of being understood. To understand, she must touch youth at the point where its spiritual life is most threatened. She must be prepared to go with it to the depths of its debasement. She, because of her discernment, will realize that the debased is the exceptional, but her chivalry will make her zealous to rescue, to protect the mosts defenseless, and ready to see how her own failures of apprehension have helped make the setting against which these weakest children break their presumptuous, ineffectual spears.

The Church, moreover, can learn youth's requirements only in so far as it faces what youth has to face; can become sanely optimistic only as it goes "all the way with pessimism," and arrives at the place beyond where rank growth may be seen to bring a new flowering of the spirit.

The Church's discerning, creative care must include boy and girl, but it is with the girl in the foreground that the Church Mission of Help at present faces its service to the Church at large.

Who is this girl that comes to the society? Why is she as she is? What can the society, in the name of the Church, do for her? What can she do for the society? What can she and the society together do for the community? What for the Church? These are questions to be asked, and then re-asked, as the answers plumb deeper the depths of the problem they imply.

The first answer to the first question is a negation; the girl does not constitute a type. The Church worker will never get onto the plane of understanding unless she recognize her as an individual, who, because of her individuality, cannot be made the subject of any convenient generalization. The worker needs to learn what has been the girl's social background, what are her and her family's social connections, of what race are they, and how may racial characteristics be expected to modify or help determine her actions and attitudes of mind? What, if any, has been her and their religious experience? It is important to meditate on what she, in herself, is; comparatively unimportant, after facts have been secured and weighed, on what she is doing or has done. She must be envisaged as a personality, compounded, unless she be mentally defective, of emotions, intuitions, will. These attributes give assurance that she is in process of becoming something different from what she has been and now is. The worker, as a member of the church, should through faith be peculiarly equipped to make here a signal contribution.

The second question, Why is she what she is? the worker should ask with the intention of being honestly analytical, with determination to avoid becoming either sentimental or censorious. She must try to know what part the girl's surroundings, what part other factors, individual and social, have had in creating her dilemma. It is not easy to correlate the results of the inquiries. The weighing of evidence is a slow process. It does not lend itself to a mere routine procedure, nor result in a ready-to-hand solution of the problem of treatment involved. In many instances a worker will remain baffled as to which is the wisest next step to take.

Two facts in particular should be held in mind. One, that conduct, as a student of the maladjusted girl has recently written, is seldom casual. There must necessarily be a series of circumstances, of actions, which have preceded the instance which has brought an individual girl to the society's attention. The other, that the problem of the feeble-minded, which will include a considerable proportion of the cases under care at any given time, has been evolved by society itself. These "God's fools" are in themselves no menace. They should make special appeal to the Church. A truly Christian society would make sure that they hold, always, the innocence of childhood.

The first point to remember in asking the third question, What can the society do for the girl, is also a negative one. She must not be thought of as a difficult case. Different from any other, and therefore challenging, yes, But it must be borne in mind that difficult is a relative term. Many a girl is lost to a worker because ingenuity, resourcefulness, have been submerged by a consciousness, on the part of the girl as well as worker, that her case has been ear-marked-difficult. The goal of effort is in every instance the same, and, in a sense, in each instance as hard to attain. * * *

Many of the society's girls first face life as life when they leave the hospital ward with child in arms. Then life defines itself as having value because it is shared, and the beginnings of a home are grounded on sacrifice.

In "Young Working Girls," by Robert A. Woods and Albert J. Kennedy, the point is made that many young people have an elemental desire to bear burdens. No one who has worked with people who live in mean streets can question the readiness of the so-called poor to share one with the other. But youth's capacity for sacrifice gets overlooked. Church Mission of Help, through its experience with unhusbanded mothers, should be able to learn how to bring girls to assume responsibility. Faith in the individual's power to respond to Christian guidance may work the seeming miracle.

It was said above that failure of adjustment to her circle had brought the girl to the society. That circle, however, in most instances is itself broken. In the "Study of the Neglected Girl," made on the Middle West Side, New York City, Ruth True says that "to strengthen the best elements of the home, this is the surest and most fundamental way to help this girl." The Church worker agrees emphatically, but no elements, classifiable as good, may be found in the home from which comes a specific girl. In a large proportion of cases the girl has to be considered a solitary for whom a home setting must be found. The Church through its own body should be able to offer this setting, should be the means by which a sense of the value of family life is aroused in the girl, a measure taken—subconsciously—of what the sharing as well as the building of a home entails.

The Church worker should be able to approach the girl with confidence in the validity of the Church's teaching that what counts for membership in the kingdom of God is power to subordinate things in their use so that they become instruments of service, not tyrants. Abuse of things is a trite answer to the second question, Why is she as she is? Feverish desire for possession of the ephemeral is known in many instances to have her, as in a trap, committed to make furtive efforts to get for instant use the things she craves. A valid answer, however, would have to be given in each instance, as a result of the study of a particular girl.

Two further generalizations should be made in considering what the society can do for the girl. The value of the group is being realized in social treatment. In Church Mission of Help experience evidence accumulates of the gain which results from working out plans together with the girl and some other member of her circle—father, mother, brother, intimate girl friend, father of her child, husband, as the case may be. Group contacts may lead not only to surer comprehension of the elements of her problem, but to a mutual agreement to take together the steps involved in making a fresh start.

The second generalization also calls for group action. The Church Service League has urged its member societies to learn how to supplement each other. The Girls' Friendly Society ,Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses, and Church Mission of Help have already met to devise ways of working together. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew in two dioceses has made, with the hearty endorsement of its national office, a similar start through conference with representatives of the Church Mission of Help. These larger, more formal conferences between selected representatives of the several societies should drift into a spontaneous coming together to consider the pooling of strength in behalf of concrete individuals.

What the girl has already done for the society comes first to mind in asking the fourth question, What can she do for it? She as mother has shown in many instances how fine is her courage, how simple, her way of accepting the burden of her child's care. Her courage is usually greater than is her family's, who shrink from the disgrace of letting her maternity be known. The lessons of courage she has taught may be offered in proof of the assertion that youth, even when most shattered, is ready to assume burdens.

Another contribution she has made is to show how deep rooted is the sense of family responsibility. Many girls in our experience have returned to an office to bring a younger sister, and to ask that she be guided so that she may escape making a mistake similar to the one made by her less advantaged elder. This consciousness of family interdependence, especially the interdependence of brothers and sisters, seems to the social worker fed by the press with accounts of the readiness with which ties of relationship are broken, more easily aroused at this end of the social scale than at the other end, where easy divorce takes the place of unlicensed, illicit relations.

The Church worker through the girl's eves can come to see the awful consequences to the individual of her acts and the pain of the slow recovery of status. Again, in the experience of the Church Mission of Help, the worker has found the woman who literally has gone down into the depths, but has risen therefrom ready to face squarely the facts of life. Life stript of the artificial, revealed as simple even though hard.

A last contribution to note here is that she is proving to the society that even though her immorality be a result of the disintegration of her home, nothing can take the place of the home. A social worker said in a recent address that the school must increasingly make up for the deficiencies of the home. Nothing, however, can make up for its deficiencies. Such a suggestion is a council of defeat. The more broken the home becomes, the more substitutes for it offered, the more convinced is the Church worker that whatever is provided to replace it is merely a makeshift, falls short of what is essential. The Church's responsibility here seems clear, though the means to a solution of so fundamental a problem will not be found until Departments of Christian Social Service and Religious Education have worked in close co-operation with non-church agencies, made many fresh, tentative experiments. * * *

What can the girl and the society together do for the community? The girls who have been its clients should be partners of the society, and with it use accumulating experience to the advantage of other girls and of the community itself. Convictions as to the value of the home, the sacredness of marriage, the wealth of woorth in the relationship of brothers and sisters, the importance of children's learning in the right way the relation of physical growth to life's purpose, the beauty of purity of thought and deed are being slowly, partially acquired in some instances by girl and worker. Each grasps but feebly all that is implied in a right apprehension of these foundation truths. But some of them can make effort each to give expression to her new insight, and by the process of passing on be a party to the community's taking a higher moral stand.

The superintendent of a girls' reformatory said, in speaking of her work at the 1920 meeting of the National Conference of Social Work, that the Church had not helped her. When she had been asked by a denomination for a list of the girls in her institution for whose after care the denomination, might be considered responsible, her answer had been: "In the name of God, begin at the other end."

Church Mission of Help believes it can help the Church to begin to begin at the other end, proovided it has the effective backing of the Church. The soscicty contends that a beginning needs to be made by an apparent moving backwards, namely, by learning through contact with fact what has carried young people, who have had the opportunity to use the Church, into the reformatory.

The authoors of "Young Working Girls" state in that study, published in 1913, to which reference has already been made, that the "universal sentiment of the contributors" to the sttudy was that comparatively few girls come under adequate and forceful religious leadership, and that there is immediate and pressing need of more vital religious teaching on fundamental questions of character. They, the authors, said succinctly before the war what is being more volubly, more universally, said now, and it is a hopeful sign of the times that there is a growing realization of morality's need of religion.

It was said earlier in connection with the question, What can the society do for the girl? that she must solve her own problem. "There is no choice save thine own soul's, "In the last trench."

The worker realizes that the girl, for the sake of her soul's integritty, must make her own choice. But she must not, she does not, have to stand alone in the "trench."

The final assertion is not as to how far girl and society need each other, but that they need the same thing. Each in no less degree. The mutual, the binding need, is for God. Church Mission of Help must carry on, as it must begin its work, on its knees.

METHODIST CHURCH ACTIVITIES.

About two hundred and fifty American Methodist leaders, North and South, expect to be in London in September to attend an Ecumenical Conference of Wesleyans. The conference sits in Wesley Chapel in City Road, but there will be some great meetings in the Methodist Church House, Westminster. It is the fifth conference to be held, one meeting in Washington and one in Toronto, the others in London.

Vital matters to be discussed are Church unity, and conditions of world Methodism growing out of Foreign Mission propaganda and the World War. Archbishop Cosmo Lang, of York, has presented the Lambeth proposals on unity, and American Methodists will present reasons why Methodists North and South in America have failed, after repeated attempts, to get together, or even to make any progress toward getting together. These are held to be burning affairs, especially the one of Christians of like names burying some differences and co-operating as single bodies.

Following the World War, Methodists of the American North are pushing into Catholic Europe. The work in Rome itself has doubled in size, so Methodists say, within the last few years. It has extended into the regions wherein old Protestant influences reasserted themselves since the armistice, and recently a deputation of Methodists has gone into Northern Africa, not the old field, but a new one, to spy out the land. Tremendous progress has been made at teaching the French and others modern Christian service along social, athletic and medical lines. The London conference will, as matters of information, take up these vast advances of Wesleyans.

MEMORIAL DAY ABROAD.

S. N.

Where our dead in their glory are resting,
Carry your evergreens, laurel and palm,
Stormy and short was their sojourn among you—
Long is their resting time, holy and calm.

Light of a mother's eye, pride of a maiden,
Life seemed to each of them sunshine and light.
Like the great *Captain Who died for His comrades,
They, too, have given their lives for the right.

England and France grew their palm and their laurels,
English and French hands have tended their graves;
But the dear homeland flag, proudly claiming their glory,
Flag of the Stars and Stripes over them waves.

Shall not that flag that with England's flag floated,
Shall not that banner by France held so dear,
Shall not that blood on the battlefield blended,
Hallow the grief that the nations share here?

'Tis for that blood on the battlefield blended,
England is paying her tribute of tears;
France lays her lilies and cypress above them,
Fresh with proud gratitude all through the years.

Lo! o'er the ocean a bird swiftly flutters,
Type of the best that they fought for, a dove,
With the olive-branch, symbol of peace to the nations,
America's tribute of grief and of love.

*"And has for Captain Him Whose thorn-wreathed head Smiles from the cross upon a conquered world."
—Joyce Kilmer, in "The Peacemaker."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE SURVEY.

Mr. Editor: Why are so few men in the Church studying the Survey? And why do not more rectors see its inspirational value and use it to arouse interest among their laymen in the extension work of the Church?

Here is a case which illustrates what I mean: In a certain parish is a chapter of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, which has been organized less than a year. The men did one good piece of work during Lent. Since then they seem to have been marking time. They hold regular meetings every two weeks and discuss what they can do to keep up their interest. They considered studying the Prayer Book or Bible, but most of them were in the rector's Bible class, and the Prayer Book was so familiar they did not feel the need of study.

"The Survey" was suggested as a subject, and a committee was appointed to "look into it." The rector was consulted and thought the Survey dealt too much with figures to be interesting! The committee then wrote several letters to see what the Brotherhoods in other places were studying, or what they were doing. The fact that two classes of women in their own congregation had studied the Survey and found it most interesting and inspiring, seemed to settle the matter. Probably they decided it was not worth their serious consideration; at any rate, they are not studying the Survey or anything else.

Why is it that the men do not know that this is the most serious effort ever put forth by the Church to show to her members what the work is that she is doing, and what wonderful opportunities lie open before us at this time?

How is the Church to meet her obligations and opportunities if the men in the Church will not open the covers of the Survey and read the message it contains? And how many of the clergy really know what a wonderful tool they have in the Survey for opening the hearts and minds of their people? How many of them really have studied it themselves?

If the picked men who belong to the vestries and chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew could be made to realiize that t is their duty to know something of the whole work of the Church, and that mere loyalty should inspire them to study what the Presiding Bishop and Council has made available for their information, then the Church would have taken a long step toward solving her problems.

Who is to blame?

C. F. RUAN.

FOR A CHINESE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor: Will you kindly give space in your columns to the following extract from a letter of Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, to Dr. John W. Wood, with the subjoined explanation?

"It gives me great pleasure to report that Mr. McRae's work at All Saints' has prospered very greatly, and that we have now a very promising centre in that part of Shanghai. The congregation cannot be permanently accommodated in the room in the parish house which now is the chapel, and it would be well to utilize the opportunity of Mr. McRae's furlough by allowing him to do something to raise money for the Church which will be needed soon. He has already a nucleus of such a fund, which amounts, I believe, to about $3,000 Mexican, and will no doubt find those who are interested enough in his work to make special contributions to increase it."

The work at All Saints' is not yet six years old. From the beginning we have aimed at self-support, and in a very little while the congregation was paying all the current expenses, except the rents and the salaries of the workers, besides its apportionment to the Diocesan and the General Missionary Society. On Deceember 14, 1920, our fifth anniversary, the congregation having by that time grown to about one hundred and fifty communicants and the same number of persons preparing for baptism or for confirmation, the vestry voted to relieve the mission of half the salary of the Chinese associate rector, the Rev. H. K. Waung. Nearly all of the $3,000 which Bishop Graves mentions was contributed by members of the congregation and other Chinese Christians in Shanghai. My furlough is drawing to a close and we still need at least $10,000 to complete our building fund. Are there not some of your readers who would like to help this Chinese congregation which has shown such a laudable spirit of self-help? Those who desire to do so may send their contributions to Mr. L. B. Franklin, Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, marked "Special for the All Saints' Building Fund, Shanghai."

CAMERON F. McRAE,
Missionary in Charge of All Saints' Church, Shanghai.
2332 Andrews Avenue, New York, June 27, 1921.

The Great Commission.

FOR LIBRARIES IN CHINA.

President Hsu, of China, has just given $500 to the Enlargement Fund of the Boone University Library at Wuchang. A former president, His Excellency Li Yuan Hung, has given $1,000. Several other public men in China, it is expected, will manifest a similar very practical interest in Boone Library. A Chinese business man in Shanghai, Mr. C. Nieh, President of the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce, has made a gift of $2,000 and has asked Boone to send a trained librarian to Shanghai to give advice with regard to the organization of a commercial library now being planned for that city.

These developments in Shanghai are due to the visit of Mr. T. Hu, one of the Chinese trained at Boone in the Library School and then sent to this country for further training in the New York Public Library. Mr. S. Seng, a library expert trained at Boone and in New York, has been spending some months in Peking for the purpose of reorganizing and cataloguing the library of Chinese Social and Political Science Association.

Boone University is the only place in China where young men are being trained for library service. It was not until some of these library experts trained at Boone began to introduce modern methods into the care of some of the collections of books in Peking and other similar centers that China could be said to have had any public libraries at all other than our own public library at Boone University.

The Chinese character for library means a place for the hiding of books. The Chinese have lived up literally to that conception. Thanks to the work of Miss Mary Elizabeth Wood and the gift of the Misses Stokes, who made possible the library building at Wuchang, and the work of young Chinese trained at Boone, this conception of a library is steadily being replaced by more modern ideas.

In addition to its work in Wuchang, Boone University has twenty-two traveling libraries going about the various cities in Central China.

Dominican Children's Offering: The national treasurer's office has just received a Lenten offering of $15.15 for the work of the Church, from the children of the little Church school in Santo Domingo City, a noteworthy instance of the missionary spirit in those who are most needy themselves.

Convocation in the Islands: St. John's Church, Christiansted, in the Virgin Islands, which made a remarkably high record in the Nation-Wide Campaign, has just acted as host to the Convocation of those regions (Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands). An unhappy prologue to the occasion was that the delegates had to arrive by launch, and were mostly seasick!

Next to Bishop Tuttle: Bishop Garrett, first Missionary Bishop of North Texas and Bishop of Dallas since 1895, is next in order of consecration to Bishop Tuttle. He was born in Ireland in 1832, and consecrated in 1874, when he was number 108 in the line of the American episcopate. Since then more than 200 Bishops have been consecrated.

Comrades, I said, who to the West
Have through a thousand dangers pressed,
Let not the little space
Remaining to our race
Run out before our senses find
Experience of the world behind
The courses of the sun,
Where people there are none.
Consider what hath been your lot;
Not for brute life, were ye begot;
But that ye might pursue
Virtue and knowledge too.

—Dante.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

WORTHY SUMMER ACTIVITIES.

It is not our purpose to use this department of the Southern Churchman to raise money for specific objects or institutions, but rather to arouse the public conscience to a sense of responsibility to our duty in general, to respond to the various calls that come from time to time, and to try to give information about uplifting and philanthropic enterprises and institutions.

We publish a letter received this week, feeling that the example set by the writer may inspire others to do likewise.

"Dear Mr. Montague:

Last Sunday I read an article in the Southern Church of June 18, written by you, "The Little One Whom Nobody Knows." It affected me very much. I am alone; my good husband died January 9, 1921; my children are all married and gone from home. I am seventy-five years old. My income is not great, but I own my home, and have income enough to live economically.

I am going to the seashore in July to spend some time with relatives, and I think I should send you a check for $10 to spend for some unknown little one, either a cripple or frail, delicate child, to assist in an outing in the country. I am sorry it is not more. I am a member of Trinity Church,

---

Hoping others who read the Southern Churchman will be moved to send money for the little ones, I am, etc."

There have been quite a numberr of enquiries about "fresh air funds" and how to send money for them.

In Washington the Associated Charities is conducting this work as a part of their activities, so that contributions may be addressed to them and marked, "For the Fresh Air Fund."

In Richmond, Va., Camp Harrison is under the supervision and management of the Instructive Visiting Nurses' Association. The camp is situated in Louisa County, on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, about an hour's ride from the city. Contributions should be sent to Miss Jessie Hazard, 16 West Franklin Street, Richmond, Va.

We regret that we cannot give the addresses of other organizations of this nature in our large Southern cities, but the Associated Charities are usually in touch with such activities in their cities and are glad to see that sums sent them marked "for fresh air camps" are properly forwarded.

KEEP AT IT TILL WE GET IT.

Sometimes it requires the unintentional remark of a prominent man to bring out the true folly of a situation.

When Prersident Harding told the graduating class at the Naval Academy in Annapolis that he hoped they would never be called upon to draw a sword or fire a gun, it did not sound ridiculous, although if analyzed a little it has all the elements of the most foolish of situations.

The class of young men to whom the President was speaking had spent four strenuous years in learning how to draw swords in the most scientific and deadly manner possible. President Harding is commander of the Army and Navy of the United States by virtue of his office as President, and as their chief and the head of their profession he told them that he hoped they would never have an opportunity of using the knowledge and careful preparation that they had given four years of their lives to acquire.

Of course we all heartily concur in the wish of Prersident Harding, but look at the folly of it. What would be the public comment if the Chief Justice of the United States or the Attorney General were to say, in addressing a graduating law class, "I hope you will never be called upon to write a brief or to argue a case in court"? Or suppose that the president of the American Medical Association were to say to a group of young men receiving their diplomas from some great medical school, "I hope you will never be called upon to write a prescription or to perform an operation."

The ludicrousness of such a situation would immediately apeal to us, and we would realize the importance of taking some steps to stop the use of time and money for training young men to do something that everybody hopes they will never have to do.

The adoption of a disarmament resolution in the House of Representatives by a vote of 330 to 4 shows the way that the lower house of Congress feels on this subject. It is only necessary for Christian people throughout the world to keep the idea of world peace ever in their prayers and hearts in order to bring it to pass.

AN INNOVATION.

According to the Manufacturers' Record of April 28, 1921, the Clayton Cotton Mill Company made an innovation in the usual routine method of conducting its business by deciding to open its annual meeting with prayer.

It would certainly be well for us to mix religion and business more than we do, purifying the one and making the other more efficient and far-reaching through the application of up-to-date methods.

The Charlotte Observer quoted the prayer that was made upon this occasion, as follows:

"Our heavenly Father, these men have gathered here to transact their temporal affairs, in which Thou art ever concerned, for Thou Thyself hast ordained industrial pursuits. In the beginning Thou didst charge the first man to till the ground. On Sinai Thou didst command men to work six days in the week. The wise man, moved by inspiration, said, 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.' Thy beloved Son taught us to trade and get gain with our pounds and talents, and to use the banks when we cannot stand alone. He was Himself a carpenter, a man of the shops, producing plows and yokes to make the fields white unto harvest. Our Lord also taught us that in Thy gracious Providence business will continue to the end, and when it comes, two shall be grinding at the mill.

"Thus it is Thy will for the world's welfare to circle around mills, factories, shops and plows. When business languishes, mankind suffers, children starve and famine and pestilence follow. We pray Thee, then, that the dark cloud which rests on industry may pass away, and that a brighter day may dawn, whose sunshine may gladden the hearts of men, for prosperity in the mill seems to be Thy way to provide not a few of Thy creatures with medicine, food, raiment and shelter.

"We pray Thy rich blessing on the president and other officers of the plant, the directors and stockholders. Grant them Divine guidance and wisdom so to perform their duties as to secure the largest rewards. We would especially invoke Thy grace upon all employees. We bless Thee for the kindly feelings and fair dealings existing between the plant and its employees, thus preventing discontent, strike and riot. May this happy state be unbroken in the future as in the past.

"Now, be pleased, O Lord, to accept our gratitude for the many signal successes of the years gone by, which have made the mill a benefactor to the community and a power for helping the whole country to bear the burdens of humanity.

"Forgive our sins, correct our mistakes, forget our failures and help us to develop our best energies to advancing the cause of our Master. In Jesus' name. Amen."

The foregoing is interesting for two reasons: First, its compilation of Bible references to the necessity of work, and its lack of a request for a divine guidance to bring a more Christian spirit into industry.

Church Intelligence

Dr. LaMothe Consecrated Bishop in Baltimore.

The Rev. John D. LaMothe, D. D., was consecrated Bishop for the Missionary District of Honolulu, St. Peter's Day, June 29, in Ascension Church, Baltimore, where he had been rector for five years. Bishop Tuttle, Presiding Bishop, was chief consecrator. The co-consecrators were the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., Bishop of Maryland; the Rt. Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia; the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of Southwestern Virginia, and the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, presented the candidate. The attending presbyters were the Rev. Dr. Edward T. Helfenstein, Archdeacon of Maryland, and the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame, associate rector of Memorial Church. Rev. Dr. Benjamin B. Lovett, rector of St. Andrew's Church, was master of ceremonies, and had as his assistant the Rev. W. O. Smith, Jr., rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Ruxton. The Rev. Dr. Romilly F. Humphries, Archdeacon of Baltimore, acted as deputy registrar. Other Bishops assisting in the laying on of hands were the Rt. Rev. George H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop of Texas; the Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop of Easton; also Bishop Jett and Bishop Arthur C. Thomson, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Southern Virginia. Between forty and fifty clergy were present in their robes.

Bishop Thomson, Coadjutor of Southern Virginia, preached the sermon from the text, tenth and eleventh verses of second Timothy, "Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel: Whereunto I am appointed a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles." He said in part: The glory of the Church must ever be the message which it is commissioned to deliver, that Jesus Christ hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. The proclamation of that transforming gospel is the Church's paramount obligation. The whole organization of the Church, its order, its doctrine, its discipline, even its worship, are means to this supreme end. It is the first duty of the Church's ministers to make known Him Who hath brought life and immortality to light as the supreme figure of history, and as the revealer of a truth, transcending all other truths, but always and chiefly as the living Person Whose presence is both power and peace in human life today. It was this message which the newly consecrated Bishop was to proclaim in the field to which he was to be sent. Difficult and trying situations were doubtless ahead, but in all of them the Bishop was to bear ever in mind the promise of His Master, "I am to be with you always, even unto the end of the world."

A beautiful pectoral cross was given to the Bishop by his former congregation, St. Paul's Church, New Orleans. Members of his present congregation gave him an Episcopal ring. Bishop LaMothe expects to leave shortly for his new field. R. F. H.

Memorial to Archdeacon Stuck.

The late Hudson Stuck, Archdeacon of the Yukon, was a devoted alumnus of the University of the South at Sewanee. A movement has been started to provide an appropriate memorial for him, in the form of a scholarship at Sewanee, for the education of men for the mission field, preferably in Alaska.

This plan was proposed by the Rev. Robert G. Tatum, a devoted personal friend of Archdeacon Tuck's, and his companion in the memorable ascent of Mount Denali. Mr. Tatum was sent by Archdeacon Stuck to prepare for the work of the Church's ministry in Alaska, where he had hoped to be the Archdeacon's companion and helper. He has completed his university studies, and returns immediately to Alaska. The plan proposed by Mr. Tatum has met the hearty approval on the part of many, and it is endorsed by the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., President of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

The sum required for this scholarship is estimated at $10,000. Contributions of any amount are asked from persons interested in securing men for the Church's missionary work, who are willing to perpetuate in this way a part of the influence and service of one of the Church's missionary heroes.

Contributions may be sent to the Treasurer of the Presiding Bishop and Council, at the Church Missions House, No. 281 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y., marked "For the Archdeacon Hudson Stuck Memorial at Sewanee."

I heartily endorse this appeal by Mr. Tatum, and beg that the Southern Churchman will make mention of it.

Thomas F. Gailor.

June 25, 1921.

The Americanization Conference of the Foreign-Born Americans' Division in Milwaukee.

Immediately following the conference in Milwaukee of the Social Service Department, the Foreign-born Americans' Division of the Department of Missions, organized to discuss various phases of work among immigrants. The meetings were held at Milwaukee-Downer College, June 23-27, and supplemented the program of the National Conference of Social Work. An effort was successfully made to make this a conference of those interested rather than a series of reports and addresses. A very general discussion leading to definite resolutions was the result.

The program put forth by the division advocating fellowship between American-born and foreign-born as the normal method of Americanization and as the primary object of the division was fully discussed. It was generally agreed that while in many cases the racial mission was necessary, at the same time any work that recognized racial segregation was an admission of past failure. Encouraging reports were given from parishes in which the members have undertaken to put into practice the division's slogan, "For every communicant a foreign-born friend." Valuable contributions were made by Bishops Brent and Shayler.

Consideration of our duty to the emigrant from the British Isles, led by the Rev. Hugh David Jones, missionary to the Welsh, and the Rev. W. McL. Goldie, of Connecticut, former port chaplain at Halifax, revealed a loss to the Church of several hundred thousand former communicants of the Church of England, of whom no account has been given. It was the common opinion that future losses would be much less if proper co-operation with the Immigration Society of Great Britain could be established. The congested condition and necessary restrictions at Ellis Island make a religious census of incoming vessels impossible. Plans for fuller and more effective co-operation with the chaplains at the ports of embarkation were advanced and the following resolution offered:

Whereas, this conference has learned with interest and thankfulness of the efforts made by the City Missionary Societies at the several ports or entry, and

Whereas, the scope of this work is national; be it

Resolved, that we request the Presiding Bishop and Council, through the Foreign-born Americans' Division, to provide such assistance and material co-operation as may be necessary to place Church work among immigrants at the several ports of entry on a substantial basis; and be it

Resolved, that they take such action as will procure co-operation of other branches of the Anglican Communion.

The lack of consideration for the special needs of the foreign-born in hospitals outside the larger cities was deplored. The service of interpreters are needed to explain to patients the nature of their illnesses and remove unnecessary terror. The absence of hospitals for the Mexicans along the southern border is a reproach to the Christian Churches of America. The need for devotional literature in foreign languages was earnestly stressed by heads of City Missionary Societies.

The consideration of the imperative general need for literature in foreign languages followed. Many of the older immigrants read English with great difficulty, and have recourse to the foreign language press for information. In some cases this necessity is used as a means of propaganda for subversive ideas. In this connection the following resolution was offered:

Be it resolved, that the Foreign-born Americans' Division notify the various City Mission executives of plans looking forward to the translation of the services of the Church and of books of devotion in various languages that they might co-operate in their use; and be it

Resolved, that the executives be asked to co-operate in securing for people of foreign speech in hospitals and other Church institutions proper interpreters during their stay in such institutions.

The plight of the immigrant when he tries to adjust himself to the laws of a land the extent to which he is victimized by various exploiters excites much interest. The immigrant is ignorant of the opportunities for aid offered by the Legal Aid Societies and such organizations as the Commission on Immigration and Housing of the State of California. To meet the need thus presented, the following resolution was offered:

Be it resolved, that in view of the ignorance of the foreign-born of their legal rights in America and of the nature of the police regulations, that the Secretary for Foreign-born Americans be requested to tabulate the agencies offering aid to immigrants and of individuals willing to do likewise, and that upon the request he assist the City Missionary Societies and other agencies in procuring notices in various languages informing the foreign-born of the opportunity for securing such advice and aid.

A committee was appointed to draw up resolutions on the education of workers, both of native and foreign extraction, to carry on the extensive work which now confronts the Church. It was the sense of the meeting that provision should be made in the seminaries for thorough training of every outgoing student and for special training of workers among the foreign-born.

Many of those in attendance remained over for the general studies under the auspices of the National Conference of Social Work.

Peninsula Summer School.

The Peninsula Summer School of the Third Province, for clergy and Church school teacher smet at Ocean City, Md. (Diocese of Easton), June 20 to 26, inclusive.

The program of lectures was opened each day with a celebration of the Holy Communion in the arish church,p St. Paul's-by-the-Sea, the various clergy in attendance officiating.

Every one was deeply impressed by the hearty cordiiality, enthusiasm and earnestness which prevailed among those present. The sessions of the school met each day in the class rooms of the Ocean City High School through the courtesy of the Rev. Edmund Burk. Ph. D., rector of the local parish and principal of the school.

The courses given werer as follows: Miss Helen I. Jennings on "The Pupil," Text Book-Weigle; the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, of Hyattsviille, Md., "Principles of Teaching"; the Rev. Frederick E. Seymour, of Philadelphia, Pa., "Methods and Management"; the Rev. George F. Taylor, principal of the New York Church Normal School, "Materials," C. N. S.; Mr. Robert Mathews, of Easton, Md., "Church Histoory"; Mrs. A. E. Clay, of Philadelphia, Pa., "Beginners," and Miss Evelyn Harrison, Educational Secretary Board of Religious Education, Diocese of Long Island, "Primary." The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, spoke each day on "The Devotional Element in Religious Education." The Rev. Edgar Jones, formerly rector of a parish in Newfoundland, now oof the Diocese of Delaware, gave an inspiring talk on "Labrador."

The afternoons were given over to recreation: bathing, boating and other forms of amusement. One evening a special moving picture entertainment was given for the members of the school, and on another, a pageant, written by the Rev. Edmund Burk, Ph. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Ocean City Md., was presented in the church by members of St. Andrew's Church School, Wilmington, Del.

The school closed on Sunday with enthusiastic services conducted by the dean, the Rev. T. G. Hill, assisted by the Revs. P. L. Donaghay and others of the clergy. The preache rat the morning service was the Rt. Reev. George W. Davenport, S. T. B., Bishop of Easton, and at the evening service, the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware.

The following were elected officers of the school:

The Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, S. T. D., Bishop of Easton; the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook ,D. D., Bishop of Delaware; the Rev. Thomas Getz Hill, President, Smyrna, Del.; the Rev. William C. Marshall, Jr., Vice-President, Centreville Md.; the Rev. Percy Lowry Donaghay, Secretary, Middletown, Del.; Mr. Dudley G. Roe, Treasurer, Sudlersville, Md.

Course on Parochial Missioons at Sewanee Summer School.

The special course of instruction for clergymen on conducting Parochial Missions, to be held at the Summer Training School for Workers, Sewanee, Tenn., August 9-22, will be the first course of its kind ever undertaken, and has been arranged in accordance with resolutions passed by the Presiding Bishop and Council. The Rev. W. J. Loaring Clark, rector of St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., is in charge, and will be glad to furnish further information to those who desire to attend the Summer School.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop
Rt Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan

Death of the Rev. J. B. Harding.

The Rev. John B. Harding, rector of St. Mark's Church, Frankford, died June 27 of heart disease.

Mr. Harding was seventy years old and was born in Montreal, Can. After graduating from Philips Exeter Academy he entered Harvard University, from which he was graduated in 1878.

He was rector of St. Mark's twenty-eight years and came to St. Mark's from Baltimore, where he was rector of the Church of Our Saviour for eight years.

A notable achievement at St. Mark's was the erection of a beautiful church and parish house. The church property is considered one of the finest in the Diocese.

Mr. Harding took a prominent part in public affairs in Frankford, and was head of the Frankford branch of the Red Cross during the war and president of its auxiliary.

He was a deputy to the last five General Conventions, a trustee of the Diocese, a manager of the Episcopal Hospital, and a member of the Church Building Commission.

The funeral service was held in St. Mark's Church Wednesday afternoon and the body was taken to Frederick, Md., for burial.

Vacation Bible Schools Open.

Bible schools were opened Wednesday, June 28, all through the city of Philadelphia and in many nearby towns, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Daily Vacation Bible School Association

Nearly four hundred of the teachers who are taking part in the instruction attended a two-day teachers' training conference Monday and Tuesday in the First Baptist Church. The Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, president of the Association, delivered the address of welcome.

Last year the Association operated one hundred and nine schools with four hundred and sixty-two teachers, 18,420 children, representing thirty-nine nationalities. Eleven denominations and twelve colleges co-operated in the work. This year one hundred and twenty schools were opened with nearly five hundred teachers.

The theory of the Vacation Bible School is that the regular sessions of the Sunday school allow only a half hour a week for Bible study. The summer school, extending over four or five weeks, five days a week, gives an effective addition of many hours, and coming after the close of the public school permits a concentration of time and attention on the part of the pupil.

A bequest of $5,000 to the Church of St. Matthias, Philadelphia, was made in the will of Sabra G. Rouse, who died June 20 at his home in Philadelphia.

The Rev. J. Ogle Warfield, vicar of Holy Trinity Memorial Chapel, was the preacher at the Odd Fellows' Orphanage, Philadelphia, Sunday, June 26. Prizes were distributed to the children for the best averages attained during the past school year.

The Rev. Llewellyn N. Caley, D. D., rector of St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane, preached at the open-air service Sunday afternoon on the site of the proposed Cathedral at Twenty-first Street and the Parkway. His subject was, "Indications of God's Handiwork in Nature." R. R. W.

NORTH CAROLINA

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

St. James', Iredell County.

"Home Coming and Children's Day exercises" were held by St. James' Church, Iredell County, Wednesday, June 22, when an interesting program was carried out by the children of the Sunday school. Mr. J. T. Hagler, superintendent of the Sunday school, presided, and the Rev. William J. Wright, of Statesville, rector in charge of St. James', read the service and delivered a brief address. After a bountiful dinner, which was served on a long table in the beautiful grove of trees in the church yard, and a social hour, Mr. Wright made an inspiring address to the Sunday school, encouraging and urging them to still larger and better things. The closing address was made by Archdeacon Hardin, of Salisbury, who held the close attention of the congregation for forty-five minutes in a talk full of practical religion and common sense.

Since taking charge of St. James' Church two years ago, Mr. Wright has done splendid work, both in the church and the Sunday school, and great things are hoped for in the future.

St. James' is one of the oldest congregations in Iredell County, and probably in this section. The beginning of the services dates back to the year 1800, when services were held in the Mills settlement near where St. James was located, by the Rev. Johnston Miller, who was at that time an ordained Lutheran minister, but who was in 1821 ordained by Bishop Moore as stated in the old record, he having only Lutheran ordination before that. Services were held in the homes in the Mills settlement by different Episcopal clergymen, and the congregation was called the Mills congregation.

The Rev. George B. Wetmore was ordained in Christ Church, Raleigh, early in 1855, and took charge of the congregation on February 17 of the same year, and on February 26, 1856, a parish was organized under the name of St. James.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg.

Sunday, June 26, throughout the day of three services, was emphasized as Parish Religious Educational Day. At 8 A. M. a largely attended corporate Holy Communion was celebrated. At the 11 A. M. service, before a well filled church, the rector, the Rev. William Porkess, preached a striking sermon on "The Significance of Training." In the evening, in the place of the Evening Prayer service, the graduating exercises of the Sunday school were held, when nineteen honor prizes and ninety-two diplomas were distributed. This school is laid out in five divisions, consisting of nineteen classes in all, and the curriculum intalled is the Christian Nurture Series in full, Courses 1-13. A system of credits has been carried out for all pupils, and quarterly reports sent to all homes. A thorough plan has also been effected for the teachers, there being a monthly corporate Holy Communion on Sundays and a monthly teacher training class on Monday evenings. The school has just closed its most remarkable year, for pupils and teachers alike.

J. C.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Brown and family have gone to Winchester, where they will spend the summer months.

St. Stephen's, Culpeper (the Rev. K. J. Hammond, D. D., rector): Fairfax Commandery, No. 25, Knights Templar, met here for worship with the congregation, visiting Masons and ladies. The Virginia Masonic Quartette, who took part with the church choir in the service, also sang several hymns alone.

The Rev. Thomas W. Hooper, Sir Knight, under special license from the Bishop, preached from the text, Isa. 42:1 an excellent sermon on the wonderful service o fthe Messiah, as described in vs. 2, 3 and 4.

New Organ for Christ Church, Alexandria: Work of installing the handsome new orogan in Christ Church was completed last week, and it was used for the first time Sunday, July 3. The organ, costing $10,000, is over three times as large as the one taken out, and is in perfect harmony with the Colonial style of this historic old church.

Death of Mrs. Hoxton: Mrs. Fannie Robinson Hoxton, eighty years old, widow of Colonel Llewellyn Hoxton and mother of Mr. Archibald Hoxton, of the Episcopal High School, and a sister of the late Bishop Randolph, died at her residence at the High School last week. Funeral services were conducted by the Rev. Robert B. Nelson, and the burial was in Ivy Hill Cemetery. Mrs. Hoxton was well known on Seminary Hill, where she enjoyed a wide circle of friends. She is survived by a daughter and three sons, Mrs. George Stuart, of the Episcopal High School; W. W. Hoxton, of North Rosemont; Archibald Robinson Hoxton, of the Episcopal High School, and Llewellyn G. Hoxton, of the University of Virginia.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Luther G. H. Williams, of Indianola, Miss., having accepted a call to St. Thomas' Church, Abingdon, has entered upon the duties of his new charge.

The Rev. Wilfred Roach, of Marshall, has taken charge of Christ Church, Martinsville, to which he was recently called.

The Rev. Paul Huntington, of the Cathedral of St. Paul, Boston, Mass., is considering a call to missionary work in the Archdeaconry with residence at Norton.

The Bishop is now engaged in making his annual visitations in the Archdeeaconry.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Memorial Service for Colonel Galbraith.

In Trinity Church military men in great numbers gathered to honor the memory of the late Colonel Frederick W. Galbraith, of the American Legion. Representatives of the Church, of the army, of the navy and of civilian life were present. The service was in part that for burial of the dead, and the Rev. Dr. J. P. McComas, of St. Paul's Chapel, read the familiar lesson from St. Paul's letter. Bishop Manning gave the address, and in it sounded a high note of Americanism.

"The death of Frederick W. Galbraith," said Bishop Manning, "is a loss not only to the American Legion, but to the nation. It seems to us that we could not spare him. We need today men of truth and loyalty, men who put right before peace and principle before safety, men of clear mind as well as large heart, men whose course is guided by reason and judgment as well as by feeling, and Colonel Galbraith was such a man." C.

Daily Vacation Bible School.

The Rev. Charles B. Ackley, pastor of St. Mary's, Manhattanville, has completed arrangements for a Daily Vacation Bible School, which opens July 5 and continues to August 5. Children from five to twelve years of age are admitted. They will receive instruction in the Bible, in music and in handwork for both boys and girls. The Board of the Sheltering Arms, whose grounds adjoin those of the parish, have very kindly opened them for the use of the school every afternoon. Here the children will be under the direction of a trained play leader.

LOUISIANA

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

News Items From Trinity Parish, New Orleans.

The rector, the Rev. Robert S. Coupland, attended the consecration of the Rev. John D. LaMothe. Dr. Coupland and Dr. LaMothe have been friends for many years. They were classmates at the Virginia Seminary, and at one time both were rectors of churches in New Orleans, Dr. Coupland at Trinity and Dr. LaMothe at St. Paul's. A few years ago Dr. LaMothe was called to the Church of the Ascension in Baltimore, where Dr. Coupland had been rector for ten years.

The entire exterior of Trinity is being cemented, and the interior is being tinted, at a total cost of about $10,000.

Dr. Coupland has instituted the rather novel plan of omitting the sermon on the first Sunday of the month in order to shorten the service, and the unusually large attendance for the last two months shows the approval of the members of the parish.

The services at Trinity during July will be conducted by the Rev. Charles A. D'Arcy, who was at one time in charge of St. Andrew's Church, New York, and about a year ago came to New Orleans and has been serving as Superintendent of the Boys' Home.

This institution was founded nearly one hundred years ago, the building being on St. Charles Avenue, in what is now the heart of the residential section. The Board in charge of the Home purchased property elsewhere covering four city squares, and the new building is being erected and will be ready for occupancy September 1. In the meantime Mr. D'Arcy and the boys are temporarily located at Pass Christian. The new institution will take care of Protestant baby orphan boys. Heretofore these little ones have been sent either to a similar institution or to a Roman Catholic institution. This enlargement of the work of the Home is made possible through the very generous contribution of Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Burton, in memory of their son, Walter Burton. It is understood the amount they have contributed will approximate $175,000.

W. K.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Clericus.

The Dallas Clericus, embracing all the clergy of the Diocese, departed from its rule of meeting in the See City early in June, when Bishop Moore and an exceptionally large number of the clergy held their last meeting of the season at St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth, as guests of the rector, the Rev. E. H. Eckel. The regular program, comprising Holy Communion and an address, in this case by Bishop Moore, and ad clerum conferences, was followed. An impromptu feature of the latter was a discussion of the social immorality of young people, and it was decided to publish a memorandum on the subject in the newspapers of the State and to advise parents to instruct their children in morals.

A luncheon served by one of the parish guilds was followed by a visit to the roof of the new twenty-four F. & M. Bank Building, the tallest structure in Texas, whence a magnificent view of the city and surrounding country for many miles was had. After adjournment at 3:30 the clergy were motored to Lake Worth, nine miles from the city, where bathing, a fish dinner, a launch trip, and an all-night stay in the cottages of parishioners were the features of the entertainment.

The acoustics of St. Andrew's Church, notoriously bad ever since the opening of the new church nine years ago, have been successfully corrected recently at a cost of about $3,500 by the "Sabine process"—an application of principles formulated by the late Professor Sabine, of Harvard University.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Philip A. Dales has been appointed assistant to the Rev. George F. Dudley, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, and will assume his new duties September 1. Mr. Dales is a native of Washington and graduate of the Virginia Theological Seminary. He has recently been in charge of the chapel at Mt. Ranier as assistant to the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, rector of Pinkney Memorial Church, Hyattsville.

The Rev. Thomas F. Shoesmith, vicar of All Saints' Chapel, Leighton, Pa., will have charge of the services at St. Mark's Church during July. The Rev. Horace W. Stowell, rector of St. John's Church, East Mauch Chunk, Pa., will be the clergyman in charge during August. The rector, the Rev. C. R. Stetson, will take his vacation during these months, returning to his charge September 1.

The Rev. Thom Williamson, Jr., rector of the Church of the Advent, and Mrs. Williamson have moved into their new rectory, 149 U Street, Northwest. A continuation of the activities of some of the organizations during the summer months will be a new policy of the parish instituted since Mr. Williamson took charge of the work there.

The preacher at the open air service, Mt. St. Alban, on Sunday, July 3, was Canon Russell, of the Washington Cathedral. This service was the people's annual patriotic service in celebration of Independence Day.

The Rev. George F. Dudley, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, will be the clerical supply during the month of July at All Angels' Memorial Chapel, Twilight Park, Haines Falls, N. Y. During August this position will be filled by the Rev. J. W. Austin, rector of All Saints' Church, Chevy Chase. All Angels' Chapel is a memorial to the late Bishop Satterlee, first Bishop of Washington, and for this reason the summer clerical supply is drawn from the Washington clergy as far as possible every year.

An important meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council will be held on July 15 at the Washington Cathedral, Mt. St. Alban.

M. M. W.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Improvements in Christ Church, Savannah.

Extensive alterations in the basement of Christ Church, Savannah (the Rev. John D. Wing, D. D., rector), were begun July 1 so as to provide greater facilities for the Church school, which has closed for the summer. The basement will be converted into individual class rooms, and new wiring and a modern ventilating system will be installed. The ventilating system will provide a constsant current of pure air in all of the class rooms. There will also be a chapel. The improvements will cost a considerable sum, and the $1,500 contributed by the Parish Aid Soociety at Easter from proceeds from the Colonial Lunch Room will be devoted to this cause.

E. D. J.

KANSAS

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Richard Allen Hatch, rector of Grace Church, Ottawa, and St. Barnabas, Williamsburg, who resigned recently, is leaving for St. Louis, where he will take a much needed rest at his old home in the suburbs of that city. Since taking charge of these parishes his success in the work has been marked. The church attendance at both places has increased 200 per cent., and the Sunday schools have doubled in roster and attendance. Mr. Hatch, who is chaplain of Warren Black Post, American Legion, served for fourteen months with the A. E. F. in France.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Christ Church, Danville, Observes Fortieth Anniversary.

The fortieth anniversary of the laying of the cornerstone of Christ Church, Danville, was observed on June 23 and 24. The service on the evening of the 23d was notable in that the Chief Burgess and other public officials, members of the Borough Council, and the Ministerial Association were present. The Rev. R. R. Morgan read the Evening Prayer, and Rev. W. E. Kunkel, who was for a time locum tenens at Christ Church, preached from the words, "He must increase, but I must decrease." A choir of forty voices rendered the musical part of the service. After the service a reception was held in the parish house and refreshments were served by the Woman's Guild of the parish.

On the 24th services were held at 6 and 10:45 A. M. Clergy present and taking part in the services were the rector, the Rev. Floyd Appleton, Ph. D.; the Rev. C. N. Tyndell, S. T. D., and the Rev. Messrs. H. D. Schmaus, R. R. Morgan, D. W. Gateson, Archdeacon Lascelle, and Executive Secretary Judd. Conferences were held at which the Nation-Wide Campaign and the Publicity Program were discussed. Christ Church, Danville, is one of the finest church buildings in the Diocese, and the parish, under the leadership of Rev. Dr. Appleton, who only recently accepted the rectorship, bids fair to take a prominent place in the affairs of the Diocese.

L. F. B.

ARKANSAS.

Rt. Rev. Jas. R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. W. Saphore, L. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. E. T. Demby, D. D., Suffragan.

A New Easter Offering Plan.

When the time approached for the usual distribution of mite boxes this year, the faculty of St. Paul's Church School, Fayetteville, Ark., decided to vary the method of obtaining the Easter Offering and adopted the suggestion of Mrs. Parker, the rector's wife, to make it an opportunity for "coordinated expressional activity" along with verbal instruction. Mrs. Parker, who is directress of the C. S. S. L. in the parish, was appointed to develop the plan, and in doing so she made extensive use of the C. S. S. L. throughout.

A large cross was prepared by the boys of the school. It was made of wall-board, and its surface was marked off into seven spaces, each labeled with the name of one country or more in which this Church carries on a mission. Under the name of the mission was inscribed the amount appropriated by the Church to that field, and the amount the schoool was expected to raise for it on a certain Sunday. This amount was proportioned after the greater one.

On Quinquagesima the superintendent announced that the best picture illustrating the work in each country brought in on the corresponding Sunday by a pupil would be affixed to the space on the cross reserved for that country. Each class was to vote first on the pictures brought in by its own members, then the ones chosen as best by the classes would be gone over by the superintendent and the best one of those chosen by him. There was some excitement each Sunday as the choice was announced and the picture put in place.

Each Sunday the amount wanted for the next "mission" was announced. The first two Sundays the offerings fell slightly below the mark. A deficit was declared to exist, and it was explained that the missionaries in those fields would suffer some deprivation because of it. All the rest of the Sundays, including Easter, a day of violent weather, saw the amount go far past the quota for the day. The total was more than twice that of any former year.

Every Sunday save one, when a missionary story was told) five or six minutes was allowed before closing exercises for presentation of a very brief tableau representing some phase of the Church's work in the field under consideration that day. The subjects of these tableaux were chosen, from a number suggested, by the pupils who were to pose them, and it was so arranged that at one time or another every child in the school, even the youngest, took part, sometimes with surprisingly realistic effect, always with enthusiasm.

On account of extremely inclement weather the Easter exercises of St. Paul's Church School had to be postponed. On Low Sunday, accordingly, the entire school participated in a morality play entitled, "Souls and Bodies," written expressly for the occasion by Mr. and Mrs. Parker and directed by Mrs. Parker. In this morality play the missionary teaching of the entire Lenten season was gathered up, and in the course of it the Easter Offering of the school was presented.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Notable Work of the Rev. Jno. Roberts.

The retirement of the Rev. John Roberts, after thirty-eight years of service to the Indians of Wyoming, removes from the list of active workers in the district the senior priest and one of the most beloved characters of Church history in Wyoming. It is a cause for utmost congratulation that Mr. Roberts remains on the Wind River Reservation, where his remarkable influence and deep affection will ever surround the people to whom his life has been given.

In February, 1883, Mr. Roberts was sent by Bishop J. F. Spaulding to minister to the Arapahoes and Shoshones on the Wind River Reservation. In addition to his labors among the Indians of two tribes, he established the Government Boarding School, which he superintended for many years, and organized missions and built churches at Fort Washakie, the Shoshone Agency, Wind River, Lander, Milford, Hudson, Riverton, Shoshone, Thermopolis and Dubois. In 1890 Mr. Roberts took charge of the Shoshone Mission School. This school was built by Bishop Talbot on land given to Mr. Roberts by the noted Chief Washakie, of the Shoshones. The school has been Mr. Roberts' particular charge, ministering each year to about fifteen Shoshone girls, and through them to their families and their tribe. In 1902 he relinquished his work among the Arapahoes, after directing the translation of the gospel according to St. Luke into Arapahoe, which work was published in 1903 by the American Bible Society.

Mrs. Roberts, a most lovable English character, has been a wonderful help to her husband in his labors for his adopted people, and their daughters are carrying on the notable work begun by them.

St. Michael's Mission held its fourth annual Visitors' Day on May 25 in connection with the official visitation of the Bishop of the district. The event is unique and of great interest. The program of the day included the celebration of the Holy Communion, the hearing of the Catechism, Morning Prayer and confirmation of fourteen candidates, and an address by Bishop Thomas. This was followed by drills given by the boys and by the girls, and an inspection of the school and buildings, and of the work done by the Indian children during the school year. Coffee was served by the mission to

(Continued on page 22)

Family Department

JULY.

1. Friday.
3. Sixth Sunday after Trinity.
10. Seventh Sunday after Trinity.
17. Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Ninth Sunday after Trinity.
25. Monday. St. James.
31. Tenth Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Seventh Sunday After Trinity.

Lord of all Power and Might, Who art the Author and Giver of all good things; graft in our hearts the love of Thy Name, increase in us true religion, nourish us with all goodness, and of Thy great mercy keep us in the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Immortal.

I do not think we ever lose the precious hours
That earth has given our hearts
To treasure and to hold.
They wing their way to Realms of Light and live,
After our mortal form is clay and cold.

And when our souls ascending to the Bright Beyond
Stand one and all at last
Before the Great White Throne,
'Tis through these precious hours, so intimate,
That we may recognize and claim our own.

Joys that we knew, together here, pain
Tears that perhaps were shed
At parting of our ways;
Hope that we shared and fears that Faith has stilled,
Songs that have filled the twilight of our days.

Friendship that gave its wondrous breadth and light,
Love that inspired
Our strength and tenderness,
Soul of those dear earth hours we have known,
They will be there to welcome and to bless.

—Kate Lewis McLauchlan.

Men Are Waking Up.

The men of the Church are waking up in a wonderful way. The vast majority of them have failed to realize the wonderful privilege, the great pleasure, the tremendous responsibility of church membership. This has been largely true whether they were officers or not.

There have been some of the men in many of the churches who have been faithful, earnest and active, but it is generally admitted that they have been in the minority. Many elders have thought that, when they attended the meetings of the session and distributed the elements of the communion, they had done their full duty. So many deacons have felt that their duty lay in taking up the collection in the church and turning it over to one of their number, who had been chosen treasurer of the church.

The rest of the men have felt, when they contributed something to the support of the church and attended the services with more or less regularity, there was nothing more to be expected of them.

The result of this state of mind has been that very few men in the Church have ever really done any work for God that is worth counting, and the Church has suffered greatly and has lagged far behind, when it ought to have been forging to the front.

But the men are seeing a new vision. The light of heaven is shining into their hearts and they are catching glimpses of what they have never seen before. They are looking upon salvation and church membership as not merely life insurance for the soul. They are seeing that there is a great responsibility resting upon them to do something for the Saviour, who has done so much for them, and something for their fellowmen, who need their help so greatly.

And more than that, they are seeing that this service is not merely a duty, but it is a great privilege and the source of great soul joy and satisfaction, such as they have never found anywhere else.

The men of the Church are finding that the work of the Church must not be left to the women with a few men helping them. They see that it is indeed "a man's job." It is a job that calls for the exercise of all the good talents that can be found in any man, no matter how able he is, or in all the men of the Church combined.

Men all over the Church are considering the subject of their duty to God and to the Church and to their fellowmen. They are, as individuals, taking hold of many kinds of work that they have neglected in the past. They are organizing in congregations and in Presbyteries that they may unitedly do greater work.

The growth of men's Bible classes shows how the men are trying to learn God's will as revealed in the Scriptures. Men are finding the joy of personal work. The number of men who are willing to conduct religious services in the churches or elsewhere has increased greatly, and they are doing this work in a way that neither they nor the Church would have believed possible a few years ago.

The number of those who are laboring for the salvation of souls through their own special work is increasing, and every one who is doing this work is experiencing a satisfaction and a joy that he had never known before.

Many of the busiest men in the country are taking time from their business to engage in the Lord's work. They are finding that time taken for this purpose is not lost to business, and that it brings to them inestimable pleasure, and they find that they are growing in their spiritual life.

The series of great laymen's conventions that are being held just now, and the meeting together of the men of a particular church, all have a tendency to inspire and enthuse the men and to fit them for service, for life and for the enjoyment of the thrills that come from winning souls for Christ.

Men who have not engaged in definite work for the Master can have no conception of what it means. All that we can say to them is, Try it.—Presbyterian of the South.

"Overs and Overs."

As Maidie followed her sister up to the sewing room her small feet were fairly dancing with excitement.

"O Ellen, are you going to begin my new dresses this afternoon? Will you do the pink one first? Please do the pink one, Ellen. You know I like that best."

Ellen drew the cover from the pile of work cut out and ready for basting. Such a pile of work! The pink gingham and the blue one, skirts for middies, Claire's green voile and blue silk and white Swiss. Ellen felt as if she could get through things fairly well if it were not for the endless sewing piled before her, mountain high, twice a year. If she could only get it all done and out of the way just once! And Maidie was dancing about as if it were the greatest treat in the world!

"There'll be pieces, won't there, Ellen, and I may make Rosie May a dress? Oh, I do love new dresses!"

"You wouldn't love them if you had to make them, over and over forever! Maidie, if you don't let things alone I won't touch the pink dress."

Ellen did not mean to be sharp, but she was tired.

Maidie looked up, with her mouth quivering.

"Does God get tired, too, making flowers and things?" she asked.

"I'm going to measure the length," Ellen replied sternly, "and then you're to go outdoors and play and not come into the house until I call you."

Maidie stood painfully still while the length was being measured. Then she went softly out of the room. There were tears in her eyes, but she tried bravely to wink them back.

Ellen, alone in the sewing room, was trying not to remember the small, grieved face. She was doing all that she could do, taking care of the family. Flowers! If only she could set some law going that would make new clothes every spring and fall! She would not get tired then. It was the doing things over and over endlessly and never getting them done. Days and nights and seedtimes and harvests did themselves

But how about people? How about people's selfishness and laziness and impatience? Did God never get tired of forgiving people over and over? Did He never get tired of giving them fresh days and having them spoil them?

Ellen's needle slipped from her fingers, and she sat very still in the bright little sewing room. Suddenly she dropped her work and went to the window. In the yard below was a grave little figure sitting listlessly in the swing.

"Maiden," Ellen called, "you may come up now. I've found a lovely piece that you may use to make Rosie May a dress."—Youth's Companion.

The Great Companion.

I don't know 'bout the new faiths that are risin' day by day;
I only know I'm walkin' in the sweet old-fashioned way!
The same old heavens above me—my title clear I see;
In the valley of the shadow He'll go along with me.

I don't know 'bout new gospels—new worlds that swim in light:
I know God sends the sunshine, an' lights the lamps of night;
An' if the darkness gathers, His smile my light shall be;
In the valley of the shadow He'll go along with me.

How sweet that thought forever; when clouds are in the skies,
To see the hills of heaven through the tears that dim the eyes!
The heaven of sweet child-faith is all I want to see
In the valley of the shadow, where He goes along with me.

—Frank L. Stanton.

On Being Disquieted.

In the case of personal worries, one of the surest remedies is to get beyond our private experience. What time I am afraid—afraid of my health, disturbed by the difficulty of making ends meet, worried by some unheroic trouble in my family, I had better start to help some one else. This is often one of the ways in which God reinforces our faith. He takes us out of ourselves. Instead of brooding over our private difficulties, we shall do well to apply ourselves to the task of visiting some one who needs to be cheered up, or of bringing aid to a fellow-creature in trouble. Keble once wrote to a friend in depression, "When you find yourself, as I dare say you sometimes do, overpowered as it were by melancholy, the best way is to go out and do something kind to somebody or other." A wise counsel. For in many cases our private worry is only to be overcome by standing back from it. To brood over it may sap our vitality. Whereas, if we set ourselves to forget it for a little, we come back with a stronger confidence in ourselves and a better sense of proportion. Our minds are clearer, our wills are keener, as we rise above it in the effort to remember others. Often it makes us ashamed of ourselves, when we see how other people are bearing trouble. Besides the very effort to communicate some hope and help to them stirs in us a new sense of the resources which God stores in the human soul. This may sound a rather round-about method of regaining faith. But those who have tried it know how real and instant is its work upon life. The truth is that many of our worries are aggravated by selfishness. They are much to us, and we get engrossed by them; we are driven in upon ourselves, till we see little or nothing but this difficulty and our own helplessness. We have hardly room even to see God. And it is as we deliberately give ourselves to an unselfish piece of service outside our private life that we receive a fresh sense of God living and working. If He can work through us on behalf of another, surely He can and will do something for us. This is the sort of logic of the situation. Why should I be cast down when I have seen elsewhere His power at work? Is it likely that His power will fail me, and me alone?—British Weekly.

Personality and Responsibility.

Chief among the marks of the spiritually awakened soul is the keener sense of personal responsibility. The sense of responsibility to the God of infinite holiness and justice lifts a decision high above the level of utility or public opinion or the desire of a majority of the group with which we are doing business. By accentuating the personal side of responsibility it lifts the whole transaction into the clear light of truth. Stripped of the temporary considerations imposed by the pressure of less scrupulous men and women who are associated with them, men and women dare to stand alone. That is the glory of a spiritual-minded man. He is no longer a time-server. His judgment is not warped by selfish motives or fear of running counter to public opinion. —Philippine Observer.

A Near East Romance.

In the days before the war a young Armenian man in a village in Asia Minor bade his sweetheart good-bye and sailed over the seas in the wake of the sun to win her a home and fortune in fabulous America.

America did not fail him, but circumstance did. Aranos Mooradian found a good job in Detroit, Mich. He lived thriftily; it seemed no time at all before money began to accumulate for the little home that he wished to prepare for his bride.

Then the war came and the Eastern world suffered its tremendous upheaval. All contacts across seas became difficult, and in Armenia—but all civilized people know the sad story of Armenia.

The little town that fostered the beginning of the romance was sacked. Three hundred of its five hundred inhabitants were killed. Little Lusia Chakalian saved herself only because she played 'possum among the gruesome company that heaped the streets of the village.

For three years Lusia, with the little band of villagers left after the massacre, wandered among the inhospitable mountains and over the burning desert until they reached Arabkir, losing half their number on the way. After another year they reached Mosul, where they lived a meagre existence for three years. Their privations in Mosul were so extreme that the little group was nearly wiped out entirely. Not a single member of Lusia's family remained and she had witnessed the sudden death and the silent falling by the wayside of every relative of her sweetheart, whom she now considered lost to her forever.

But eventually, with others, Lusia was taken by the English to Bagdad. Through suffering she had reached a place beyond hope. She did not dream that Bagdad was a turning point in her pitiful existence and that the future after all was going to fulfil its promise to her.

From Bagdad an Armenian leader forwarded Lusia's name to the Hairenik, an Armenian newspaper published in Boston. A copy of this paper reached Aranos Mooradian in Detroit. Immediately he wrote to his sweetheart, of whom he had heard nothing for nearly ten years, and through Near East Relief he sent her $500 to bring her in safety to a new and happy life.

How did he employ his time while he waited for her?

There was that little home to be got ready in a hurry, the little home that he had long despaired of sharing with Lusia.

They met and were married in Boston. Lusia's wedding day was indeed a day of thrills for her. Aside from the meeting with her lover, her first ride in a trolley car, her first experience with an underground tunnel, her first swift flight in an elevator, would be enough to unnerve almost any young bride. But these strange things could hold no terror for one who had lived through the awfulness of pillage and massacre that had become commonplaces in the life of Lusia, and it was almost a smiling bride who boarded the train with her husband, bound for the home he had prepared for her in Michigan.

Lusia Mooradian is now twenty-six years old. In America that is an ideal age for brides, and certainly no country sends brides to the altar more radiant and young than does America. But Lusia Mooradian looks like a tired middle-aged woman. Her face is stamped with a grim sadness that tells a tragic story. Yet her young husband, remembering their happy childhood, and with the picture deep in his heart of the sweetheart to whom he said good-bye so long ago, is confident that the sheltered home and the tenderness with which he intends to surround her future, will bring back to his little wife the happiness which should shine from the face of every bride.—The New Near East.

Prayer.

Our lives are fed by prayer—for not alone
Strong yearnings of the soul for holy things,
Or aspirations high, or musings deep,
Can give us rest of soul—as to a sea
In which we children dip our tiny pails
And bring up water, we recur to prayer;
For loving, living, longing every hour,
We give up to Thy care, Almighty Strength,
That which our hands are all too weak to hold.
Take, then, O Lord, my doubts, my fears, myself,
My friends, my foes—if any such there be;
But laso take my pleasures and my joys,
My knowledge, all my intercourse with men,
Or books, or with this wondrous world of Thine—
Yes, take them all, that I may rest in Thee.

—Adelaide Ross.

Contend Earnestly for the Faith.

"Respect for her traditions has always been a chief note of the Church, and the great safeguard of her Catholicity. In this she is governed not merely by principles of human conservatism, but by a sense of Divine responsibility. Knowing herself to have no earthly origin, the result of mutual consent, but to have been created and raised up by God for this very purpose —to bear witness to Christ—she has always felt herself bound, as the first of her duties, to deliver, from age to age, the revelation made to her at the outset unimpaired and unadulterated. Voluntary societies, such as the sects, are under no such obligations. To modify the doctrines of their founders is in them no crime. But in the Church it would be the gravest of all crimes. She believes that her Founder was Himself 'the Truth.' She knows that He imparted to her, once for all, 'the Spirit of Truth.' It is her conviction that in the first burst of His inspiration He opened to the first generation of believers, the apostles and those next to them, the entire wealth of truth, in the form in which they could apprehend it and set it forth. Through those illuminated teachers she received the truth as a sacred trust for the benefit of humanity to the furthest shores and to the latest posterity. 'Keep the deposit' is the solemn injunction of the departing apostles. 'Contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints,' repeat their immediate associates who shared their inspiration. 'Let no innovation be made upon the received tradition' is the response of the Roman chair in the third century. 'Let the ancient customs hold good,' echoes the Nicene Council in the fourth. To this test everything is brought. It is in accordance with the historical belief and practice of the Church. If not, it stands self-condemned. By this test the Nicene Fathers rejected Arianims. By this test the controversies of modern times must be settled. No new-fangled inventions are to be joined with that sacred heirloom."—Canon Mason.

The contact of the Holy Spirit with the individual soul is the closest and most intimate relation that exists between God and man, and it is through the Holy Ghost that man can become like God in godliness.

When we go from one room into another we do not become different persons. When we pass into the other world we shall take with us the character and the recollections which we had here.—Exchange.

For the Young Folks

When Mother Went Away.

Once mother had to go away
(We thought we'd have a lovely day
'Cause daddy planned to stay at home),
So mother packed her brush and comb,
Her nightie, and a few things more,
And when the cab was at the door
We all ran out to hug and kiss her,
And never thought how much we'd miss her.

First, some one down town telephoned,
And daddy turned around and groaned,
And said, "Too bad! I'll have to be
At the office, kids, 'till half-past three."

Then Phil fell down and cut his knee,
And cried as hard as hard can be;
I tied it up as best I could,
But not as well as mother would.

On Friday mother went away,
And that's a most unlucky day!
We broke the darling Chinese jar,
In the cupboard where the queer things are,
And I got caught on nails and tore
All my new dress on the big barn door.
If mother'd been at home, I know
That things would not have happened so.

And when at last we went to bed,
And daddy came, he only said:
"All right? Good-night, then, kiddies.
dear,
I wish that your mamma was here!"

He never tucked us in at all,
But turned the ligh off in the hall!
(Our mother always leaves it lit
So that we're not afraid a bit),
Then in the night I had a dream,
That almost made me cry and scream,
But mother wasn't there that night
To comfort me and hold me tight,
And talk and laugh away the fright.

Our mother came back home today,
And me, and Phil, and daddy say,
That she must never go away
Any more!

—St. Nicholas.

"The Blue Byke."

PART I.

"George Usher! How many times must I tell you to stop that mournful whistle? You will drive me insane!"

"Oh, mother, can't I even whistle? I can't have a wheel; I can't have anything!"

"Don't say that, son. Father and I try very hard to give you all we can. The necessities cost so much nowadays that we have very little left to buy such things, much as we should like to do so."

"Dad had a wheel when he was my age."

"I know it, son," said Mrs. Usher, rubbing her hand through his tousled hair. "I wish with all my heart that you could have one, too, but I don't see how you can. Did you fill the woodbox?"

"Yes, mother."

George ran out of the house and threw himself on the ground beneath the big pippin-tree, back of the house. Tears of disappointment welled up in his eyes in spite of all he could do. His heart had been set on a brand-new blue "byke" that stood in the window of the hardware store. It was a perfect beauty, with its motor-cycle handle-bars, its stripped mud-guards, the fifty dollars it cost was more than an electric headlight and a baggage-carrier in the rear. Father said that the fifty dollars it cost was more than he could afford. If only George could earn the money himself! But it did seem like a great deal when you thought of earning it.

George had no appetite for supper, but mother shook her head when father was about to question him. Uncle John, his mother's brother, dropped in to see them in the evening, as he wanted to talk business with Mr. Usher. George sat in one corner of the living-room with his history before him, but his mind was on the window of the hardware store.

"What was the best business proposition you ever had, John?" Mr. Usher asked after awhile.

Uncle John laughed. "The very best was when I was George's age."

George looked up all attention on hearing his name mentioned.

"We had a small chicken-house in the back yard, but no chickens. One day I asked father if I might have some, and he agreed. That was my first and best venture, for I couldn't lose. Father bought the chickens, paid for the feed, paid me for the eggs, and I ate them. Now you can't beat that, can you?"

"No, I can't," laughed Mr. Usher; "but didn't your father soon tire of that?"

"Yes—he did. But not until after I was well started. Then I was able to buy my own feed with what I received from the eggs and chickens I sold. I took all the extra ones to the store. I made real money from them. Every week I put a little more in my bank, and eggs were cheap in those days, too."

"Dad, may I keep chickens?" George broke in, all excitement. "We have a place for them, and I'll take care of them and tend the garden, too. You'll never have to show me the weeds, either, if only you'll let me keep chickens."

"We'll see, son. It means a great deal of work, and we mustn't start something we are not going to finish. I'll let you know next Monday, George."

George knew what his father said was final; and although he was too excited to sleep that night, he didn't mention the subject again. On Saturday, however, he spent most of the day in the chicken-house, cleaning and scrubbing and white-washing.

When he came home from school on Monday, his father met him at the gate.

"Come out back, son," he said, leading the way to the little house. He opened the door, and there, scratching away in the straw, were ten of the purest white, white-Leghorn pullets you ever saw. George was beside himself with delight.

"Oh, dad, thank you ever so much! Oh, mother!" he called.

But his mother was right behind him and answered, "Come and see what we have in the kitchen."

He ran on ahead. As he opened the kitchen door the cheep-cheep-cheep that greeted him told him that baby chicks were there. Sure enough, in a big cardboard carton behind the stove were an even hundred fluffy little yellow balls. He was speechless with excitement; but when father opened the book of instructions for the amateur poultryman, which had been sent by the hatchery from which the chicks had been bought, George turned to look over his father's shoulder. As they studied the book together, it was hard to decide which was the bigger boy, and the mother was as interested as they.

Hovels for the youngsters were easily and quickly made from cheese-boxes by cutting a little door at the bottom, so that they might run in and out. Three nails were driven in the side of each box about three inches from the bottom, and wire hoops were made to fit the inside of the box and rest on these nails.

"Now, mother, if you will sew some old flannel on the hoops for us, so that it will drop down on the backs of the little fellows, we will keep them snug and warm. Will that keep them warm, father?"

"Yes; the heat of their bodies against each other will be enough, for we will bring them into the kitchen at night."

—David Hammond, in St. Nicholas.

For the Southern Churchman.

Old Mr. Frog's Escape.

By Mary Gibson Chamberlayne, 8 Years Old.

Once upon a time there was an old frog whose name was Deep Voice. He lived in a pond and sang all summer in a deep voice, and that was where he got his name.

One day he had been visiting his cousin, old Mr. Toad, and had stayed till twilight, for it had been raining. Now Mr. Frog likes the rain, but Mr. Toad doesn't. He and Mr. Toad and his wife and children had been out to walk, and it had started raining, and he had to raise his umbrella and carry Mr. Toad, his wife and his children separately and safely across the mud puddles. Now he was coming home, and it was nearly dark.

Suddenly he heard a noise. He looked up, and there was Hooty, the owl. He stopped stone still, and presently Hooty went away, and then Mr. Frog hopped quickly back to the pond and began singing again.

Likes and Dislikes.

I had a little talk today—
An argument with Dan and Ike;
First Dan, he said 'twas not his way
To do the things he didn't like.

And Ike, he said that Dan was wrong,
That only cowards dodged and hid,
Because it made him brave and strong,
The things he didn't like, he did!

But then I showed to Ike and Dan
An easy way between the two;
I always try, as best I can,
To like the things I have to do.

—Arthur Guiterman.

For the Southern Churchman.

Big-Ape.

Herbert Lee Alexander, Aged 8 Years.

In the far West lived an Indian boy. One day he went to take a walk. He went on, on, on, and soon he came to what he called a wood. As he went on he heard a roar, then he knew where he was; he was in the jungle. The lion, the panther, the elephant, the tiger were chasing him. What was he to do? If he climbed a tree the panther would get him. He never thought of the apes. The apes were good fighters; the apes loved him. So he called them. "BAA," said Big Ape. What a fight! The tiger was the first to be killed, the panther the next, the lion the next, the elephant the last. The next task was to get home. It was not as hard as the first. He sent an ape to the top of a tall tree to see if he saw his wigwam. The ape saw it and took Big-Ape home.

'Twas a Glorious Fourth After All.

"Say, fellows, what's the matter with Jimmy?" piped up Ned Merrill as the South End Athletics crowded into the empty garage in Ned's back yard.

"Maybe he's sick," volunteered Willie Prentice.

"No, he isn't," answered Tommy Watson, "'cause I saw him coming from the store a little while ago."

It was the Fourth of July, and the South Enders had planned for a grand celebration of the nation's birthday. Tin banks had been emptied, and every possible penny had been secured for the club's common purse. There were to be flags, lemonade and noise making of all sorts to come after the morning baseball game with the West End Eagles. When the plans were being made for the celebration Jimmy Darrell had been the leading spirit. Now, on the morning of the eventful day, the little members of the neighborhood club were gathering for the ball game and anxious for the frolic of the afternoon. All that was needed was the presence of bright-eyed, sharp-witted Jimmy, the club president and popular leader of the youthful Athletics.

"Do you suppose he won't show up to pitch against the Eagles this morning?" asked Eddie White.

His question was followed by a dark silence, for without Jimmy in the box there was no hope of winning the game. Suddenly Will Prentice let out a shrill whistle and dashed to the door, wildly waving his cap. "Here he comes!" he shouted. And sure enough, down the alley walked the missing Jimmy. There was something about him that caused uneasiness among the boys clustered in the garage door.

"Hi, there! Hurry up, Jim!" called Will, who was bent on getting the ball game started.

"Go on; I'll catch you," said Jim. And as the club headed for the ball grounds there was a secret hope in the breast of the members of the team that Jim would "wake up" in time to pitch a good game.

Jimmy did not "wake up." He pitched a game of ball without any heart in it, and the Eagles won by three runs, which they piled up in the last inning. On the way back to the garage Jim said:

"I hated to disappoint you fellows. It was because I was worrying about our big celebration this afternoon that I couldn't pitch against the Eagles." After a pause, during which the boys wondered what was coming, he went on, "We all belong to the Junior Red Cross, don't we?"

There was a general nodding of assent.

"Our teacher told us that if we were to be good citizens we must serve others, didn't she?" was his next question. More nodding of assent.

"Well, on my way down here this morning I met two boys from the Orphans' Home, and they told me they were looking for an American flag so that they could celebrate the Fourth. That was to be all the fun they were going to have. I had the club's money in my pocket, and the thought struck me that if we were good citizens we ought to help those boys, and especially since they were doing their poor best to celebrate the country's birthday. Why can't we buy a flag for them and then spend the rest of the money on jimcracks for their Fourth?"

A buzz of conversation followed Jim's question as the boys grouped themselves about their leader. Finally Will Prentice said:

"That's all right, Jim. Let's buy the flag and everything. We ought to give those orphans one sure enough 'Glorious Fourth.' We can get some lemons at home and make some lemonade for ourselves and then go down to see the parade and maybe the fireworks tonight, so I guess it won't be such a bad Fourth after all, only I do wish we had won that ball game."

As Will ceased speaking the boys heard some one coming out of the garage, and, turning around, they saw Ned's uncle approaching.

"I happened to hear what you boys were talking about just now," he remarked as he came up. "Jimmy has asked you to make a big sacrifice in the way of unselfish service for others, and you boys are little bricks for backing him up. Now, don't say anything more about it, but buy your treat for the orphans, get some lunch and then meet me at my house at 2 o'clock."

Promptly on schedule time the boys were at the meeting place, and then things began to happen so fast there was no time left for regrets over the money that had been spent. Ned's uncle had purchased flags, balloons and every imaginable kind of noise-making contrivance made to give boys a good time on the Fourth of July. Late in the afternoon the West End Eagles unexpectedly appeared for another game of ball. This time Jimmy pitched with his usual skill. The South End Athletics won with many runs to spare and were cheered by the boys from the Orphans' Home, who had marched to the ball ground behind the flag the boys had bought for them.

The day ended in a blaze of glory, and as they were departing for their home the Athletics declared it the very best Fourth they had ever spent. In playing the part of good citizens they had found a new pleasure in the celebration of the anniversary of their country's Declaration of Independence. —Christian Advocate.

Rodney's Ride.

"The greatest ride of Revolutionary times was the ride of Caesar Rodney, of Delaware." "Paul Revere rode to save army supplies at Lexington and Concord, but Rodney, ill with cancer, eighty miles from Philadelphia, and against the pleadings of his friends and relatives, who said the ride would kill him, saddled his black horse and rode to save the Declaration of Independence, for his vote and that of John Morton, of Pennsylvania, were needed to break the tie.

"In 1776 the colonies were in great excitement. The Continental Congress was sitting in old Independence Hall, in Philadelphia. Thomas Jefferson had written the great charter of our freedom, and on July 1 it was presented to Congress by Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia. Would these brave men dare to defy King George and his armies. Yes, if the colonies stood united for freedom. No, if the colonies were divided. Four of the Pennsylvanians were opposed, but two of the seven Pennsylvanians were persuaded to stay away by Franklin and Adams. In Delaware, Thomas McKeen was for independence, George Reed was opposed at this time, and Caesar Rodney was eighty miles away down in Sussex County.

"When the sun rose over Philadelphia July 4, 1776, and the anxious delegates had gathered in Independence Hall, Rodney was still many miles to the south. His horse was jaded, his cancer-scarred face showed signs of physical pain and mental anxiety. Has the vote been taken? Through the street rang the sound of rushing hoofbeats, and into the yard dashed the foaming steed. Booted and spurred, tired and dusty, amidst a silence in which the heart throbs of Liberty were heard, Caesar Rodney entered Congress. Delaware was called. McKeen voted 'Aye,' Reed 'Nay,' and then the famous rider rose and said: 'As I believe the voice of my constituents and of all fair, sensible and honest men is in favor of independence, and as my own judgment concurs with them, I vote for independence.'"

More Blesseed.

Maurine sat playing with the beautiful presents her Aunt Laura had brought her the day before. Aunt Laura dearly loved Maurine, for she was her only sister's child, and a sweet-natured little girl she was, too. Her aunt had searched the shops and stores for presents before she left home, and a great big pasteboard box full of nice things for her niece had been brought in her trunk. There were a big doll, and two small ones, a tiny bureau, a washstand with chairs, a cupboard, dishes, cook stove, a white horse with shaggy mane and tail, some picture books and lots of candy and nuts.

As her Aunt Laura watched and admired her in her play, she noticed a thoughtful expression come over her face, and the child was perfectly silent for a minute.

"What are you studying about, darling?" asked her aunt. "Don't your presents suit you, little girl?"

"Oh, yes, auntie," she replied, brightening up and taking the white horse in her hand. "I think they're beautiful, but I was just thinking of crippled Dan. You know his aunt, who takes care of him, can't buy things as you do. She's poor and doesn't have any money, except to get something to eat with."

"No, I guess I've never seen him." Aunt Laura answered. "Where does he live?"

"'Round the corner," Maurine replied. "He sometimes comes to my window and peeps in at me when I am playing with my toys. He says he doesn't have anything much to play with."

"That's too bad," interjected Aunt Laura.

"And I'm going to ask you something," said Maurine, getting up and putting her arms tenderly about her aunt's neck. "Would you care if I took some nuts and candy, and gave him this horse you brought me?"

Aunt Laura smiled as she answered, "Why, no, dear. I'm glad you are so generous."

Maurine soon hurried off with the things in her arms, and in a few minutes she was back again. Her eyes were dancing.

"Oh, Aunt Laura," she exclaimed, "it's true what Jesus says!"

"What's that?" queried her aunt.

"Why, He says, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive,' and I've found it's so."—Exchange.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Cuticura Soap

AND OINTMENT

Clear the Skin

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. 7, Malden, Mass.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

DON'T TRY ON YOUR NEW DRESSES over your old corset. Let us help you select and fit to you the corset that does greatest justice to your figure. The Corset Shop, 317 N. Fifth St. Mrs. A. J. Pyle, Prop. Phone Ran. 3397.

Doll Skirts Accordion Pleated Free. ASHBY B. PYLE, 315 N. 5th St. Hemstitching, Pinking and Button Covering.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER

Invites you to inspect her line of GAGE Tailored HATS. Also the ADVANCE Showing of Spring Hats in the most attractive shapes.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue V. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

COUNTRY BOARD.

IN PRIVATE FAMILY, ON LARGE plantation near Rapidan, Va. Shady porches and lawn; large, comfortable house; modern conveniences. No children. Address Box 64, Rapidan, Va.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCAtion and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—LADY, WITH COLLEGE DEgree, to teach high school mathematics in Southern Boarding School for girls. Address Willanow, care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A TEACHER IN PRIVATE family. A refined Christian woman to teach three children in fifst, fifth and sixth grades. Music and French desired. References exchanged. Give references and salary desired in first letter. Mrs. J. S. Cochran, Brookewood, Augusta County, Va.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN elderly lady for three months or longer. Attractive home in the country near Annapolis. Duties not hard. Require reading aloud and general attention. Please addresss communication to Mrs. R. B. Dashiell, 90 Duke of Gloucester Street, Annapolis, Md.

SITUATION WANTED.

EXPERIENCED CLERGYMAN, GRADuate-seminarian and post-graduate, desires parish or live mission. Unmarried. Apply "E. F.," care Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant principal or matron in a school, or some position of trust in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

I take this method of thanking my many clients for their past patronage, and assure them I am still selling Spirella corsets, and can be reached at the Wallerstein, Apartment 202, or by phone, Randolph 3694-W. MISS MYRTLE McDONNELL.

ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, GREAT EXperience, highest references furnished, wishes position in parish having good field for teaching. Address Organist, 4054 North Hermitage Avenue, Chicago.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

DAWSON-WASHINGTON.

On June 14, 1921, in Washington, D. C., at the home of her mother, Mrs. Lawrence Washington, MISS LOUISA FONTAINE WASHINGTON was married to MR. PHILIP DAWSON, of Lynchburg, Va., son of the late Mr. Nicholas son, of Fairfax County, Va. The ceremony was performed by the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, of Southern Virginia, uncle of the bride, and the Rev. William G. Pendleton, D. D., rector of the Virginia Episcopal School, and brother-in-law of the groom. The bride is a daughter of the late Mr. Lawrence Washington and granddaughter of Colonel John A. Washington, last owner of Mount Vernon. After July 1 the address of Mr. and Mrs. Dawson will be Virginia Episcopal School, Lynchburg, Va.

Goodson: Died, at City Point, Va., June 22, of bronchial pneumonia, VIRGINIA CARROLL, infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Goodson, aged eight months.

"Safely, safely gathered in."

MARY SUSAN SALE.

Entered into eternal life May 2, 1921, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Meriwether Smith, in Hyattsville, Md., MARY SUSAN SALE, of Essex County, Va., in the sixty-ninth year of her age. The funeral services were held at Pinkney Memorial Church, St. Matthew's Parish, Hyattsville, May 3, and her body was laid to rest at Lloyd's, in Essex County.

For months with true Christian patience she had borne up against a disease that required all the Christian fortitude that any soul could command. After long suffering, the end came with unexpected suddenness as if she had fallen asleep in the arms of the Lord.

Mrs. Sale was a faithful servant of Christ, unselfish and untiring in her service and consideration for others, the possessor of a beautifully even disposition, of keen appreciation of things spiritual, loyal to her Church and unsparing in her loving devotion to her family and her friends.

MISS ROSE ELLZEY McCORMICK.

The members of Grace Church, Berryville Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, desire to place on record their sorrowful sympathy for the mother, and all others of the family, in the going hence of their loved one, ROSE ELLZEY McCORMICK. Her sweet nature, gentle manner and other Christian graces, as also her continued interest in the affairs of the Auxiliary, are fully appreciated by all with whom she came in touch, and her absence from our midst has left a vacancy which is deeply felt. Yet, knowing that our loss is her great gain, we can with her rejoice that she, having entered into the joys of our Lord, is forever blessed. May the "Man of Sorrows" speak comfort and peace to their hearts.

SUSANNE G. HAMMOND,
ALICE LEWIS,
Committee.

BENJAMIN BLAKE BROCKENBROUGH.

Fell asleep peacefully in the early morning of Sunday, May 29, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, BENJAMIN BLAKE BROCKENBROUGH, son of Dr. Austin Brockenbrough and Frances Blake, his wife.

Although he had passed the allotted span of life, we never tthought of Mr. Brockenbrough as an old man. His placid brow, his genial smile, his youthful spirit, shown to the last in a beautiful comradeship with the young, made one forgetful of the advance of old age upon him.

His life passed through many great changes, but he had a rare gift of adapting himself to changed conditions, and this ability to live in the present kept him far younger than his years.

When only seventeen years of age he enlisted in the Confederate Army and was conspicuous for his bravery. After the war, a friend writes, "his barn and corn-houses were open freely to the poor, both black and white."

In 1868 Mr. Brockenbrough married Miss Annie M. Mason, daughter of the Rev. Richard Mason, D. D., and she survives him. In this union each experienced a wealth of joy which found constant expression in loving and thoughtful attentions to each other.

In their beautiful colonial home in Tappahannock he and Mrs. Brockenbrough have dispensed for more than a generation a hospitality which for its graciousness and charm has been famed throughout Tidewater Virginia.

Born of a long line of distinguished ancestry, Mr. Brockenbrough was true to this great heritage, and has handed on to succeeding generations the example of a character which was strong in its loyalty to principle, and beautiful in its adornment of culture and refinement, of gentleness and graciousness of manner.

Mr. Brockenbrough was baptized in infancy, was a regular attendant upon the services of St. John's, a generous contributor to its support and deeply interested in its life and work.

The distinguishing characteristics of those we love stand out with greater clearness in death than in life. In Mr. Brockenbrough's character, his high sense of honor, his chivalry, his reverence, his scorn of deceit and injustice, his love of home, his hospitality, and his loyalty to his friends, are some of the virtues that shone brightly in his life and made him a figure loved and honored by all who knew him.

"Now the laborer's task is o'er,
Now the battle day is past,
Now upon the farther shore
Lands the voyager at last.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

—Thomas D. Lewis.

JANE HERSEY HODGSON HUGHES.

Entered into rest Monday, June 6, 1921, about 7:30 P. M., at her apartment in The Halifax, Richmond, Va., JANE HERSEY HODGSON HUGHES, widow of the late Stephen B. Hughes, who at the time of his death was a partner in the Drewry-Hughes Company.

Mrs. Hughes was born September 21, 1835, in Columbia, Va., her parents being the late Joseph and Ann Pannill Hodgson. She was the last surviving member of her immediate family, having been preceded to the grave by an only sister, Mrs. Susan R. Estes, of Richmond, Va., and five brothers, William B. Hodgson, of "Hickory Grove," Fluvanna County; Colonel Joseph Hodgson, of Mobile, Ala.; Rev. Telfair Hodgson, of Sewanee, Tenn.; George P. Hodgson, of Columbia, Va., and Dr. Wilmer Hodgson, of Roanoke, Va. She had no children, but is survived by many nephews and nieces, two of whom have lived with her a number of years. They are Miss Jennie Hughes, who was adopted in early childhood, and Miss M. Elise Hodgson, both being daughters of the late George P. Hodgson, of Columbia, Va.

For some time she had been in failing health, though she was bright and cheerful to the last. Her passing away was a quiet stepping from this world into the other, where her heart had long been fixed in hope and expectation. She was confirmed early in life, and for the past twenty-six years had been a member of All Saints' Church. Although the infirmities of age prevented her regular attendance in recent years, she never ceased to take the keenest interest in Church affairs as well as in the affairs of the world at large. Her sympathies were broad, her gentleness very sweet, and her whole character true to the highest standards of Christian womanhood.

"And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since and lost awhile."

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE
Florist
209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.
Flowers of Quality

"The Store That Pleases"
FOR FURNITURE
JONES BROS. & CO.
INCORPORATED
1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS
Highest grade instruments. In use in three thousand churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request Correspondence solicited.
M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles
EMBROIDERIES
Silks, Cloths, Fringes
CLERICAL SUITS
Rabats, Collars, Shirts
COX SONS & VINING
2 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS
Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture
Write for Catalogue
for Episcopal Churches
W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
08 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS
PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS
BANKERS and BROKERS
Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

Have You Made Your Will?
See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.
Merchants National Bank
11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.
"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

In Matters Pertaining to
Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.
RICHMOND TRUST CO.
Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.
JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

INCORPORATED 1832
Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company
Of Richmond, Va.
ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41
Wm. H. Palmer, President E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

MIDNIGHT A STEALTHY SOUND IS HEARD!
The burglar is making a call.
While honest men sleep, the prowling thief is after the valuables lying careiessly around the house.
Protect your treasures the best way. All-steel boxes for rent here as low as $3.00 per year.
See Mr. Andrews.
PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK
Main and Twelfth Streets
RICHMOND, - - - - - - VIRGINIA

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

the guests, who brought their own lunch and dinner. In the afternoon the newly organized boys' band made its initial appearance, and the children of the primary grades gave a program. The shop work of the boys was demonstrated, and the busy day closed with Evening Prayer, at which addresses were made by Yellow Calf, Henry Lee Tyler and Thomas Crispin, Arapahoe catechists.

The Rev. Harold Johns, minister in charge of the Jackson's Hole region, is spending Thursday and Friday of each week in the town of Kelly, where the work is most encouraging. A Girls' Camp Fire group and a troop of Boy Scouts have been organized. The attendance at church in Kelly is forty, and the average attendance in Sunday school is thirty, which figures are splendid for this small place. The Boy Scouts in Jackson have planted trees about the mission property, and are caring for the grounds.

L. M. T.

Personal Notes

The Rev. W. B. Sams has resigned as vicar of Christ Church, Cordele, Ga., and will leave August 1 to accept the call f Christ Church, Mt. Pleasant, S. C. Mr. Sams has been in the Diocese of Georgia for nine years, and has served Christ Church, Cordele, for the past three and a half years.

The Rev. Robert B. Nelson, who has been for some time Director of Education, Bureau of Social Hygiene for the State of Virginia, has accepted a call to the rectorship of Christ Church, Winchester, Va., and expects to take charge August 1.

The Rev. George E. Zachary, rector of St. Andrew's Church, State College, Pa., has accepted a call to take charge of student work at Clemson College, S. C.

By appointment of the Bishop, the Diocese of Arkansas was represented at the Church Publicity Conference recently held at St. Louis for the Middle Western States by the Rev. Clarence Parker, of St. Paul's, Fayetteville, Secretary of the Department of Religious Education of Arkansas and chairman of the Sub-department of Publicity.

The Rev. S. E. Prentiss has resigned the charge of St. Martin's Parish, Hanover County, Va., to take effect September 1.

At the recent commencement exercises of the University of Southern California, the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon the Rt. Rev. William Bertrand Stevens, Ph. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Los Angeles.

On June 1 the Rev. John S. Gillespie took charge of the work of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Gillette, Wyo.

At the recent commencement exercises of the University of Alabama, Dean Richard Lightburne McCready, of the Cathedral in Louisville, Ky., had conferred upon him the degree of Litt. D.

The Rev. Edgar W. Halleck, formerly rector of St. Stephen's Church, Louisville, Ky., took charge of Grace Church, Waycross, Ga., on June 19.

The Rev. D. R. Blaskie is rector of Park County Parish, Wyo., and began his new duties on June 1.

The Rev. George Vest, rector of Rivanna Parish, Columbia, Va., has declined the call recently extended him to become rector of St. John's Parish, Loudoun County, Va.

The Rev. George B. Scriven, of Seabury Divinity School, is doing summer work in Wyoming, under the direction of the Rev. Elvon L. Tull. Mr. Scriven's headquarters are in Sunrise.

The Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D., has resigned as rector of Grace Church, The Plains, Va., after seven years of service, to become on July 1 dean of the new system of five Church schools in the Diocese of Virginia, with office at 400 Old Dominion Trust Building, Richmond, Va. Dr. Woodward's family will remain at The Plains until September, and he will return there during the summer to conduct the Sunday services, while the vestry are finding a successor.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, June 19, in the Church of the Incarnation, Ronceverte, W. Va., the Rev. George Julius Cleaveland, deacon, was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of West Virginia. Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. Ben R. Roller, rector of St. Luke's Church, Welch, W. Va., and the Rev. Noble C. Powell, rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church, University of Virginia. Mr. Cleaveland was presented by the Ven. W. P. Chrisman and the sermon was preached by Rev. Willis M. Cleaveland, D. D., his father. The Litany was read by Rev. Mr. Powell and the Ante-Communion by Rev. Mr. Roller. The Bishop was the celebrant. All the clergy present joined in the laying on of hands. Mr. Cleaveland is in charge of a number of missions in the eastern part of the Diocese, with residence at Clover Lick.

Mr. Manning Mason Patillo was ordained to the diaconate on St. Peter's Day in Christ Church, Savannah, Ga. The preacher was the Rev. John Durham Wing, D. D., who also presented the candidate. The Litany was said by the Rev. S. B. McGlohon. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop. Mr. Patillo studied at Johns Hopkins University and at the University of the South before completing his theological studies at the Episcopal Divinity School in Philadelphia. He served in the World War with a unit of Sewanee students. Mr. Patillo will go as a missionary to Cuba August 1.

Mr. Harry Rudy Ziegler was ordained deacon by the Bishop of the Diocese of West Texas on St. Peter's Day, at Christ Church, San Antonio, Tex. The Rev. L. B. Richards, rector of the parish, preached the sermon, and the Rev. Benjamin Bean, rector of St. Luke's Church, San Antonio, presented the candidate. The other clergy present were Archdeacon McKenzie and Rev. S. Arthur Huston. Mr. Ziegler was formerly a Baptist minister, having served most of his ministry in Massachusetts. The Bishop has placed Mr. Ziegler at Pearsall.

In St. John's Church, Wilmington, N. C., on Sunday, June 26, Mr. Harvey A. Cox was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina. The candidate was presented by the Rev. W. R.

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

R. Geissler, Inc.
56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

JUST READY
More "FIVE-MINUTE TALKS"
By Walter R. Bowie, D.D.
SUNNY WINDOWS
Author of "The Children's Year"
AND OTHER SERMONS

Here is another volume of Dr. Bowie's talks to youngsters, all attractively suited to the child mind. The subjects are arresting themes, calculated to almost invariably catch the attention of boy or girl--while the treatment thereof is simplicity itself.

As the Record of Christian Work said: "Dr. Bowie's talks are capital—straight to the hearts of children, clever, interesting, helpful."

Cloth, $1.25 net

For Sale by
Southern Churchman Co., Richmond, Va.

Noe, Secretary of the Diocese, and the sermon was preached by Mr. Cox's brother, the Rev. William E. Cox, rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Richmond, Va., and formerly rector of St. John's. The Litany was said by the Rev. Alexander Miller, the Epistle was read by the rector of the church, the Rev. R. E. Gribben, and the Gospel by Mr. Cox. Mr. Cox has been appointed by Bishop Darst to St. Paul's Church, Wilmington, for the month of August.

On the Fourth Sunday after Trinity, June 19, Mr. Henry Jeremiah Pulver was ordained deacon by the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, Bishop Suffragan of Pennsylvania, in All Souls' Church for the Deaf, Philadelphia, Pa. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Norman V. Levis, D. D., and the Rev. Herbert C. Merrill, missionary to the deaf in the Dioceses of Albany, Central New York and Western New York, preached the sermon. Other clergy present were the Rev. Messrs. James O. McIlhenny, of Philadelphia; Franklin C. Smielau, of Selinsgrove, Pa., and Oliver J. Whildin, of Baltimore, Md. The Rev. C. O. Dantzer, pastor of All Souls' Church, was prevented by illness from being present, much to the regret of everybody. The service was unusually well attended.

The Rev. Mr. Pulver is a graduate of the School for the Deaf at Malone, N. Y., and of Gallaudet College, having received the degree of M. A. from the latter. He studied for the ministry in the Philadelphia Divinity School. Mr. Pulver will have charge of the deaf mute work in Washington, D. C., and the Virginias, under the supervision of the Commission of Deaf Mute Work in the Province of Washington, and will establish his headquarters in Washington, D. C. He is the seventeenth deaf man to be ordained to the ministry of the Church. There are now twelve clergymen of the Church ministering to the spiritual welfare of the deaf.

On Wednesday, June 22, the Rev. Juan McCarthy, of La Gloria, Cuba, was advanced to the priesthood in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana, by the Rt. Rev. Hiram R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop of Cuba. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Loreto Serapion, lately of the Philippine Islands; the Litany by the Rev. P. H. Asheton-Martin, rector of the Marianao Cathedral School for Boys; the Epistle was read by the Ven. William Watson, Archdeacon of the Oriente, and the Gospel by the Ven. W. W. Steel, Archdeacon of Havana. The sermon was delivered by the Very Rev. G. B. Meyers, dean of Holy Trinity Cathedral.

Mr. McCarthy came to us from the Baptists, and has spent his diaconate in charge of missions in La Gloria and adjacent parts. Although not a Cuban, his knowledge of the Spanish language is quite equal to that of the English language. For this and other reasons he will be a valuable acquisition to the Church forces in Cuba.

Another Baptist minister has lately been accepted as a candidate, Mr. Salvador Berenguer.

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

Posse Normal School for Gymnastic

Massachusetts, Boston, 779 Beacon Street. 33d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to the Secretary.

"WE MUCH PREFER THE BOOK WITH MUSIC"

St. Paul's Church, Kenwood, Chicago

"St. Paul's Church was one of the first to order and instal its use in the choir and congregation. Outside of the natural prejudices of human nature to make any change, all the comments that I have heard from our people are favorable. We now use no other hymnal for the choir or for congregational singing. We much prefer the book with music."

(Signed) GEORGE H. THOMAS, Rector.

Single copies.....$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more.....1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more.....1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

Published by

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND
14 Wall Street, - - - New York, N. Y.

One of "two books which only America cares enough to produce and publish."—Expository Times

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF CHRIST

BY FREDERICK C. GRANT

Rector of Trinity Church, Chicago

Associate Editor of the Anglican Theological Review.

The author seeks to present the Life of Jesus in such form as will appeal religiously and educationally to youth of thirteen or fourteen years. The method employed has been largely the narrative, though the teachings of Jesus have been held quite constantly in the foreground. The author has handled his material in such a way as to bring into clear consciousness and give vital force to the motives which Jesus' character and teaching inspire in young lives.

"It makes no attempt to be inspirational, but quotes the Bible at the most touching parts of the story."—Minneapolis Tribune.

"If there is a better book for the use of classes early in the beginning of their study of Christ and Christian teaching we have not seen it."—The Christian Advocate.

Illustrated. Net, $1.25; by mail, $1.35.

AT THE BETTER BOOK SHOPS

THE ABINGDON PRESS

NEW YORK CINCINNATI

Chicago, Boston, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Kansas City, San Francisco, Portland, Oregon

Tell Your Neighbors About It.

Our Lord depends upon those who really lve Him to bring others to know Him, in order that He may bless them, too. Personal work in bringing others to Christ is one of the tests of our sincerity in our religious profession. It is easy enough to say our prayers, to slip quietly into church, to glide out and return to our homes with our hearts filled with love toward God. This is of very great importance, too. We must all of us do it.

But what would happen if we all stopped there? Are there no neighbors who do not belong to or attend Church? Are there no unbaptized or unconfirmed people whom we know, or at least see? Have we no friends who have not yet made the great surrender of their wills to our Lord?

Did you ever ask yourself how God expects to win them? Why do you think He has made you His child, given you so many spiritual blessings and let you know about Him and His love? Do you know that He did it in order that you might tell these very neighbors about it? He relies upon you to bring them. You promised to serve Him truly all the days of your life. Do you think you are serving truly when you fail to bring others to know Him, and do not help Him lead them where He can bless them?—The Rev. Charles Herbert Young, M. A.

In the Southland, before the War Between the States, a negro slave, who was called a preacher, had an infidel master, and the latter said to the slave one day, "You are a preacher, Sam?" "Well, I tells about Jesus some, marster." "Well, if you are a preacher you ought to understand the Bible. Now tell me what this means." And he opened the Bible and read. "And whom He did foreknow them He did predestinate"—words that have puzzled wiser heads than the poor slave. Said the negro, "Marster, where is it?" "It's in Romans," said the infidel. "Oh, my dear marster, I will explain this 'ole business to you. It is very simple. You begin with Matthew and do all the dear Lord tells you to do there: and then you go on to Mark, and Luke, and John, and when you get to that place in Romans it is easy enough; but you can't begin there."

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Traveler Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank
Richmond, Virginia

GRAIN, HAY, FEED:

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and By:

Richmond, Va.

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

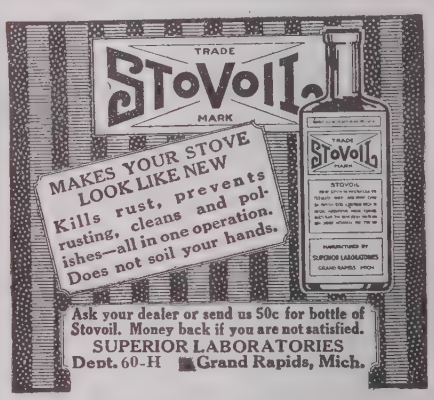
BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW
CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.
807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

Memorial and Mausoleum Windows

Grand Price Louisiana Purchase Exposition
Sent Free: Our 48-Page Book
Ecclesiastical Art in Memorial Windows



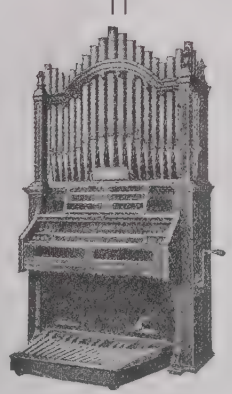
THE FLANAGAN & BIEDENWEG STUDIO
312-318 W. ILLINOIS STREET, -:- CHICAGO, ILL
Established 1883

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.



There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond
1104 East Main Street

For Church and Home

Organs

A beautifully illustrated catalog, showing styles and prices, of the famous Estey, Packard and Corley Organs will be sent on request.

The Corley Company stock is the most complete in the entire South.

Easy payment terms will be arranged.

The Corley Company
The South's Great Musical Dept. Store
213 E. Broad Street, RICHMOND, VA.

R. L. Christian & Company

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocer

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.

Catalogue mailed on application.

NICK BULL'S MARKET,

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME

412 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 16, 1921. No. 29.

Quis Habitabit?

Would'st thou the holy hill ascend
And see the Father's face?
To all His children lowly bend,
And seek the humblest place.

Thus humbly doing on the earth
What things the lofty scorn,
Thou shalt assert the lofty birth
Of all the lowly born.

EDUCATIONAL

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other partriculars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean,
Petersburg, Va.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.

Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation

CHAS. J. SMITH President

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre campus and eighty acres added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office addres to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST AL_AYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Heaven is home.

Unless you bear with the faults of a friend you betray your own.—Syms.

The incorruptible crown is the Christ halo on the soul, the very image of God in the heart of man.—Tolman.

There is not a single spot between Christianity and atheism on which one can safely or firmly fix his foot.—Emmons.

"Who was ever convinced by one who did not feel the truth? What mind was ever lighted up or warmed by that which was dark and cold?"

Without the Way, there is no going; without the Truth, there is no knowing; without the Life, there is no living.—G. D. Boardman.

He is most dear to the heart of Christ who loves most, because he has most of God in him; and that love comes from missing none of the preparatory steps of affection given us as primer lessons.—F. W. Robertson.

Where night and sleep await,
Set there the sentinel
To bar the evening's gate.
So shall no fear disturb your rest,
No danger and no care,
For only peace and pardon pass
The watchful guard of prayer.
—Annie Flint.

Posse Normal School for Gymnastics

Massachusetts, Boston, 779 Beacon Street. 33d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to the Secretary.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. College preparatory. Boarding department 503 W. Franklin Street. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health; out-door life.

MISS ROSALIE H. NOLAND, Principal

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

CHATHAM Episcopal Institute

FOR GIRLS CHATHAM, VA.

RT. REV. B. D. TUCKER, D. D., PRESIDENT
Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

Beautiful and healthful location. 10-acre campus. Modern equipment. Athletics, Gym College Preparatory. Music, Art, Domestic Science Expression. Certificate admits to leading colleges. Catalog

ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., PRINCIPAL, BOX 13

EDUCATIONAL

Rockford College

A Standard College For Modern Women

A college of distinguished graduates, seventy years of fine traditions and high standards of scholarship. A. B., B. S., A. M. degrees.

Reservations Limited

Send for Catalog

Wm. A. Maddox, Ph. D., Pres.
Box 478, Rockford, Illinois

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida. Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

"It matters to Him about you"—
If you're glad, or if tears your eyes dim,
"It matters to Him about you."
Does it matter to you about Him?
—S. S. Times.

What would afford proof to an unbiased mind is often quite insufficient to convince men against their will, while that which harmonizes with preconceived opinion is often accepted with little or no evidence.—Selected.

Our senses are so many windows opening out upon the world, and our present bodies are transparent or sensitive at only five points; but the spiritual body may be transparent through and through, clear as crystal, through which we can look out upon every aspect of the new world and touch it with sensitive feelers at every point.—J. H. Snowden.

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIDLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls

1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

For Girls and Young Ladies Warrenton, Va.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, Principal, Box 17

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.
Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., Litt. D., President

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

Earn Extra Dollars in Your Spare Hours

You need no experience to be successful—You can learn as you earn. Let us tell you about our plan.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

The SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN is the oldest Episcopal Church Paper published in America. Every dollar received in subscriptions will be devoted to the improvement of the paper and the extension of its service in the work of the Church.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street .....

SERVICE

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State. Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor

Richmond, Va.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 30c. Send for circular

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 16, 1921. No. 29.

AN AUTHENTIC VOICE OF LEADERSHIP

Among the Bishops of this Church of ours, there are men for whom all that know them thank God. Of such is Bishop Lines, of Newark, a part of whose address to his last Diocesan Council we have ventured to print in this issue of the Southern Churchman, under the heading of "The Church and the Challenge of the Times." To the ripe experience of years, Bishop Lines joins a vital freshness of imagination sensitive to present facts. He is a prophet of the deep, sure things of God, in their ever fresh and living application.

We rejoice in everything which he has said in the words which we print today. Seldom is there found a message so nobly eloquent, so rich with high suggestion, so full of courage and in touch with immediate practical needs. With everything that the Bishop says we agree, and we wish that from the printed words his voice might reach the consciences of thousands.

Consider, in the first place, the contrast between those mean and shallow utterances which have sometimes been heard of late from the lips of those who were supposed to represent America, and the words of the Bishop, in regard to our national ideas. How petty, and shrunken, and false appears the spirit of Mr. Harvey, the Ambassador to Great Britain, in his notorious speech in which he sneered at the thought of America having entered the war for any other idea than self-defense, beside the spirit of this interpretor for the thought of God for human life when he says: "The world's history and our study and experience declare that the remedy for the ills of the time and hope for the making of a new world in which dwelleth righteousness depend upon good religion, a sense of dependence upon Almighty God and of our duty towards our fellowmen. National selfishness and forgetfulness that nations as well as individuals must be guided by high moral principles, have involved us in all the horrors of the years just gone, and in all the anxiety of the years that are passing, and it is not certain that the world has learned the lesson taught by its terrible experience. Our public men and writers are saying much about the preservation of our rights as a nation and little about our duties. No man ever made out a noble life by putting emphasis upon his rights rather than his duties, and no nation will make out a noble record by so doing. We wrote the noblest pages in our history when we pledged our millions of men in army and navy and all our resources to save the cause of civilization, and to declare that Might shall not make Right in this world. From that high plane, commanding the respect and gratitude of the whole civilized world, we have fallen, and now our leaders seem to be talking altogether about the assertion and maintenance of our rights, and it is a position to be deplored. It is an appeal to selfish interest, and the crowd of thoughtless people respond to it, but it is not worthy of us. More than the regard of the world because of our great resources and material wealth, we need the respect and good will, yes, and affection of the world because we do not forget in making national claims, claims of humanity."

It is the Bishop, and not the Ambassador, who searches the deep things of the nation's heart. It is the Bishop and not the Ambassador who speaks the truth that shall prevail.

Equally brave and fine are the words of the Bishop when he turns from international matters to our domestic issues. Nothing could be more plain and bold than his words in regard to prohibition. It is timely to read them now, when the newspapers have recently carried report of the parade held in New York City and reviewed by the Mayor, in which the remaining members of the still hopeful Bartenders' Union, and all the other elements opposed to prohibition and wishing to undermine it, marched down Fifth Avenue to try and conjure the corpse of the old evil days out of its grave. It is an unhappy fact that a great many men who would not march in the parade, openly or secretly sympathize with the designs of the marchers. They are still in revolt against the prohibition amendment. They will not even yet join whole-heartedly in an attempt to give this mighty social experiment a fair chance of public co-operation to prove what it can do for the human welfare of America. They want to discourage its enforcement and stab it thus in the back when they fear that it cannot be assailed in the full face of its merits. Still they are thinking of themselves as individuals, nursing their resentment of the so-called infringement of their liberty, refusing to see the challenge to the individual to link his own consideration in large loyalty to a movement that has to do with the destinies of a people. For such, the Bishop's message is clear and fine. "The outcry against the violation of personal liberty by prohibition is unreasonable. The restriction of personal liberty for the common good is the condition of the progress of civilization. * * * The American saloon is dead; let it stay dead."

Finally, we commend to the attention of all thoughtful people what the Bishop says about the agitation against the so-called "blue laws." He makes plain once more what we have already said in these columns, that good people are apt to be set off with a pack on a false trail. The talk about an effort to bring back Puritanism and to enforce all sorts of strict and unreasonable laws for the keeping of Sunday, and the deliberate resentment against these imagined things which is being incited by propaganda in the press, is a smoke-screen behind which commercial interests are trying to gain their point of a public opinion willing to allow the wide-open Continental Sunday. It is a time for Christian people to keep their own opinions sane and true. We must stand for reasonable liberty, but we must take care lest we be betrayed into an alliance with license. "The loss of the day of rest," as the Bishop says, "especially through the persistence of greedy men, would be a calamity for any nation."

THE PROGRESS OF MAN

A Review of H. G. Wells' "The Outline of History," and James Bryce's "Modern Democracies."

"What a piece of work is a man! How infinite in faculties! in form, and moving, how express and admirable! in apprehension, how like a god!"

So said Shakespeare through the mouth of Hamlet; and because his words are true, the study of man and of his life here upon the earth, and of how he has fought with the brute forces below him, and been touched by the finger of God above him, is the most marvelous and fascinating story which thought can follow.

It is often lamented that the people of our age are caught by the glitter of shallow interests, and that they neither read nor think profoundly. A certain college professor with wry humor has recently remarked that our generation has a movie mind and a jazz emotion. The Sunday newspaper is the extent of the literature which many read, and the classics of human thought lie dusty on the shelves. But now and then there comes a writer, who, by the alchemy of his genius, can give to the solid facts of knowledge a light and sparkle as immediately attractive as that which people think they find in shallower things. Of such is that remarkable genius, Mr. H. G. Wells, and in no work of his has he revealed his extraordinary powers more brilliantly than in The Outline of History. Here there is a marshalling of the mighty facts of human life and destiny which can give the most thoughtful scholar food for meditation, and here also is such dramatic staging of the story of the centuries as can catch even the lighter attention and win it, to its own surprise, to a study that is full of genuineness.

If the imagination be at all alive, it will find in this book of Mr. Wells' such a spectacle as never shone upon the screen of any theater, for here is nothing else than a moving picture of creation. Through its vivid magic, one gazes first into the dark abyss of time when the earth itself was formed, and watches the emergence of life by the hot, steamy beaches of the primeval sea. Then through the ages, generation by generation, life creeps away from the shallow sea-water of its beginning, and through the vast jungle of the mesozoic swamps move the gigantic form of the earliest reptiles and amphibious beasts, the dinosaurs and those other long extinct monsters whose fossil bones, dug up from long-buried geologic strata, may be seen in museums of natural history today.

Then comes—as the story of the Outline moves forward—the dim figure of man, his early history interpreted conjecturally to us from bits of bone and skull, which anthropologists have found and studied, low-browed and savage, mighty-muscled and small-brained, fighting for survival against the sabretooth tiger, the hairy mammoth, the rhinoceros and other beasts which disputed with him the possession of the Mediterranean Valley lands a quarter of a million years ago. Slowly from the half-brutehood of that palaeolithic age, humanity begins to emerge more clearly. One race after another supplants the earlier type until, in the men who have left their remains in the lake dwellings of Switzerland and in the caves of France, there appear upon the earth the human families which have attained in knowledge and skill those arts and devices which make the basis of human life, as distinguished from the brute.

Then through the history of the rise of the human race, the panorama of the book sweeps forward in the far-stretching pageant of the civilized years. Yonder in Egypt the slaves of the Pharaohs drag the colossal stones to build the Pyramids in the desert, and lift the pillars of the temples at Thebes and Karnak. From the harbors of Tyre and Sidon the seamen of Phoenicia launch the ships that were to carry the founders of Carthage and send the pioneers to the pillars of Hercules and beyond. To the East, in the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates, the still earlier foundations of Babylon and Assyria are being laid, while beyond the veil of her proud and languid aloofness the gigantic civilization of China builds itself along her rivers and her plains.

Through the pageant, as it develops, move the Roman legions. Through it passes the tragic figure of Hannibal. Over it, like a star that drew the very planets from their orbits, flashes the brief and meteoric splendor of Alexander the Great. Follows then, after a time, the gathering of the black cloud of the barbaric invasion over the horizon of the civilized world, the breaking of the frontiers, the slow disintegration of the Empire of Rome, chaos, confusion and the darkness, and then, with the power of the Christian Church rising more and more, the gradual emergence of Europe in the medieval years. Through the new light and progress of the later centuries, down to our very yesterday, does the story run; and, with a strange and breathless vividness, one realizes the wholeness of that life process which binds into its tremendous unity the dim figure of the cave man with the latest human figure who moves across the fleeting modern scene today.

It is unthinkable, of course, that in a brief review one could even sketch either the contents or the quality of this titanic book, but the motive which binds it all together can perhaps be indicated by words of Mr. Wells' own. His Outline is not a blind linking together, like beads upon a string, of stark and unrelated facts. He sees the history of mankind as the emergence of the human power to think, to plan, to will, to subdue the brute forces both within and without; and to order the facts of his earth to the end that his ideals may finish in human society the evolution which began in the struggle of the brute. "We are beginning to understand," he says, "something of what the whole might be, something of what our race might become were it not for our still raw humanity. Between ourselves and the savage brutes, our ancestors, who charred their food in the embers or ate it raw, intervene some four or five hundred generations; there is not much scope for the modification of a species in four or five hundred generations. Make men and women sufficiently jealous or fearful or drunken or angry, and the hot red eyes of the cave man will glare at us today. We have writing and teaching, science and power; we have tamed the beasts and schooled the lightning; but we are still only shambling towards the light. We have tamed and bred the beasts, but we have still to tame and breed ourselves."

But the glory of human history is that the intelligence and conscience of man set themselves, and in the future with clearer understanding must set themselves afresh to this task of modifying their own species in the light of a supreme ideal. "Plato," says Mr. Wells as he writes upon that brilliant interlude of the earliest Greek democracies, "was from the first face to face with human discord and a misfit of human institutions. To that challenge his mind responded. One of his earlier works and his latest are bold and penetrating discussions of the possible betterment of social relations. Socrates had taught him to take nothing for granted, not even the common relations of husband and wife or parent and child. His Republic, the first of all Utopian books, is a young man's dream of a city in which human life is arranged according to a novel and a better plan; his last unfinished work, the Laws, is a discussion of the regulation of another such Utopia. There is much in Plato at which we cannot even glance here, but it is a landmark in this history, it is a new thing in the development of mankind, this appearance of the idea of wilfully and completely recasting human conditions. So far mankind has been living by tradition under the fear of the gods. Here is a man who says boldly to our race, as if it were a quite reasonable and natural thing to say, "Take hold of your lives. Most of these things that distress you, you can avoid; most of these things that dominate you, you can overthrow. You can do as you will with them."

And as he sums up the results upon humanity of those influences which arose in Greece and among the prophets of the people of Israel, Mr. Wells concludes: "So in the fifth and fourth centuries B. C. we perceive, most plainly in Judea and in Athens, but by no means confined to those centres, the beginnings of a moral and intellectual process in mankind, an appeal to righteousness and an appeal to the truth from the passions and confusions and immediate appearances of existence. It is like the dawn of the sense of responsibility in a youth, who suddenly discovers that life is neither easy nor aimless. Mankind is growing up. The rest of history for three and twenty centuries is threaded with the spreading out and development and interaction and the clearer and more effective statement of these main leading ideas. Slowly more and more men apprehend the reality of human brotherhood, the needlessness of wars and cruelties and oppression, the possibilities of a common purpose for the whole of our kind. In every generation thereafter there is the evidence of men seeking for that better order to which they feel our world must come. But everywhere and wherever in any man the great constructive ideas have taken hold, the hot greeds, the jealousies, the suspicions and impatience that are in the nature of every one of us, war against the struggle towards greater and broader purposes. The last twenty-three centuries of history are like the efforts of some impulsive, hasty immortal to think clearly and live rightly. Blunder follows blunder; promising beginnings end in grotesque disappointments; streams of living water are poisoned by the cup that conveys them to the thirsty lips of mankind. But the hope of men rises again at last after every disaster. . . ."

Of his discussion of Christianity, it is perhaps sufficient to say that Mr. Wells is not always to be trusted as a theologian, but nevertheless can be greatly valued for his fundamental religious appreciation that enables him to uncover truths which need emphasis. One may profoundly disagree with many of his judgments and feel that his interpretations are inadequate, yet no one can fail to appreciate the beauty and the challenge of such a summing up as this. Speaking of Jesus, he says: "He was too great for His disciples. And in view of what he plainly said, is it any wonder that all who were rich and prosperous felt a horror of strange things, a swimming of their world at his teaching? Perhaps the priests and the rulers and the rich men understood Him better than His followers. He was dragging out all the little private reservations they had made from social service into the light of a universal religious life. He was like some terrible moral huntsman digging mankind out of the strong burrows in which they had lived hitherto. In the white blaze of this kingdom of His there was to be no property, no privilege, no pride and precedence; no motive indeed and no reward but love. Is it any wonder that men were dazzled and blinded and cried out against Him? Even His disciples cried out when He would not spare them the light. Is it any wonder that the priests realized that between this man and themselves there was no choice but that He or priest-craft should perish? Is it any wonder that that the Roman soldiers, confronted and amazed by something soaring over their comprehension and threatening all their disciplines, should take refuge in wild laughter, and crown Him with thorns and robe Him in purple and make a mock Caesar of Him? For to take Him seriously was to enter upon a strange and alarming life, to abandon habits, to control instincts and impulses, to essay an incredible happiness. Is it any wonder that to this day this Galilean is too much for our small hearts?"

If finally one might gather from these volumes a paragraph which should express the conclusion of their thought, one might set this one above all. "Every one of these hundred of millions of human beings is in some form seeking happiness, is driven by complex and conflicting motives, is guided by habits, is swayed by base cravings, by endless suggestions, by passions and affections, by vague exalted ideas. Every one of them is capable of cruelties and fine emotions, of despairs and devotions and self-forgetful effort. All of them forget; all of them become slack with fatigue and fearful or mean or incapable under a sufficient strain. The follies of vanity entrap them all into absurdities. Not one is altogether noble nor altogether trustworthy nor altogether consistent; and not one is altogether vile. Every one of them can be unhappy, every one can feel disappointment and remorse. Not a single one but has at some time wept. And in every one of them is a streak of divinity. Each one, for all the obsessions of self, is yet dimly aware of something in common, of something that could make a unity out of our infinite diversity. And they are every one more aware of this than in 1913. Through all the world grows the realization that there can be no securely happy individual life without a righteous general life. Through all the world spreads the suspicion that this scheme of things might be remade, and remade better, and that our present evils need not be. Our lives, we see with a growing certitude, are fretted and shadowed and spoilt because there is as yet no world-wide law, no certain justice. Yet there is nothing absolutely unattainable in world law and world justice. More men are capable of realizing this than was ever possible at any previous time. And to be aware of a need is to be half-way towards its satisfaction. We call this stir towards a new order, this refusal to drift on in the old directions, unrest, but rather is it hope which disturbs the world."

"Modern Democracies."

It is a singular coincidence that the appearance of "The Outline of History" should have been followed almost immediately by the appearance of another book which brings a great scholar's reasoning to bear upon one of the beliefs that Mr. Wells most cherishes. Toward the end of "The Outline" Mr. Wells sets down what he believes to be "the broad fundamentals of the coming world state," and among them he puts this: "The world's political organization will be democratic; that is to say, the government and direction of affairs will be in immediate touch with and responsive to the general thought of the whole population." Upon the fact that democratic government has won its place in the world, Mr. Wells builds in part his strongest hope of human progress.

But does democracy vindicate this hope which is placed upon it? Does "a world made safe for democracy" mean a world which is thereby assured of increasing human benefit? The answer comes from that one among living writers whose previous work has given him most authority to speak. James Bryce (now Viscount Bryce) is known throughout the world of letters as the author of "The American Commonwealth" and "The Holy Roman Empire," and in his "Modern Democracies" he brings all his wealth of knowledge to bear upon the question of how far democracy has justified, and bids fair in years to come to justify, the faith of those who have acclaimed it.

It is a profound and noble work which Viscount Bryce has written; accurate, judicious, exhaustive; vibrant with that deep, prophetic eloquence which belongs to the man whose gaze into the future is inspired by the reverently dispassionate contemplation of the present and the past.

The whole treatment, as embraced in the two volumes, is divided into three parts. First, in fifteen luminous short chapters, are set forth the "Considerations Applicable to Democratic Government in General." In Part II, there is a discussion of "Some Democracies in Their Working," centering chiefly (after a review of the republics of antiquity) upon the governments of France, Switzerland, Canada, United States, Australia and New Zealand. Part III sums up the conclusions of the whole.

The thoughtless assumption that all is well simply because a people has attained popular government finds grave correction at Viscount Boyce's hands. "Two dangers," he says, "threaten all modern democracies. * * * One is the tendency to allow self-interest to grasp the machinery of government and turn that machinery to its ignoble ends. The other is the irresponsible power weilded by those who supply the people with the materials they need for judging men and measures. That dissemination by the printed word of untruths and fallacies and incitements to violence which we have learnt to call propaganda has become a more potent influence among the masses in large countries than the demagogue ever was in the small peoples of former days. To combat these dangers more insight and sympathy, as well as more energy and patriotism, are needed than the so-called upper and educated classes have hitherto displayed."

To those whose conviction is that underneath every human device there must be the deep foundation of religious motive if the best in our civilization is to endure, "Modern Democracies" (like "The Outline of History") brings the re-enforcement of its own unmistakable conclusion. From its pages it grows plain that the evils in popular government are the evils of undisciplined human spirits, that such confidence as we may hold for the future depends upon the extent to which the popular mind and will can be enlightened and purified; and for that work nothing which does not touch the innermost springs of character can suffice.

"No form of government," says Viscount Boyce, "nothing less than a change in tendencies of human nature long known and recognized as permanent, could have accomplished what philosophies and religions and the spread of knowledge and progress in all the arts of life had failed to accomplish. Christianity—a far more powerful force than any political ideas or political institutions, since it works on the inmost heart of man—has produced nearly all the moral progress that has been achieved since it first appeared, and can in individual men transmute lead into gold, yet Christianity has not done these things for peoples, because, checked or perverted by the worse propensities of human nature, it has never been applied in practice. It has not abolished oppression and corruption in governments, nor extinguished international hatreds and wars, has not even prevented the return of hideous cruelties in war which were believed to have been long extinct.

* * * "Less has been achieved than was expected, but nothing has happened to destroy the belief that among citizens of free countries the sense of duty and the love of peace will grow steadily stronger. The experiment has not failed, for the world is after all a better place than it was under other kinds of government, and the faith that it may be made still better still survives. Without Faith nothing is accomplished, and Hope is the mainspring of Faith. Throughout the course of history every winter of despondency has been followed by a joyous springtime of hope.

W. R. B.

The Outline of History. By H. G. Wells. Two volumes, illustrated. The Macmillan Co. $10.50.

Modern Democracies. By Viscount Bryce. Two volumes. The Macmillan Co. $10.50.

THE CHURCH AND THE CHALLENGE OF THE TIMES

By the Rt. Rev. Edwin S. Lines, D. D., Bishop of Newark

The world's history and our study and experience declare that the remedy for the ills of the time and hope for the making of a new world in which dwelleth righteousness depend upon good religion, a sense of dependence upon Almighty God and of our duty towards our fellowmen. National selfishness and forgetfulness that nations as well as individuals must be guided by high moral principles, have involved us in all the horrors of the years just gone, and in all the anxiety of the years that are passing, and it is not certain that the world has learned the lesson taught by its terrible experience. Our public men and writers are saying much about the preservation of our rights as a nation and little about our duties. No man ever made out a noble life by putting the emphasis upon his rights rather than his duties, and no nation will make out a noble record by so doing. * * *

There is nothing fine in the talk of "one hundred per cent. Americanism," "everything for America," which appeals to the crowd, nor in the note of arrogance because of our material wealth of and the deference which the war-stricken nations pay to us. We are in the trough of the sea now as regards genuine patriotism, vision of our true greatness as a nation, sense of obligation towards the rest of the world upon which the suffering and burden of the war fell with greater force than upon us. No man and no nation really prosper by taking advantage of the misfortune of others. Our ills may not be as apparent as those of some other nations, but we have full enough to make us anxious, to keep us modest and to demand all the resources of wisdom and self-sacrifice and of moral obligation that we can command. We do well to make an end of the abominable political conditions and corruptions in our great cities, of lynching and mob violence, of selfish profiteering, of the weakened sense of the sanctity of marriage and of the family, of shameful luxury and extravagance on the part of the prosperous, of the miserable streets and houses into which we drive our poor, the way in which demagogues and corrupt politicians thrive, before we invite comparisons with other nations. The Church is called down to the battle against national evils, to stand for the weak as against the strong, to denounce corruption and evil doings in high places as well as low places, and the messages of the old prophets and the words of our blessed Lord are our warrant. Let churches be made beautiful and services attractive, but let the House of God be made the place where God's poor can be comfortable, where the denunciation of wickedness and opposition and forgetfulness and regard for those in hard places in life and the championship of the weak never cease. * * *

> I dissent from the statement that the Church and its clergy should keep silent upon industrial, social and political subjects as if they were reserved for the men who have built up our industrial system, our social order and our political life. When men say that they are willing to take their religion from the Church, but no directions concerning the ordering of their business and social life, it may be said in reply that if they will take and apply good religion in all the concerns of life we ask no more, but until business and social and political life are ordered by the principles of the gospel, in the spirit of justice and mercy, those who are set to preach in Christ's name must not keep silent. The reactionaries, unmindful of what is going on in the world, the privileged people who are selfish and looking out only for themselves, are a greater menace to the country than the Socialists.
>
> A good deal passes for Christianity among us, which for its selfishness or hardness will not stand the test of the gospel, and it is time that judgment begin at the House of God.—Bishop Lines.

Let me briefly refer to some public questions and movements which are closely associated with religion, with the welfare of all our people, and with good morals and good manners. Three years ago I said that the country seemed to be making up its mind that if the American saloon would not reform itself and cease to be the corrupting and destructive influence it was, it should die. More quickly than any of us expected, and many good men thought wise, the blow fell, and prohibition of a trade which had made unutterable misery and degradation was written in the Constitution of the country, through the action of forty-five of the forty-eight States. * * * The punishment of the most insolent business in the country which defied the law, corrupted our political life, and ruined unnumbered lives, deserved its fate. No nation, no business, no man shall defy the moral sense of the world or the community and not suffer for it. Now the attempt will be made to weaken or repeal the laws which make the amendment to the Constitution operative, and that is a course which right-minded men will not take. Until three-fourths of the States have voted to repeal the amendment, it stands as the law of the land to be obeyed.

The outcry against the violation of personal liberty by prohibition is unreasonable. The restriction of personal liberty for the common good is the condition of the progress of civilization. Men cannot live together in peace and security without accepting the great and increasing restriction of their personal liberty, as every one knows who would plan to build a house and make it sanitary and not a menace to its inmates and its neighbors; as any one knows who uses an automobile. No man has a right to make himself a menace or nuisance in the community, or a burden upon it by the use of strong drink, of drugs, or firearms. No man has any right to prosecute a business which takes advantage of the weakness of other people, whether it be the sale of strong drink, gambling, the advertising of quack medicines, the degrading theatre or moving picture show, the loan shark, the rent of houses unfit for living. The American saloon is dead; let it stay dead.

We are hearing much now of the danger lest the churches should demand rigid laws that encroach upon personal liberty in respect to the use of Sunday and the operation of what are called by people who have scant knowledge of the subject, "Blue Laws." The discussion shows lack of honesty and intelligence and does not deserve respect. There will be localities in which, and by certain people, agitation for a stricter observance of the Lord's day by invoking the civil law will go on. There surely, however, is no danger of the widespread adoption of a severer tone in religion, or of measures to compel people to be religious. There would seem to be a persistent endeavor to represent the Church as hostile to the use of the Lord's day as a day of reasonable and necessary recreation for the great majority of people. The motive back of the agitation is the commercializing of Sunday. The greed for gain and not regard for the needs of hard worked people make this agitation. The business of providing for moving pictures has gone largely into the hands of people who have little regard for anything save money, and they wish to have Sunday free to increase their gains by bringing in films which are vulgar and harrowing, sensational and debasing, which make the criminal heroic and make crime familiar to the great injury of their patrons. They break into Sunday commonly by giving a per cent. of the receipts for some charitable object, and a large number of the shows, for the good of the community, might well be suppressed on every day in the week.

We must all recognize that recreation must have a larger place on Sunday than in the day when work was less exacting and monotonous and injurious to mind and body. None of us believe that the civil law ought to be invoked to preserve Sunday as a day of worship or for the service of religion. Any such action would defeat its purpose, for regard for religion must be a voluntary act, but every good and thoughtful person will wish Sunday preserved as a day of rest as largely as possible from ordinary work. It is a most blessed inheritance from the Hebrew religion and one of the most blessed services of the Christian Church that it has maintained one day in seven as a day of rest. Without the sanctions of religion it would not have existed and it would not be maintained. It has stood against the greed of men and it is the greatest possible blessing, especially to those in the hard places in life. Whoever is the enemy of the day of rest is the enemy of mankind. We are warranted not because the Church wishes the day as a day of worship, but because all men and women need a weekly day of rest to stand against the commercialization of the day and its use for gain by selfish men. More work must be done than in the simpler times; more work in the great city than in the rural village, and we must become reconciled to the sight of many things which would have shocked those who went before us. Those who are shut up all the week in factories and offices in the dull monotonous round of hard work to earn a modest living may be seen on Sunday with much more equanimity playing games than those who can choose their own times for sport, and neglect the House of God and its worship for the golf links. The loss of the day of rest, especially through the persistence of greedy men, would be a calamity for any nation. What I wish to say here is that the reproach of the Church and religion because of a supposed hostility to reasonable recreation on Sunday and the desire to bring back what are called "blue laws" is not honest and is worthy only of contempt.

Let me say that a sense of shame and indignation should come to every right-minded man or woman in New Jersey because of the prize fight arranged in Hudson County, apparently with the consent and approval of the State and county and city officials. They all deserve the denunciation of every good citizen. I recognize fully the place of boxing and wrestling among sports. But this fight means encouragement of brutality and the degradation of the State, and those who allow it deserve the severest condemnation. The only argument for allowing it that I have heard is that it will bring a great amount of money into Hudson County, a poor return for the disgrace brought upon the State. The war let loose brutal and criminal instincts which Christian civilization had restrained, and we seem drifting back to the brutality which marked the games and sports of the decadent Roman empire. That which is now planned here in New Jersey is an affront to civilization and decency.

No one can be thoughtful of what is in the minds of men and women without feeling that the Church is called upon to emphasize the supreme importance of moral and spiritual ideas about life. * * * The world seems dazzled by the examples of men who have built up great fortunes by destroying their competitors, by obtaining privileges beyond the reach of smaller companies, or by iniquitous tariffs, and who endow colleges, establish great foundations or give public libraries to communities which are rich enough to build and support their own, and there is another side to this question. It would be well if great fortunes were less, and more of them had been spent upon the men in the lower places who helped to build them up, that they may be not compelled to live in the miserable quarters, wretched streets and abominable homes which come in about many of our great manufacturing establishments. * * *

Try to get the point of view of the other man and think what hardness and injustice has been the lot of those who have, by combination, made their way to better wages and more comforts in life. It is not for me to tell you how to conduct your business, but it is my duty to tell you to conduct it in accordance with Christian principles, and I know that every violation of them shall somewhere, some how, some time, bring punishment.

The great majority of people appear to think that their main business in life is to add to the world's stock of material wealth and to its store of pleasure, that they may get as much as possible for themselves, or it may be, for the community. But the main business of a man or woman in this world is to add to the world's stock and store of spiritual possessions of righteousness and truth, of justice and kindness, of gentleness and mercy, of good will and brotherly feeling. * * *

Why should you not determine in the coming year to put your religion into action, to make your parish and community richer in righteousness and mercy, in kindness and brotherly feeling? So the community comes to true wealth and the Church to real power.

Sunday Morning at Old Vawter's Church

By Virginia Showell.

The small boy who sits today in a high-backed pew in old Vawter's Church, Essex County, Va., occasionally relieves the tedium of the first and second lessons by watching the ivy which has grown across the tall windows. The loose tendrils, waving in at the open sashes, seem to hold out tiny green hands, beckoning one to the warmth and freedom outside. Probably small boys of pre-Revolutionary days diverted themselves in much the same manner, for this church was standing when George Washington was born, as a cornerstone bears the date 1719.

The building is semi-cruciform and constructed of the alternate light and dark brick of that early period. Both interior and exterior are well preserved. Though the plaster of the ceiling is cracked in places, the marble-like smoothness of the walls reminds one of a time when men put into their work a strength and beauty often lacking today.

The floors are paved with huge stones, those within the pews being covered with boards. The pews have been cut down from their former height, but are still high and are entered by doors.

The pulpit, which was originally in one corner, is now in the center of the church, and reached by a straight stairway of nine steps. Directly beneath the pulpit is the reading desk; the draperies of both are of red velvet, quaint and old. There are two galleries, one at one side and the other at the back of the church. In this latter gallery a generation ago the choir sat and a red curtain was drawn to insure the privacy of the singers. They sing no doubt today in that heavenly "choir invisible," but a few old members can still catch the notes of their sweet voices echoing down the aisles of memory. The present organ and the choir pews are at the right of the pulpit.

That this old church stands so well preserved is due to the loving care of a few of both present and past generations. The late Mr. Richard Baylor, of "Kinloch," writing for Bishop Meade's "Old Churches and Families of Virginia," recalls a time when this church had fallen into a sad state of dilapidation and says, "I remember when the church doors always stood wide open, if indeed they could be closed, and have myself taken refuge from a storm in the body of the church, leading my horse in with me."

Mrs. Muscoe Garnett, of "Elmwood," it is said, hearing that vandals were carrying away some of the paving stones of the aisles, claimed the church as her own and threatened prosecution to the next offender. The ground on which she based her claim was that the church stood on her land.

From the same source we learn that there had been from time to time frequent periods of inoccupancy. There occurred in 1814 a faint revival of interest, as Hon. James M. Hunter and Mr. Robert Beverley are mentioned as delegates to councils about that time.

The ministers who have served within these sacred walls seem to have been, without exception, men of high character and often of ability which has obtained recognition in larger fields. If at times their sermons have grown long and their hearers have succumbed to sleep, it was only to wake again to hear words of assured worth and excellence. One of the first ministers, Rev. Robert Rose, seems to have possessed a personality which attracted more than local attention. His reputation for business ability, as well as piety, was long a matter of comment. He attended the laying out of the city of Richmond in 1751, and died and was buried there.

The service heard here today has been kept as simple and free from ritualism as in the days of the past.

The present sexton, Uncle Cephas Grant, has the air and manner of an old family servitor. He brings in the huge, old Bible, places it on the reading desk, and takes his place in a rear pew ,his air of respectful attention remaining unchanged from opening hymn to benediction.

Among the morning worshippers can be found names equally prominent in past generations—Bairds, Sales, Baylors, Browns, Brookes, Warings, Beverleys, etc. The modishly dressed women present are the direct descendants of those charming colonial ladies who rustled up these same aisles, their stiff taffetas, voluminous and elegant, their soft laces exhaling faint odors of lavender.

Having sustained their part in the service with close attention and reverence, the congregation pass out the huge doors into the sunny church yard. It is then the social hour of the day begins. Friendly neighborhood gossip is exchanged by the women, and the men gather in groups beneath the trees, their conversation equally diverting. A few old grave stones, their original use almost lost sight of by the lapse of time, form convenient seats.

Behind the church the tall grass waves softly over the graves there, which are few, since the custom of family burying grounds is almost an universal one.

The State-wide reputation for hospitality which has been famous for generations is well sustained today, and invitations to dinner can be heard on all sides. The erstwhile worshippers are whisked away in their waiting automobiles in a manner which would have made the blue ribbon winners of the past call forth a display of their owners' best horsemanship.

The sexton closes up doors and windows and the old church is left, its quiet to remain undisturbed, by human visitants at least, throughout another week. It stands so mild and peaceful in the June sunlight that one hears with surprise that it is a place to be shunned at night or to be passed with haste. For then, it is said, the undisputed possession which the morning worshippers enjoyed yields to the prior rights of the past and the old aisles know again the footsteps of some restless spirit returned to the scene of its purest, earthly memories.

I do hear
From the revolving year
A voice which cries:
"All dies;
Lo, how all dies! O seer,
And all things too arise;
All dies, and all is born;
But each resurgent morn, behold, more near the Perfect Morn."

—Francis Thompson.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE LAYMAN'S DUTY TO CHURCH STANDARDS.

Mr. Editor: Having been asked once for expression of a layman's duties towards our Church, there seemed one phase of his duty that is not often stressed in proportion to its importance, and that is, that we should jealously guard the priceless heritage of our Virginia Church standards and stand like adamant against any change. Often have the waves of change and sacredotalism thundered against us, only to recede, curling, hissing and foaming back whence they came and our impregnable position, marked by a long line of illustrious leaders and culminating in our beloved diocesan, still stands.

The student of history, though, knows that many strongholds that were seemingly impervious to outside attacks have through danger lurking within been "like ships that have gone down at sea, when heaven was all tranquility."

Who knows what a turn in the road may reveal? or when? It behooves us country laymen not to be found asleep on our post. The city laymen are usually better posted than we, but we have an equal voting power with any of the others as individuals. It was noticed by many and commented on by not a few in the last General Convention that many times useless changes in the Book of Common Prayer were side-tracked by the conservative lay vote and by it alone.

In this unsettled, restless age many things might happen to test our conservatism. Often in our councils measures of moment are changed and elections carried by a small margin one way or the other. Our whole policy of Church standards, sacred and venerated as they are, might by a combination of honest unbalanced vision, with imported undesirable churchmanship, be the cause of our whole undoing.

The rural laymen, who, like the Magi of old, live much with Nature, and through Nature looks up to Nature's God for inspiration; we who have all along gotten our bearings from the immovable fixed star, should not be blinded and lose our bearings, should the modern Wernicke comet dazzle across our path. All that is sacred, all that is worth while in our Church standards, is bound up in the cherished traditions of the mighty past; we cannot afford to take any chances, but must stand rooted to those traditions.

God grant that our Church in this grand old Diocese may have a long future of smooth sailing, and that there may be no breakers ahead, but if a change should be sprung, let us brother laymen not be stampeded and swept off of our feet, but with our backs to the wall fight to sustain and preserve the faith we love, and the way we want to worship. A change may come sooner than we look for. "What I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch."

ROBERT BEVERLEY.

Caret, Essex County, Va.

RECRUITING THE MINISTRY AGAIN.

Mr. Editor: Every one who loves his kind is profoundly interested in the success of the work of the Church. Hence any one who can suggest a probable solution of the peril involved in the paucity of candidates for the sacred ministry has a message.

In the first place, a few statistics will impress the gravity of the situation. The figures here given are taken from the last annual report of the Evangelical Education Society:

In 1883, 354,125 communicants; 1919, 1,096,895 communicants; 1883, 401 candidates for the ministry; 1919, 306 candidates for the ministry.

Which means that 1,000,000 communicants provide nearly 100 less candidates than 354,000. This contrast is the more appalling when we reflect that the world's need of Christ's message is many times more urgent today than in 1883, and that because the times are much more out of joint. Unless, then, recruits are obtained calamitous results must follow, since depletion is constantly taking place through death and retirement.

Many thoughtful solutions have appeared, showing that we are not asleep. One is that the clergy should preach and preach on social service. In examining this advice I am impressed by the fact that there were more candidates for the ministry before than since social service was stressed from the pulpit. And it is worthy of thought that while an increase of confirmations is generally reported, there is a corresponding decrease in candidates for Holy Orders. I propound this question: Is it not natural for an earnest minded young man to decide, on hearing sermon after sermon urging social service, that he will enroll himself among those who are deeply interested in social service? Then, when he is approached on the subject of the ministry he may naturally conclude that he can best serve his fellowmen as a layman. If social service be the mission of the Church, and if that the theme for the pulpit, why not merge with the Salvation Army?

But the appeal is made to preach Christ crucified for the sins of the world, our joy in life and our crown at its close. Then he is face to face with the most exalted service in life.

One may ask, What place shall be given to social service? Its rightful place; an "outward and visible sign" of our Christian faith. Let the pulpit plead the claims of the Son of God as our Saviour and our exemplar in all things. Then organize the congregation as a social service unit, laboring in His name to bless men.

The most common explanation of the failure of young men to enter the ministry is the meagre support given. This is, in my judgment, a great injustice, as might be easily shown.

I write specially to point out an obstacle which may be a more prolific source of the failure under discussion. And I invite the laity's careful consideration of what I now write. The hitherto overlooked—so far as I have read—deterrent in re is the unjust, unkind treatment which many clergymen, holy men of God, have received at the hands of vestries and congregations. I will venture the statement that a very small percentage of those who read the statement of fact that I am now making will say that they do not know of such an instance. If a list were made of the churches which have forced rectors out their cures by reducing salaries there would be great surprise. And if the names were published there would be great humiliation at least. And if listed in the annual Council journals, a reform would of necessity result. I could give the names of two promising young men, who were earnestly considering entering the ministry, but were influenced to exercise their gifts elsewhere because of the treatment shown their fathers. The fathers were men who were wholly consecrated to the ministry to which they had devoted many years to the glory of God and edification of His Church. They are now in Paradise in the midst of the precious fruits of an unselfish ministry.

If a young man, in considering the work of the ministry, were to know that the people among whom and for whom he would labor and pray, would give him their sympathetic and loyal support, and with him appeal to the Bishop when he and they were unable to agree, then he would be drawn to the ministry and not repelled. But as long as he faces the possibility even of being hindered in his work by those who should gladly hold up his hands, naturally he will serve as a consecrated layman.

I firmly believe that when Christians have learned to treat their pastors with loyalty and sympathy and render all the loving assistance in their power, God will hear our too seldom used prayer that He will send forth laborers into His vineyard.

J. W. WARE.

Clarke County, Va.

FOLLOWERS OF THE LAMB.

Mr. Editor: For at least nineteen centuries mankind has been divided into two great classes; the followers of the Lamb and the followers of the Beast. St. John, in the Revelation, depicts these two classes in no uncertain colors, showing the Lamb's followers as the only real heroes of human history.

The Lamb heroism, however, is shamelessly flouted today. Men are being deceived into mistaking brute nerve for bravery. Through militarism, prize-fighting and unpunished mob violence (North and South) they are gradually led to worship the Beast. The "ape and tiger," which Tennyson urges us to destroy, are being assidiously cultivated. Look at a few illuminative facts. In the spirit of the Lamb a pathetic appeal is issued for a million dollars' worth of clothing to cover the destitute children of Europe. At the present pace of charity, weeks, if not months, will be required to collect this clothing. Simultaneously with this appeal comes the news that considerably more than a million dollars is paid as gate money to witness a slugging match. How much quicker does this country respond to the Beast than to the Lamb!

Again, suppose Congress should appropriate a half-billion dollars to rehabilitate Europe; such a comparatively magnanimous act would electrify the whole world and would score a new victory for the Lamb. But no, Congress is not even dreaming of such a humane venture; instead, the Beast instigates our professed Representatives to appropriate good money by the near-billions for works of wanton destruction and wholesale murder, politically called war.

When such indifference or enmity toward the interests of the Lamb is manifested by both Church and State, how can the followers of the Lamb function socially? Where is that "New Age" which was promised us if we would support the World War? Our boys suffered and died for the high ideal of democracy and peace. Thank God, the heroic dead are blissfully ignorant of the war's aftermath. But, alas, the crippled, the gassed, the blind are painfully disillusioned. A world of ruins, social, financial, industrial, is the harvest.

The whole situation may be likened unto a malignant epidemic, during which the doctors and nurses have all cravenly retired to their laboratories, ostensibly to study and experiment, while countless victims are dying daily. In like manner the vast majority of theologians today are theorizing, gathering statistics ad infinitum et nauseam, and writing academic treatises while a world-wide epidemic of brutality is raging.

What shall we do? First, let us disabuse our minds of the heresy that a little "charity," here and there, will solve the whole problem. We are only patching, patching, and that very partially. The unprecedented situation challenges the followers of the Lamb to definite and heroic action. If we cannot move the Church or the State officially to do the will of the Lamb, we must assume the apostolic position and "obey God rather than men." Christ sends us forth as lambs among wolves; we must dethrone the Beast, at any sacrifice.

Isaac Watts' inspiring hymn challenges each and all:

"Be Thou my Pattern; make me bear
More of Thy gracious image here;
Then God the Judge shall own my name
Amongst the followers of the Lamb."

I shall be glad to hear directly from every one who wishes to participate in a definite course of action.

JAMES L. SMILEY.

Annapolis, Md., July 4, 1921.

The Great Commission.

SOME MISSIONARY IMPRESSIONS.

When Dr. William C. Sturgis, Educational Secretary of the Department of Missions, was in India, he was asked by three of the Anglican English Bishops if the American Church would send missionaries and other workers to India.

He was forced to reply, that disregarding any canonical objections to such a plan, the American Church had not as yet been able to serve adequately the fields where it was already engaged.

Japan will follow the lead of the United States in any move this country may make looking to disarmament, according to a statement made by Viscount Kaneko, member of the Japanese Privy Council, to William C. Sturgis, Ph. who has just returned to New York from a world tour of the mission fields.

"At a luncheon tendered me in Tokio," Dr. Sturgis said, "which was attended by Viscount Kaneko and other Japanese officials, the Viscount said: 'The moment any disarmament plan comes to us from the United States, Japan will follow the lead.'"

Dr. Sturgis says that the Japanese are exceedingly friendly towards the United States, despite the fact that jingoes are actively at work, not only in the United States, bu also in Japan, where every effort is made by them to stir up trouble between the two countries.

He also strikes a warning note with regard to the situation in Hawaii, which is not against the Japanese, but in the interest of better Americanism.

"In ten years," he says, "it is regarded as certain that the Japanese will hold the voting power in the Hawaiian Islands. This is not due so much to immigration, because the islands are United States territory, and the same immigration laws prevail there as here; but in the past twenty years the Japanese children have been growing up and becoming citizens. There is as great a need there as in this country for Christianity and Americanization among the foreign born. The tendency there, as it is here, is for the children to learn English and then to look down on their parents who cling to the mother tongue. The problem is to make good citizens of these youngsters. Here we have many races; over there their problem is with a single race."

Revisiting China after many years, Dr. Sturgis was impressed with the fact that China suffers from two great evils, "graves and graft." The Chinese do not bury their dead, but place the bodies in heavy wooden coffins on top of fallow soil. The ground then becomes sacred and cannot be used for agricultural or other purposes. Hence much of the best land is rendered useless.

As an illustration of the extent of the graft, Dr. Sturgis cited the case of the brother of the President of China, who holds eight profitable offices, the least of which pays him $10,000, Mexican, a year. At the height of the great famine, when a conference was held in Peking, this man made a long fight for the relief to be paid in cash and for the bulk of it to be distributed in his own province of Chi-li.

Bishop Graves opposed the cash distribution, and also stood firm for extending the relief to all sections and won out.

CHINA FAMINE FUND.

To the Ministers of all Churches Co-operating in the China Famine Fund Appeal:

The American Committee for China Famine Fund, upon receipt of a cable from Peking in early June stating that actual famine needs had been met, felt that the task for which it had been appointed had been accomplished and brought its campaign for funds to a close. While the committee recognized the probability that many post famine needs, such as the re-establishment of homes and care of orphan children, etc., would appear, it took the position that such needs, so far as the American Committee was concerned, might properly be referred to the missionary agencies of the churches at work in China.

In view of the sudden end of the American Committee's appeal, it is probable that sums of money contributed by churches and individuals for famine relief are now in the hands of local church treasurers. Many of these officers may be in doubt as to what should be done with such funds since the American Committee's announcement. The American Committee has no desire to receive these church funds. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the American missionary agencies working in China will be compelled to face serious post-famine problems such as have been referred to above.

The Protestant churches have been represented in this famine appeal by the Committee on Church Co-operation. This committee, in view of all the circumstances, urges that all moneys for the China Famine Fund now in the hands of local church treasurers or which may later be received, be remitted to the foreign board of the denomination concerned. This recommendation has the full approval of Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, chairman of the American Committee for China Famine Fund.

Such action will insure the use of these funds for forms of relief which the American Committee cannot undertake yet which are an inevitable result of the famine.

If such moneys are sent promptly to the foreign boards, it will be possible to learn at an early date just how nearly adequate the funds available are for China's needs.

Robert E. Speer,
Chairman Church Co-operation Committee.
July 8, 1921.

But God is never so far off
As ever to be near;
He is within: our spirit is
The home He holds most dear.

To think of Him as by our side
Is almost as untrue
As to remove His throne beyond
Those skies of starry blue.

So all the while I thought myself
Homeless, forlorn and weary,
Missing my joy, I walked the earth,
Myself God's sanctuary.

—F. W. Faber.

The scientists can teach us to talk wisely, but they cannot help us to live quietly. They do give any help in the day of the troubled heart. In that day I do not want to be reasoned with; I want to be comforted. I do not want learning; I want love. I do not want man; I want God. I do not want science; I want faith.—P. C. Ainsworth.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

CORRECTING THE DIVORCE EVIL.

It is reported that those who are touched by the divorce evil in this country now reach the enormous total of 5,585,606. This includes those who are separated and also their children.

We have been convinced for many years that the only way to correct this evil is through a Federal law, and we are glad to be able to quote one of our own bishops in advocating such measures.

Bishop Moreland, of Sacramento, Cal., has written an article for the New York Times, in which he says:

"At present there are forty-nine different codes attempting to regulate marriage and divorce in the United States. A man may be lawfully married in one State and a bigamist when he crosses the line into another. A woman may be a wife in one State, but, removing to another, she becomes neither maid, wife nor widow. Children are pronounced born in wedlock or branded as illegitimate by a change of residence. Property rights are imperiled or completely wiped out by a geographical line. Court records in literally thousands of cases, involving domicile, jurisdiction, legality of decrees granted in one State and not recognized in another, illustrate the confusion growing out of our present contradictory codes. The tragedy, heartbreak, domestic ruin created by the situation must be left to the imagination.

"Congress has recognized the need of a uniform Federal law governing bankruptcy, income tax and matters relating to property. It is inevitable that sooner or later marriage and divorce in the United States will be regulated in like manner."

But, after all, "religion is the most important agency in correcting the divorce evil," because:

"It not only rebukes vice and selfishness, holds up virtue, constancy and faithfulness as first principles of family life, but it furnishes moral strength and personal fortitude to enable the individual suffering from hardship, disappointment and lost happiness to stand firm and resist temptation.

"The home is God's own institution. Christ elevated marriage to the rank of a sacrament in His Church. Husband and wife are co-operating with the Creator for the future of the race. Therefore are they given grace to bear their common burden. Love, not passion, is the Christian law of the home. Not till passion is transformed into the calm, steady face of love is the will of God fulfilled. . . .

"It is greatly to be regretted that, generally speaking, Protestant ministers do not guard the sanctity of the Christian marriage bond as do the Roman Catholic, Episcopal and Eastern Orthodox Churches. . . . Ministers who marry divorced persons are largely responsible for the magnitude of the divorce evil. Led away by personal sympathy, forgetting or ignoring the great issues at stake, losing sight of the welfare of home, marriage and country, considering only the two pleading individuals before them, having no ecclesiastical authority to call them to account, and influenced by the prospect of a fee, these freelance ministers make it practically impossible for the Church to bring its united influence to bear upon the problem. The scandal of the situation is that not a single case of divorced persons seeking remarriage, no matter how notorious, filthy or offensive to American nostrils, has failed to find an obliging Protestant minister to give the blessing of Christ to a union which Christ pronounced adulterous.

"Here is a fruitful field for practical Christian co-operation. When divorced persons are compelled to go in vain from priest to minister, from rectory to parsonage, unable to find a minister willing to bless in Christ's name a union He has forbidden, and finally are compelled to seek a magistrate, Christian marriage will then be recognized as in a class by itself, and the whole conception of marriage will be elevated to a high position in the esteem of the American people."

GOOD WORDS FOR BLUE RIDGE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

In last week's Southern Churchman there were some cuts of the buildings at the Blue Ridge Industrial School, and we have received an account of the work being done there from an official of the United States Public Health Department, which we think our readers will enjoy.

While this work is located in the Diocese of Virginia, it is of a kind that can be duplicated in any mountain section.

The admirer of the work says:

"United States
Public Health Service,
Richmond, Va., June 20, 1921.

Rev. George P. Mayo, Monumental Church, Richmond, Va.:

My Dear Mr. Mayo:

I am writing to express my appreciation of the visit to the Blue Ridge Industrial School, for the development of which you deserve so much credit, as a very important part of the work under the supervision of Archdeacon Nese, and thank you for that opportunity of seeing a most wonderful institution, and the great results which can be accomplished in the mountains of Virginia by the Church under proper leadership.

To have converted, in the short time of a decade, the mountain side into a great religious and educational institution with many buildings for the various branches of religious, industrial and secular instruction, is certainly an achievement for which the Church may well be thankful.

The corps of workers which you have assembled there is one of which you can well be proud. There ought to be some public honor roll on which their names could be inscribed, and some means by which the Church might know of them and what they are doing. It was a privilege to meet Mrs. Cameron and see how well her work is performed, and the work of Miss Martha Richards, Miss Katherine Lawrence and Miss Margaret Lawrence is of equally fine quality.

Of course, the most spectacular part of it the day I was there was the presentation of the cantata "Saul," with Miss Margaret J. Willis at the piano, and Miss Blanch Berry and Miss Margaret Plum as the chief assistant directors. Their attractive personalities and distinctive characteristics for leadership were very impressive. To produce such a presentation of that cantata with proper costumes, and the parts so well taken by the various performers, must have required an immense amount of toil and considerable musical ability. It was a wonderful thing; a really very remarkable thing to see those mountain boys and girls perform the various parts, singing the solos and the choruses, responding to the direction of the pianist as living parts of some vitalized musical instrument.

I wish that all the persons who are interested in the problem of the mountaineer and the relation to the Church to the same could have been present to see the great crowd in automobiles, buggies, wagons, on horseback, assembled on the mountain side that day, and the very good behavior which was visible on all sides.

This is a lame attempt to show the picture with the mountains in the background yielding to an improved method of cultivation, the buildings of the institution and the people in the foreground, showing the great results of ten years' toil, and the consummate leadership of all the persons who dedicated their lives to this work."

Be quick, like Christ, to see virtues, and slow to see faults. Generous appreciation will encourage public men to hold their position. It will encourage men of worth, who are retiring in disposition, to come to the front and bear their share of public duty. Unkind criticism will keep in the background men who can best serve the Church and Commonwealth. This generous appreciation is a wonderful force to elevate society.

Church Intelligence

Americanization Conference in Milwaukee: Final Proceedings.

The final action of the Conference of the Foreign-born Americans Division in Milwaukee, June 22-28, resulted in a request from the members of the conference for another larger gathering next year in connection with the National Conference of Social Work in Providence, and in the adoption of resolutions urging more adequate preparation for specialized workers in the seminaries.

The Rev. Horace C. Fell, chaplain U. S. A., who has been engaged in recruit education in Camps Upton and Dix, addressed a special meeting of the National Conference of Social Work June 27 on Army Methods of Americanization. His contribution was distinctly valuable.

Tuesday, June 28, the final meeting of the conference of our Church workers passed a resolution bearing on the education of workers among the foreign-born. It was urged that the Presiding Bishop and Council present to the seminaries the need for provision in all or certain designated seminaries for training of three groups of men: (1) General training of all students in the outlines of the problem and provision for specialization; (2) training of men for the ministry of sister churches such as the Orthodox, Armenian, Nestorian and Old Catholic Churches; and (3) training of foreign-speaking clergy desiring to enter the work of our Church and needing further education. It was recommended that a committee of three strong men be appointed to bring this to the Presiding Bishop and Council as the earnest plea of the workers in the field.

The following resolution was passed:

Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed, with power to add not more than five to its number, for the purpose of co-operating with the Foreign-born Americans Division in arranging for a conference to be held in 1922, in connection, should it seem desirable, with the National Conference of Social Work. Said committee to be further charged with the duty of establishing points of contact between division officials and workers amongst the foreign-born throughout the country.

The Rev. J. C. H. Sauber, City Missionary of Pittsburgh, was elected as executive secretary of the conference, ex-officio member of the above committee.

The relations of the Church workers with the National Conference of Social Work were most cordial and fruitful. The hope that it would serve both to broaden the scope of the Church's work and give a more spiritual emphasis to the secular social work seemed to be realized. It was interesting in this connection that Mrs. E. E. Ledbetter, of the Public Library, Cleveland, a member of Grace Church, and the Rev. Charles T. Bridgeman were elected members of the directors of the Division for Relating the Native and Foreign-born in the National Conference.

Publicity Conferences.

Under the auspices of the Publicity Department of the Presiding Bishop and Council two conferences of diocesan publicity representatives have been held, one in New York on June 21 and 22, in the Church Missions House, and the other in St. Louis, on June 28 and 29, in the parish house of Christ Church Cathedral. These conferences covered all the provinces except the Eighth. At the New York conference there were representatives from twenty-four dioceses, and an official representative of the Third Province, and at the St. Louis conference from sixteen dioceses. A conference of representatives from the Eighth Province will probably be held in connection with the Synod of the Eighth Province in Salt Lake City in September.

The two conferences already held followed identical programs and were practically two sections of one conference, and are therefore reported jointly. They were purely round-table conferences, there being no set speeches or prepared papers.

After a general consideration of Church publicity, its aims, principles, fields, problems and difficulties, there was special discussion of the problems of Church advertising, news bureaus, headquarters publicity and local Church publications.

The conferences were strongly of the opinion that it is the duty of the Church to utilize every legitimate method of publicity that the kingdom of God may be spread among men and that the primary responsibility for carrying out this policy rests with the Publicity Department.

There was a very frank and practical discussion of the contents, appearance, purposes and distribution of the two publications, The Church at Work and Exchange of Methods. These discussions produced many valuable suggestions in the way of changes and improvements. It was agreed that the ideal method of distributing The Church at Work was through adult visitors, and that the next best method was to mail the papers from diocesan headquarters directly to all the families in the Diocese. It was urged that the fact that the paper is refused in many places and is not read by many who receive it, constitutes a strong reason for continuing to press its distribution, in order that ultimately indifference may be broken down. Resolutions were passed commending the aims and purposes of the Department of Publicity; urging the sympathetic consideration of Churchmen for both papers, and recommending that they be continued by the Presiding Bishop and Council.

Much consideration was given to the problem of reaching the families of the Church in those places where The Church at Work is not received and distributed. A contemplated proposal of the Department of Publicity to effect a combination with diocesan papers was commended and the department was urged to make an experiment of this sort. The plan contemplated is to give financial assistance to a diocesan paper if it devotes a section of the paper to general material furnished by headquarters and if the diocesan paper is circulated among all the families of the Diocese.

Both the conferences recommended the establishment of a Nati nal Church News Bureau and expressed approval of the effort of the Publicity Department to secure the formation of diocesan and parochial news bureaus.

It was strongly recommended that experienced men or women should be made members of publicity departments, and that it would be helpful if the clergy everywhere should secure the advice and assistance of some trained layman or woman, instead of attempting to carry this additional burden of responsibility personally.

The department was requested to send representatives to diocesan conventions and other gatherings to present the necessity for Church publicity and to urge upon these bodies the necessity of making adequate financial provision for the purpose.

Church advertising was thoroughly discussed and definitely approved. The use of secular mediums for Church advertising of a churchly character was commended and both conferences adopted resolutions to the effect that the Church should use the secular press as a medium for definite evangelistic advertising, this being the only medium through which the Church can reach with the gospel the great mass of the unchurched.

Posters and bulletin boards were given attention and their use outside the churches was urged, not only for notices of services and meetings, but for making the Church and her work and teachings known.

The consideration of the subject of diocesan papers elicited a great deal of valuable information regarding many of the sixty or more diocesan papers now being published, and many suggestions as to contents and the securing of parish news and the obtaining of financial support were made. The conferences were both strongly in favor of the publication of a diocesan paper in every diocese, subsidized if necessary, and urged that in all cases a systematic effort should be made to place a copy of the diocesan paper in every Church home in the Diocese.

One definite outcome of these conferences was the approval by resolution of the desire of the Publicity Department to form commissions to study various phases of the publicity problem for the benefit of the whole Church, and to report to the Church through the department their findings as to principles and methods. It was recommended that three such commissions be formed, one on advertising, one on diocesan publicity, and one on headquarters publicity, and that these commissions be composed of representatives from different sections and specially invited publicity experts.

It was urged that similar publicity conferences be held every year.

Presiding Bishop and Council Co-operate in Training Lay Leaders for Boys' Work.

The initial Vacation Camp Conferences of the season at Camp Bonsall and Camp Houghteling opened July 5.

A month or two ago, when the management was working untiringly to complete preparations, there were moments when it seemed that a good deal of faith was needed to trust in the ultimate success of this big undertaking. But just as a useful article sells itself without undue advertising, so the good work was spread about that every Church boy who was given the opportunity to attend one of these camps would do well to take advantage of it. With last year's precedent behind it and this year's promise before, Camp Bonsall is over-registered, filled to capacity, while Camp Houghteling has slightly exceeded its 1920 record. And the boys who attend the camps are not just Church boys. They are embryo leaders, picked fellows, chosen as the most promising material for future lay leadership in their prospective parishes.

From the national headquarters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Philadelphia on the morning of July 5 over a hundred boys started for Downington, Pa., for Camp Bonsall, while at the same time, from the Milwaukee boat landing in Chicago, the Camp Houghteling group started for Lake Amy Bell.

The Camp Bonsall group averages sixteen years of age, and the following dioceses are represented: Delaware, Harrisburg, Long Island, Maryland, Massachusetts, Newark, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Washington.

Indications point to Camp Carleton and Camp Tuttle, which are to be held July 25 to August 6, being equally successful. Camp Carleton will be situated at Angola, on Lake Erie, while Camp Tuttle will be in the beautiful Missouri Ozarks, near Elk Springs, Mo.

Each of the four camps has on its staff a representative from both the Department of Religious Education and the Department of Christian Social Service, while lecturers representing Church work among the foreign-born are scheduled to present this important topic.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. James D. Gibson, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, has resigned to accept the rectorship of Trinity Church, Covington, Ky., the largest church in the Diocese of Lexington, and will take charge about October 1. Mr. Gibson has been rector of St. Stephen's for five years, during which time the church has grown tremendously, and in the Nation-Wide Campaign gave the largest per capita amount of any church in the United States. Mr. Gibson was also business manager of the Southern Churchman for four years and in spite of increased cost of printing and many difficulties he carried the paper on successfully. He has many friends in Richmond and throughout the Diocese who will learn with regret of his removal from St. Stephen's.

Christchurch Parish, Middlesex County (the Rev. F. E. Warren, rector). Ground was broken for the new rectory of this parish on Monday, June 11. This rectory will be at old Christ Church and will adjoin the buildings which are to be erected for the new Christ Church School in Middlesex County.

Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill (the Rev. E. E. Osgood rector).—A very enthusiastic meeting of this congregation was held Monday evening, July 11, which in spite of the hot weather was largely attended. The reports from the different organizations in the church showed marked improvement, and that the work of the church and Sunday school was in a splendid condition. The Rev. G. M. Brydon was present as an invited guest and spoke of the coming plans of the Nation Wide Campaign.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

A Churchman's Impressions of the Christian Endeavor Convention.

Some things about the Christian Endeavor Convention just held in New York are instructive for Church leaders. It was the sixth World's Convention to be held, and official reports made to it stated that there are more Endeavorers now than ever before, that they do more work, and they give more money. There is tremendous loss from failing societies and members, but the new ones more than make it good.

The number of young men was remarkable. They numbered fully a third of the total of about 20,000. They came from every State and they attended the sessions. They were not weaklings of their sex, but vigorous in mind and body. Personal talks with not a few of them proved them to be. Many said they travel for business firms, and spend spare time in Endeavor work among people they encounter. By this plan, what amount to State secretaries are obtained in the far West, notably in Oregon, New Mexico, Colorado.

At meetings held by New York City Endeavorers previous to the convention there were apparent what almost reached rowdy methods—imitation of characteristics of political conventions, the singing of verses made up wholly of slang, catcalls to prominent members when observed in other parts of the church auditorium. The excuse was given that something had to be done to hold young people. At the convention itself, however, when people from all States were present, nothing of this sort appeared. Better conducted programs could not be found. The rowdy methods were absent. New York did not represent Endeavor.

Inquiry made of men from many cities failed to disclose any training schools. The idea seemed to be entertained in all cities that young people, if in earnest, could themselves find the things to do and the right methods to do them. Out of half a hundred inquiries, a third expressed surprise at the question, and wondered whether training schools in Christian work are essential—that is, provided people are not to be salaried.

Similar inquiries failed to disclose any attempts to solve material problems as affecting religious ones. The entire emphasis of the convention, and, so far as could be learned, that of all societies, was spiritual—getting people to accept Christ as Saviour, and to place their names upon membership rolls of churches. Beyond some social service, intended to develop the spiritual and done in part because the minister had not time, no work was disclosed.

Diligent search failed to find a single society, or single individual attending the convention, coming from an Episcopal parish. There may have been such present, but three days' attendance upon the convention, and mingling with delegates, failed to discover any. The overwhelming numbers came from Presbyterian, Congregational and Disciples of Christ or Christian Churches. There were comparatively few ministers present.

The overwhelming emphasis of the convention, and of all of the training classes, was upon development of persons in the Christian life, especially the spiritual life, who are already within the churches, their names already on rolls. Much talk was heard in the addresses about the reaching the world outside of the churches, but the idea prevailed that such work is the business of the churches, using people whom Endeavor movement has developed.

Study of training institutes held daily, and covering twelve lines of effort, failed to prove that the Christian Endeavor movement is leading in new methods. This study was made by listening to the instruction as given by chosen leaders, and by talking with the leaders outside of class hours. Public school leaders in New York, ministers in New York, some laymen in New York, in the matter of scientific management methods, are far beyond anything Endeavorers from any State, including the general offices from Boston, put up to their hearers at the New York convention. There were announcements of far-reaching plans, but they were general plans. Up to date methods whereby common men and women may realize on these aims were lacking, or if suggested were of the kind that educators have, for the most part, discarded. Little was to be learned.

The impression made by those attending the convention upon the people of New York was most excellent. This has not always been the case in the matter of religious conventions not Christian Endeavor. The over-pious, the blue-law advocate, the intolerant sectarian, have often done as much harm to some minds as they have done spiritual good to others. Not so this convention. Many members were in costume, after the manner of returned university grads at commencements, but more subdued in appearance and less boisterous in manner. The effect upon New York was sane and splendid. Especially so were Endeavorers from the South, who wore a red fez, with the word "Dixie" in large white letters across the front. It is fair to report that no convention in years has held sessions in New York, and street and other meetings pertaining thereto, and left a better impress, Christianity in real life, expressed in healthy ways, than the Endeavor one just held.

E. M. C.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, has left for Saunderstown, R. I., where he expects to stay during the summer months. He will probably make several visits to Washington during his vacation period.

The Rev. Dr. G. C. F. Bratenahl, dean of the Washington Cathedral, will go from time to time during the summer to Magnolia, Mass., to be with his family, who have gone there for the summer season.

The Rev. Dr. J. Henning Nelms, for the past thirteen years rector of Ascension Parish, has resigned this charge upon the advice of his physicians. Dr. Nelms suffered a physical breakdown, following an attack of typhoid fever last year, and ever since that time has been in Virginia, where he has sought to regain his health. He has recently returned to Washington entirely recuperated, but is giving up Ascension Parish because of the many demands made upon his strength in so large a work. He will not, however, give up his Church work entirely, having accepted an urgent invitation to be rector in charge of Grace Episcopal Church, Maywood-Woodmont, Va. This church serves the communities of Maywood and Woodmont in Arlington County, just across the Potomac River from Washington. Extensive reconstruction has just been completed on the church building, and the congregation has recently given a housewarming at which both Dr. and Mrs. Nelms were present. They will continue for the present to keep their residence in Washington.

The Bruni Memorial Window, given by Charles Bruni in memory of Mrs. Bruni, will be placed over the altar at the Church of the Good Shepherd early this fall. It is now being designed at a Philadelphia studio. The subject is taken from the Nicene Creed, "He shall come again with glory," and the imagery is taken from St. Matthew 25:31, "When the Son of Man shall come to His glory, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory," and also from portions of the Revelation of St. John. It is expected that this window, when finished, will be one of the handsomest in the city. Mr. Elwood Potts is the designer.

The Rev. C. R. Stetson, rector of St. Mark's Church, recently attended a two-day conference of the publicity department of the Episcopal Church in New York, representing the Diocese of Washington as chairman of the Press Committee of the Diocese.

Confederate Veterans Contribute to McKim Memorial Fund: At a recent meeting of Camp No. 171, United Confederate Veterans, $100 was voted for the fund now being raised for a memorial tower and chimes to the late Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim, former rector of the Church of the Epiphany. Dr. McKim was for many years a member of Camp 171.

M. M. W.

Memorial Window Dedicated: At the early service on Sunday, June 19, at St. John's Church, Georgetown Parish, D. C., there was dedicated to the memory of Thomas Hyde a beautiful stained glass window, representing the Nativity.

Mr. Hyde was one of the most highly esteemed members of St. John's Church and had held the office of warden for forty-seven years, and was a vestryman forty-one years, having been elected to these offices in 1872 and 1878, respectively. He was treasurer of the parish from 1868 to 1872. At the time of his death he was treasurer of the National Cathedral Foundation.

ALABAMA

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

Church of Ascension, Montgomery, Free of Debt.

The Church of the Ascension, Montgomery, Ala., recently celebrated its release from debt by a service at which the $5,000 mortgage was publicly burned. This church was built in 1910 in the suburbs of the city. Its congregation, while small, has been very much in earnest. Plans are now being formulated for the building of a parish house. The Rev. Peerce N. McDonald is rector of this parish.

The Board of Religious Education, in the Diocese of Alabama, is making a concerted effort to have a large delegation at the Summer Training School for Workers at Sewanee, Tenn., August 9-22. Already a number of the clergy and laity have signified their intention of attending this conference.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Anniversary of the Rev. Dr. J. D. Wing Observed.

By a strange coincidence the eleventh anniversary of the ordination to the priesthood of the Rev. John Durham Wing, D. D., and the sixth anniversary of his rectorship of Christ Church, Savannah, fell together on Sunday, July 3. To mark this event a meeting of the congregation was called by the senior warden, Mr. J. Randolph Anderson, at the close of the morning service on that day, and appropriate resolutions expressing grateful and lasting appreciation of the splendid service he has rendered, affection for him, and assuring him it is the earnest hope and prayer of each member of the congregation, that in the providence of God he may be spared to minister to them for many years to come, were passed.

E. D. J.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

Diocese Plans Appropriate Celebration of Bishop Weed's Thirty-fifth Anniversary as Bishop.

The Church Club of Jacksonville is to become a Diocesan House if the club's plans carry. The whole Diocese is invited to assist in making August 11 next notable, it being the thirty-fifth anniversary of the Bishop's elevation to the Episcopate. They propose to express their gratitude to God and their diocesan in tangible form. It is proposed to lift the seven thousand dollar mortgage on the property and add three thousand for repairs. Rooms then will be provided for clergymen and churchmen visiting the city on diocesan business free of charge. The Bishop himself having hitherto given half the sum now proposed to the club, makes necessary not only our noblesse oblige, but due and tangible recognition of thirty-five years of unwearied faithfulness in serving the Diocese and the whole State. A reception will be tendered the Bishop Thursday, August 11, during which time congratulations and gifts are invited from wherever the Bishop is known. Those who have been confirmed by the Bishop will be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity. Inquiries will be cheerfully answered by the president of the Church Club, the Rev. Charles W. Frazer, 2112 Laura Street, or the treasurer, Mr. George H. Ford, Hill Building, Jacksonville, Fla.

CUBA.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

The Fifteenth Annual Convocation.

The opening services of the fifteenth annual convocation of the District of Cuba, consisting of Morning Prayer and the ordination of priests, were held on June 22 in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana.

The business sessions of the convocation were held in the building used for the Cathedral School for Girls, in the Vedado, a suburb of Havana, the ladies of the Cathedral congregation serving luncheons on the two days of the sessions.

The Rev. J. M. Asheton-Martin was elected secretary.

Other elections and appointments were as follows:

Treasurer, Mr. W. L. Platt; Registrar, Mr. E. G. Harris; Archdeacon of Havana, the Rev. W. W. Steel; Archdeacon of Cuban Work in the Provinces of Havana and Matanzas, the Rev. F. Diaz-Volero; Archdeacon of the Oriente, the Rev. William Watson.

The Council of Advice: The Rev. Messrs. W. W. Steel, G. B. Meyers and F. Diaz-Volero; and Messrs. H. A. Himely and W. L. Platt.

The business of the convocation was entirely of a routine nature. The interest centered in that part of the Bishop's address which related to the importance of increased contributions on the part of the congregations in Cuba, with reference to self-support at the earliest possible date.

The Bishop stated that our native ministry is larger in proportion than that of any other communion working in Cuba, larger than obtains in the Roman Church.

The Bishop called the attention of the convocation to two obligations resting upon people: The general one of giving to all good causes, which rests upon all men, and that which rests upon the confirmed members of the church; the paying of the current expenses, the maintenance of the buildings, etc., together with the living of the clergy.

The members of the convocation devoted most of their time to the discussion of this subject of the self-support of the Cuban Church, and the best means of its attainments.

Another subject of very considerable interest was that of the new Church hymnal which is being prepared by the Rev. William Watson, Archdeacon of the Oriente. Mr. Watson is very musical, has a wide knowledge of hymns and hymnology, and an excellent knowledge of the Spanish language, in which the new book must be published. A provisional hymnal with one hundred hymns will be printed first, and later the larger work with several hundred hymns.

Some of the most pressing needs of the Church in Cuba are: means for the erection of buildings of all sorts, churches, rectories, parish houses, school houses, and for their proper equipment; and means for the work of translation, and for the publication of proper literature, for Sunday school instruction, for the education of the native ministry, and for general distribution by way of information, all which literature must be in Spanish.

W. W. S.

ERIE.

Rev. Jno. C. Ward, Bishop-Elect.

The Conference at Conneaut Lake.

The third annual conference for Sunday school workers in the Diocese of Erie took place at the above summer resort beginning June 27 and concluding July 7. There were about one hundred and thirty delegates present, including about forty of the clergy, and Bishop W. H. Overs, of Liberia, Africa. Early communion was celebrated each day, and during the morning also of each day. The Rev. F. G. Budlong conducted a very useful and needed devotional hour. The general speakers, Mrs. Loman, Mrs. Roberts, Miss Sibley, Mrs. T. J. Bigham, Miss L. M. Jones, Mrs. E. J. Searles, Mr. John C. Sheriff, Mrs. Reineman, the Rev. L. L. Riley, the Rev. R. N. Meade and the Rev. R. E. Schultz, gave valuable addresses and answered questions on their several subjects, all connected with "The Christian Nurture Series."

The sessions were opened by an address by the Rev. Edward J. Owen, of Sharon, who has spent much time and thought concerning the Sunday school problems. The Rev. F. G. Budlong each afternoon gathered the clergy together, and in the most informal and practical manner led discussions on "Preaching the Word."

(Continued on page 22)

Family Department

JULY.

1. Friday.
3. Sixth Sunday after Trinity.
10. Seventh Sunday after Trinity.
17. Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Ninth Sunday after Trinity.
25. Monday. St. James.
31. Tenth Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Eighth Sunday After Trinity.

O God, Whose never-failing providence ordereth all things both in heaven and earth; We humbly beseech Thee to put away from us all hurtful things, and to give us those things which are profitable for us; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

"Faith Is the Victory."

Still will we trust: though earth seem dark and dreary,
And the heart faint beneath His chastening rod,
Though rough and steep our pathway, worn and weary—
Still will we trust in God.

Our eyes see dimly till by faith anointed,
And our blind choosing brings us grief and pain;
Through Him alone who hath our way appointed
We find our peace again.

Choose for us, God, nor let our weak preferring
Cheat us of good Thou hast for us designed:
Choose for us, God—Thy wisdom is unerring,
And we are fools and blind.

Let us press on, in patient self-denial;
Accept the hardship, shrink not from the loss;
Our portion lies beyond the hour of trial,
Our crown beyond the cross.

—W. H. Burleigh.

Chums.

"You seem to have been quite fortunate with that boy of yours," said Mr. Pullen, who was launching with a friend at his club. "I wish you could give me some points. I have a chap five or six years younger, and he's already a problem. I am afraid that the job of being a wise father is almost beyond me."

"Why don't you try being a chum, then?" asked Mr. Harmon. "When Dick was about fifteen he got into a foolish schoolboy scrape that resulted in a bill for damages of ten dollars or so. I knew nothing about it till a week afterwards, when he came to me, considerably embarrassed, and made a clean breast of it.

"'Why didn't you tell me before?' I asked.

"'Well,' said Dick, 'I was in hopes I could borrow the money from some of my friends and pay a little at a time without your knowing. But they were all as hard up as I was.'

"'Didn't you consider me as one of your friends?' said I. While he hesitated an idea came to me. 'Well, anyway,' I said, 'I'd like to be one from now on. I am still something of a boy, and I'd really like to have a chum of about your age. What do you say? Why can't we get together often and talk over our affairs, including our troubles and scrapes, if there are any—share our secrets, in fact—just like any other two boy friends?'

"At that Dick rather opened his eyes. 'Do you mean, dad,' said he, 'that you will tell me all about what you've been up to, same as I'm to tell you what I have?'

"Well, perhaps that wasn't just the way that I had thought of it. I guess that when I had spoken of our affairs and our secrets I had really meant his. However, I wouldn't draw off. 'Yes,' I said, 'I'll be as frank with you as you are with me. It must all be in strict confidence, of course.'

"We shook hands on it; and I soon came to enjoy our little intimate chats, ranging from baseball to business, and from school matters to politics, although at first it did seem to me that I was opening up a little more freely than he was.

"My business at that time made necessary a good deal of traveling. One night, at a hotel, I ran across an acquaintance, a prosperous manufacturer, who asked me to join him and two of his friends in a little game to pass away the time. I never cared for that kind of thing, and I was absolutely without skill; but Jones insisted, and I went along. Pretty soon it was suggested that some small stakes would make it more interesting; and, not to go into particulars, when we got through I was interested to the extent of about a hundred dollars. I went to my room fairly ashamed of myself. Then I thought of Dick, but I shook my head.

"I had to come to it, though. What kind of confidential terms would we be on if I was keeping back from him the only thing that I was really ashamed of? I guess that no boy ever dreaded a session with his father any more than I did my next confidential talk with Dick; but I got through with it after a fashion, and he was disposed to let me off easy.

"'Never mind, dad,' he said. 'Forget it. You don't have to do it again. That new camera that I spoke to you about—I'll get along without that now; and it will partly help to make up the loss.'

"He had misunderstood me in one particular, and I had to explain that it was Jones who had lost, while I had won.

"'Oh!' said Dick; and I couldn't help seeing that for the moment I had risen somewhat in his estimation.

"'But that makes it worse,' I said. 'I can't keep the money, and yet I don't know how to get rid of it.'

"'Give it back to the man,' Dick said.

"'He wouldn't take it,' I said.

"Dick thought a minute, and then he said, 'If you tell the man how you feel, perhaps he will take the money back and give it to the Y. M. C. A. or some other good object.'

"Good logic or not, I acted on Dick's advice. At first Jones scoffed at the idea; but when I explained the situation and asked him to do it on the boy's account, he finally took the money, and the Y. M. C. A. got a contribution from 'a friend.'

"'Now,' I said to Dick afterwards, 'I don't ask any promise from you, because you were not the one at fault; but I'll promise you that I'll never help pass away the time that way again.'

"A few weeks later I met Jones. 'Hello!' he said. 'Want another little game?'

"'No, thank you,' said I.

"'Well, you couldn't have it with me if you did,' said he. 'I've quit that for good. Fact is, I've got a youngster coming up; and it occurred to me that if I could do something on account of your boy, it was a pity if I couldn't do something on account of my own.'

"As for Dick and me," Mr. Harmon continued, "we have kept on being pretty chummy from that day to this. I don't say that that would be the ideal relationship in all cases; but as far as I can see, it has worked out pretty well so far for both of us."—Youth's Companion.

Conscience Undefiled.

It is not enough to possess a conscience, but we have to educate the conscience so that it may tell us truly in its discernment of right and wrong. If conscience can be educated, it can also be depraved. It can become diseased so that its perceptions have become misty.

It is a perilous thing to speak in comparative terms of a present age. We do not believe that this is a worse age than others that have gone before. There is much of evil, but there is also much of good. We are too near to see all the interrelated elements which come in to form the composite picture of the whole of the present, and compare it with other generations.

But we can see this, that there are so many things about us serving to undermine standards, that soundness of conscience is imperiled. The excellent standards of sincerity, honesty and purity, while they may not be swept away, yet are endangered by things which every one sees and hears and reads about every passing day. The amusements of the people, the modes of dress, the themes of our modern books, the subjects of our modern drama, both spoken and screen, the increasing evils of the divorce court, these things and others are very near to us. The greatest danger they present is a threatened sapping of the people's conscience.

It would be a Mrs. Partington task to seek to check the tide of Fashion. Fashion will have its way. It is quite possibly true that prevailing modes of dress carry in themselves no harm. But they do carry danger in that they are a relaxing of the former restraints of modesty, and modesty is one of the supporting bulwarks of purity.

So it is, too, with the spoken drama of the stage, and the silent drama of the screen. It is a simple defense to point to the fact that the themes presented have their actual counterparts in real life, that they are only showing life as it is, and that no harm is done unless the spectators carry the seeds of harm already in their hearts. And, again, there is the threat of danger in that patrons, youths and maidens, children who should still be in innocent ignorance of life's sordid viciousness, are made so familiar with the world's evil, that they can readily mistake the abnormal for the normal, and have their developing standards blasted in the bud.

The very difficulty of our living today brings its danger to the development or the maintenance of a sound conscience. The increasing dissatisfaction with the way things are, discontent with the present conditions under which life must be lived, is exalting the spirit of regard for self, is cultivating the business of getting all one's own, and tends to debase regard for others, to choke out sympathy, charity, disinterested thought and unselfish service.

If all these things and a dozen others like them in the world today are added together, still you haven't reached the seat of the world's trouble. They are all symptoms of a deeper spirit of evil. It would take a wise man to tell where the spirit comes from. Perhaps we are just reaping the harvest sown by the incoming of the millions of strangers to this country in the past forty years, people with various ideals all commingling and just bearing their hybrid fruits. Perhaps it is because the whole world in all its parts has been brought closer together than it has ever been before. The war may have a good deal to do with it, only it started before the war. Perhaps the war is itself an added symptom, and not a cause—certainly it has not been a cure, as many had hoped. It is like an epidemic, whose source and course and length of stay no one can accurately determine.

We know that the man whose heart is pure can go forth into the midst of this age of ours and stand as firm as in any other age of the world's history, four square to the world, unshaken by the things around him from purity, earnestness, sincerity, honesty and truth.

We also knew that the man or the woman whose spiritual edifice is not built on a firm foundation suffers the attack of things which blur the conscience, and dim the light which it would throw out along the paths of right and wrong. It is easier for the man or the woman, for the boy or the girl to miss the beauty of purity, honesty and truth, and to be led by low ideals, for the things that are seen and heard and read about and talked about in the world today.

It is not enough to possess a conscience. We must have that conscience educated. We must preserve its standards. We must keep it undefiled. For the Christian, there is only one course of training in which the conscience may be schooled, only one fountain source where it may be refreshed, reinvigorated and kept pure and strong, and that is in the knowledge of Jesus Christ. The sweet gospel of the Master comes as always into this world that is about us, and above the things that stain and soil the soul, throws a full, clear light upon the things of God, showing up the fullness of their beauty, so that we desire them for our own. —Church News (Mo.).

"God Reigns."

God reigns, and let the earth rejoice!
I bow before His sterner plan.
Dumb are the organs of my choice;
He speaks in battle's stormy voice,
His praise is in the wrath of man.

Yet, surely as He lives, the day
Of peace He promised shall be ours,
To fold the flags of war, and lay
Its sword and spear to rust away,
And sow its ghastly field with flowers!
—Whittier.

A War Incident.

There was one captain who was shot. Some terrible wound. He had always railed at things religious. He called to one of the nurses:

"Get me a Waldensian pastor!"

What? None was near. She replied that she would call a priest. The dying man howled with profanity. No, he did not want a priest, and would not have one. The nurse tried to calm him, and spoke of repentance and making his peace with God. No, he would not hear a word of it! He demanded a Waldensian pastor. She told him that there was none within call. Just then a priest came, and she asked him to speak to the man. He did so, and got curses in response.

"I tell you I want a Waldensian pastor!" he cried.

Then something strange happened. The priest said to the nurse that there was a Waldensian in another tier, but he had had both legs mangled, and there was something the matter with his chest. He was not a minister, but all Waldensians are godly. Maybe he would do.

"Let us have him come," the priest said.

Then he told the man, "All right, and to be patient, and he would bring a Waldensian." He went to have this done. They brought the Waldensian on a bed and laid it beside the other's bed. The man had become quiet while this was being done. As soon as they had the bed in position the nurse spoke to him. Then she threw her arms back and shuddered. For an instant she thought he was dead. But he opened his eyes.

"Here is the Waldensian!" she said.

The man who had called for help opened his lips and tried to speak. The Waldensian, looking toward his comrade, said:

"Please get our heads close to each other."

It was done. There was a whispering between the two. There was no time to be lost. Death was counting the seconds for the one. The other was in pain. I do not know what that solemn ministration meant. After a little the Waldensian said to the nurse:

"If you please, I cannot control my arm, and will you life my hand that I may lay it on his head?"

His arm was paralyzed. She did so. Then he prayed, speaking very low, and those in the other beds looking on. Curses now? No, not one. The nurse turned away her head to wipe the tears. When she looked again the dying man's face relaxed, and in a moment it was all over. She lifted back the other's useless arm.

"Yes," the Waldensian said, "it is all right. Let me lie here a while."

When they came to remove the dead man, the other was ready to go, too. He had died. His loving ministry had exhausted him.—S. S. Times.

Prayer in the Family.

"Family prayer is the nutriment of family piety, and woe to those who allow it to cease. I read the other day of parents who said they could not have family prayer, and one asked the question: 'If you knew that your children would be sick through the neglect of family prayer, would you not have it? If one child was smitten down with fever each morning that you neglected prayer, how then?' 'Oh, then they would have it.' 'And if there was a law that you should be fined five shillings if you did not meet for prayer, would you find time for it?' 'Yes.' 'And if there were five pounds given to all who had family prayer, would you not by some means arrange to have it?' 'Yes.' And so the inquirer went on with many questions, and wound up with this: 'Then it is but an idle excuse when you, who profess to be servants of God, say that you have no time or opportunity for family prayer.'"—Spurgeon.

In the Morning.

Say to thy soul: "Soul, wait awhile! Enter not so heedlessly upon the daily round. Bethink thee, this is a day which it hath cost God long ages to fashion forth. For it had to grow out of yesterday—out of thy doings and others' doings, and His own thought and help and patience.

Wherefore this day, which seemeth to thee so like unto other days that thy acquired capacities and experience might suffice for competent discharge of its affairs, is indeed not like, but different. It is God's newest handiwork, the fruit of His longest patience.

Darest, thou lay on it thy clumsy fingers, until first; in the quiet, His commission shall have sounded in thine ears afresh, and He shall have passed His promise to inspire thy weak endeavor?"—Professor Hogg, Madras Christian College.

Adoration.

That undisturbed song of pure consent,
Are sung before the sapphire-colored throne
To Him Who sits thereon,
With saintly shout and solemn jubilee
Where the bright seraphim, in burning row,
Their loud uplifted angel-trumpets blow
And the cherubic host, in thousand choirs,
Touch their immortal harps of golden wires,
With those just spirits that wear victorious palms,
Hymns devout and holy psalms
Singing everlastingly.
—Milton.

Holiness.

"I have been reading about holiness," said one to me the other day; "I do wish I could find it." "Find it!" I said; "you mean find Him. Holiness is Jesus Christ." "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God." A week later my friend came to me with a radiant face. "I have found Him."

We think and talk about holiness as if it were getting into the King's garden, climbing over a wall by tremendous effort, or getting in as a great favor, and plucking a flower which we wear in its fragrance for a day, and keep it pressed and treasured, a faded remembrance of the King's grace. No; holiness is ours only when we open the door of our heart unto the King, that He Himself may come in and make this barren place the garden of the Lord, a very paradise wherein He may walk and talk with His child.—Mark Guy Pearse.

In Life.

O God, forgive
That now I live
As if I might some time return
To bless the weary ones who yearn
For help and comfort every day,
For such there be along the way;
O God, forgive that I have seen
The beauty only; have not been
Awake to sorrow such as this,
That I have drunk the cup of bliss,
Remembering not that those there be
Who drink the dregs of misery.
But since I may not, let me spend
My strength for others to the end.
For those who tread on rock and stone
And bear their burdens all alone,
A larger kindness give to me
A deeper love and sympathy.
Then oh! one day
May some one say,
Remembering a lessened pain,
"Would she could pass this way again."
—Eva Rose York.

For the Young Folks

The Lady Night.

The Lady Night has come again,
And all the winds are still:
I close my eyes, and rest my head
Against the window-sill.

The sky is buttoned with the stars,
The hills have hid the sun,
And through the meadows, far away,
I hear the river run.

In daytime, when the sun is out
And all the flowers are gay,
I laugh and shout and run about
And tumble in the hay.

But when the Lady Night has come
From lands behind the hill,
She lays her finger on my lips
And makes me very still.

—Miriam Clark Potter, in Youth's Companion.

The Blue Byke.

PART II.

George did not need to be called in the morning. He was the first one up, and glad indeed to find that the chicks had passed the night successfully. After breakfast he gave them some hard-boiled egg, chopped fine, and bread-crumbs, and plenty of sour milk to drink. It was a joy to watch the little fellows tap away at the food and stand around the saucers of milk, throwing their little heads far back as they drank. As it was best to feed them every three hours, mother volunteered to tend them while George was at school. I really think she enjoyed them quite as much as George and father. In fact, I am sure she did.

One afternoon George was delighted to find an egg in one of the nests. The next day he found three, then two, and the next six. From then on, not a day passed that he did not have some eggs to mark down in the ledger father had given him for his accounts.

School was soon over, and George was delighted with the prospect of having more time to spend with his pets. Nor did he forget his promise to his father about caring for the large family garden. It was fun to dig in the garden with his flock of little chickens around him as they followed his hoe along the rows, picking up the bugs and worms. Never before had the garden been so well kept. They had far more vegetables than they could use themselves, and one day his father told him that he might sell the extra vegetables and have the money for his bank.

Gradually his savings grew. Nearer and nearer seemed that wheel that father and mother thought he had forgotten. With the ten-dollar gold-piece Uncle John had given him for Christmas, he had nineteen dollars in the bank—nearly half enough!

One morning, as he was coming back from an errand for mother, he met Uncle John.

"Will you give your mother this birthday gift for me?" he said, holding out a small package.

"Is this mother's birthday?"

"It sure is. Didn't you know it?"

"I'd forgotten, Uncle John. Of course I will give it to her. When are you coming over to see my chickens again?"

"I'll be over soon," said his uncle, as he nodded a good-by.

On his way home George thought of all the help his mother had given him in caring for his chickens and how neatly she had arranged the vegetables for him. "Mother has been awfully good to me," he said. "I wonder if it would please her if I bought a birthday gift for her." Automatically, his footsteps turned toward the hardware store. "I guess I'll ask Mr. Elting what mother might like," he thought, as he gazed longingly at the blue byke.

As he entered the store Mr. Elting smiled from behind the counter and said, "Well, young man, do you want that bicycle?"

"Yes, I want it some day, but not now, Mr. Elting. This is mother's birthday, and I want something for her. I wonder what she'd like?"

"Here is a nice fireless cooker that she has always admired, George," the storekeeper said laughingly, enjoying his joke immensely; "or would you prefer a nice bread-knife?"

"How much is the cooker?"

"Fifteen dollars."

"D-d-did mother say she would like one?"

"Yes, George, she was admiring it only yesterday. But don't think about it, my boy; it's too expensive. I was only joking. We have some dandy new bread-knives that are just the thing."

George took a long, lingering look at the blue byke and then turned to Mr. Elting. "Will you send up that cooker this afternoon?" he said. "I'll come right back with the money." And he ran out of the store before Mr. Elting had recovered from his astonishment.

After taking the necessary money from his bank, George ran back to the store. It was a proud boy who passed the window, with head up, saying to himself, "I don't want the old wheel, anyway!" He laid his money on the counter; nor could he resist telling Mr. Elting, as he pocketed his receipt, "I earned part of that myself."

Mother was the proud one that night, but George could not understand why she cried when she met father at the door.

A few days later his father asked George to come out into the garden with him. As they were walking up and down the rows Mr. Usher noticed an enormous tomato on one of the vines.

"What have you here, son?"

"Isn't that a beauty, father? And have you noticed the cauliflower?"

"Why, no, I haven't," Mr. Usher replied. Later, when they had finished inspecting the garden, he said, "You've done well, son. Chickens and a garden make a good combination. We have never had one like this before. We must place an exhibit in the garden show next week."

With his father's help George placed his entries in the show—a fine sight it was, too, made up of his best specimens. All the town was there, and many were the cries of wonderment bestowed on the mammoth tomato. Great was his delight when he learned that the blue ribbon of first prize had been awarded to his exhibit.

While he was gathering up his produce after the show was over he heard a voice behind him say, "Here is the young man who grew that tomato."

George turned. There was Mr. Elting and a strange gentleman beside him. "This is Mr. Castle, the seed man, George," he said.

George shook hands heartily, but acknowledged Mr. Castle's compliments to him on his success with some embarrassment.

"Young man, that is the handsomest tomato I have ever seen. As it is our business to obtain such prizes for our stock, it gives me great pleasure to offer you fifty dollars for that splendid specimen, and all the seed you can use next year."

"Do you mean that you are offering me five dollars for one tomato?" stammered George, who thought he had misunderstood the sum named.

"Not five, but fifty. It will be worth more than that to us for advertising, as Mr. Elting tells me it was grown from our seed."

George was speechless for a moment, but, at Mr. Elting's suggestion, gladly accepted the offer. With fifty dollars in his pocket, he ran straight for the hardware store. All his longing for the bicycle had returned in full force; his face glowed in anticipation. As he neared the store he strained his eyes at the window. It was empty! With a sinking heart he entered the store and asked the clerk for the wheel.

"Mr. Elting sold it this morning, George; I'm awfully sorry. But we have others just as good."

"I don't want any just as good," said George, unable to conceal his disappointment. No wonder, after waiting so long without being able to buy it; and now, when he had the money, the wheel was gone! He walked slowly home. What good was the money in his pocket? It would not buy him the one thing he wanted.

As he came into the house his mother called, "Is that you, George?"

"Yes, mother."

"Did you feed the chickens?"

"No, mother."

"It will soon be dark. You had better hurry."

He walked slowly out the back door, his eyes dejectedly on the ground. When he finally looked up he gave a whoop of joy. What was that leaning against the chicken-house? It was the blue byke! On a tag, tied to the handle bars, was written,

"To the son of whom we are so proud.
With love from Mother and Father."

—David Hammond, in St. Nicholas.

The Pop-gun Gift.

Ever since the last meeting of the Children's Society Jack had been thinking about the orphan children, for Miss Frances had told them about a box they wanted to send to the Orphan Home for Thanksgiving. Jack had hugged his own "mother dear" tighter than ever that night, and had stayed awake until father came in so he could kiss him three times.

He made up his mind before he left the meeting that he was going to send a present in that box to some boy that didn't have any father or mother, and since the thing he wanted for himself most of all was one of the pop-guns in the toy store window, he decided that was what he would send to the orphan boy. It was not one of the five-cent pop-guns, nor even one of the blue and red ten-cent kind. It looked just like a real, sure enough gun and it cost twenty-five cents. That meant that Jack would have to carry in twenty-five boxes full of wood. He hated to carry in wood, but father gave him a cent every time he filled the big box, and he did not know any other way to buy the pop-gun. Every day when he didn't want to carry the wood he thought about the orphan boy, who would get to shoot the pop-gun, and that made it easier.

At last the day for the November meeting came and Jack started out with the pop-gun tied up in a box. On the top was a card written in his best hand, "From John Melvin Campbell, Jr.," for that was Jack's real name. He had shot the gun just twelve times to be sure it worked all right.

When Miss Frances called for the gifts for the Orphan Home, Jack took his box up front. He looked around to see what the others had brought, and there was not another single soul that had come up with him.

Miss Frances' face was very sober. "Did none of the rest of you bring presents?"

"I forgot," came in a chorus.

"Mother was too busy to get me anything," said two girls at once.

She gave Jack's hand a tight little love squeeze as she took his package. "I will wait a week longer to send the box, so you may all have another chance to bring something to go in it."

When she went home she stopped at the parsonage to see Dr. Snider. "I just feel like giving up, pastor," she said. "I talked to the children and told them all about the Orphan Home, and they all seemed interested, but not a one of them brought a present but Jack Campbell. His means something, though, for his mother told me he made every cent of the money to buy it by carrying in wood."

"I feel like giving up, too," said Dr. Snider; "we have 639 members in our church, and every year we have tried to get up a box for the Orphan Home. Sometimes we have failed to get anything at all, and we never have sent one I was not ashamed of." His face was very sober, too, as he added, "Let me have that gun for a few days."

There never was a pop-gun that had so many experiences as Jack's pop-gun had in those days.

Dr. Snider took it into a big wholesale grocery that belonged to two of his members and told them about the big wood box and the orphan children, and the one little boy who had come to pack the box for their big rich congregation. The manager cleared his throat several times and wrote down shipping directions for a barrel of sugar, to go to the Orphan Home. Then he marked out the one and made it two barrels. "That's easier for me than carrying in twenty-five boxes of wood." After that Dr. Snider did not feel a bit like giving up. He went from one house to another, and everywhere he showed the people the pop-gun and told them about how he happened to have it.

He took it into stores and offices and into homes. He did not ask anybody for a thing. He just told them about the orphan children and the big wood box and showed them that pop-gun, and told them that Miss Frances was going to try again on next Thursday to pack a box.

When Thursday came around it took two wagons to haul the things that had been left in the church basement for the box, and there was a whole envelope full of bills of lading for things that had been sent directly to the freight office.

That night, when Jack's mother was telling him his bedtime story, she told him of the little lad who had brought five loaves and two fishes to Jesus and how Jesus had fed five thousand men with them. Then she told him of how his gift had gathered more gifts until all of the children at the Orphan Home would be fed by them, and made happy for many days, and there was a happy feeling in Jack's heart whenever he thought of the pop-gun.—Selected.

The Failure.

Have you ever heard of the town of Yawn,
On the banks of the River Slow,
Where lazy the life and listless the air,
Where blossom the Waitawhile flower fair,
And the soft Goeasies grow?

It lies in the valley of Whatstheuse,
In the province of Letherslide,
That tired feeling is native there;
It's the home of the listless Idontcare,
Where the Putitoffs abide.

This town is as old as the human race,
And it grows with the flight of years.
It is wrapped in the fog of idlers' dreams,
Its streets are paved with discarded schemes,
And sprinkled with useless tears.

—Selected.

The Maiden and the Halo.

"I do wish that I had a halo," she said, as she looked at the face in her mirror with its curves, fresh tints and brightness of youthful beauty. "It would be so becoming and make me look fairer. Perhaps I can buy one."

But she could find none on sale even in the richest gift shops, and the shopkeeper could tell her of no one who dealt in these rare treasures.

"But they must be found somewhere," she thought, "for not seldom do I see some one with a halo, either faint or bright, about the face. I will ask my father. He almost always wears his. Surely he will help me to find one for myself when he knows how I long for it. And she asked him at once, but her father, laying his hand tenderly on her shoulder, replied:

"My dear little daughter, I have no halo. It is only your dear love for me that makes you fancy you see one about my head. Such a thing is too precious for me, and I cannot buy one for you, much as I should like to."

"I will ask my friend Sylvia," next thought the maiden. She sometimes wears a little halo that seems to belong to her and makes her look sweeter than ever."

Sylvia, surprised at the question, said only, "Friend of my heart, you are seeing visions. No halo have I, much as I should like one."

Then the maiden thought: "There is Uncle Goodwill. I have often seen him wear a halo when he is helping some one, as he does so gladly and in so many ways."

She asked him, but Uncle Goodwill would have his kindnesses spoken of as little and as lightly as might be.

"Why, maiden fair," he said with a laugh, "it is just the sunlight reflected from my smooth, bald head that you take for a halo. Ask some one else."

Next the maiden went to good Aunt Lois, around whose sweet face she had many times seen the shining of gold in the midst of thronging cares, the cries of noisy children, and constant labor for others.

"Oh, my dear, how could you have such a fancy? Even if I had ever found a halo, I should never have time to spend on keeping it polished and bright enough to wear. I am sorry that I cannot help you this time."

The maiden knew one more person to ask. The woman who had been coming lately to scrub the floors had an unmistakable halo, strange to say. "She will come again today, and I will question her."

"A halo, miss," said the worker, looking up from the floor to the eager, young face. "To be sure, it would be pretty for you, but it isn't for a body like me. How should I look with it on, and it would be in the way when I clean corners so that I couldn't do my work well at all. No, indeed, miss, I never had any such thing or even a thought of it."

Failing in her quest, the maiden said in her heart, "Strange that they cannot tell me, strange that they do not know! And their halos are so plain to see."

Then as the serious years of life came, and many slipped past, one by one, bringing common, wearing schoolroom duties, heavy burdens, bright joys, and deep sorrows, she thought no more of her youthful wish. At the close of one hard day, as the maiden, no longer young, was sitting alone and weary in her class-room, another maid, bright with the brightness of sixteen summers, came to her, saying eagerly:

"Dear teacher mine, please tell me where I can find a halo like the shining one that you wear. I do so want one for myhelf."

In surprise our maiden looked up, saying gently, "My dear girl, you are mistaken. I have no halo, though I used to long for one when I had no more years than you."

"But we girls and boys have seen it about your head so plainly and so often. We have spoken of its beauty."

"No, no, child; your bright eyes are seeing what is not there."

Yet when the maiden was left once more alone, heavenly peace and humble gladness filled her heart.—Presbyterian Banner.

The "Talking Thread."

The first phonograph records were wax cylinders that had to be handled very carefully and were very bulky. Then the disk record was invented, and it proved so rugged and handy that the cylinder record had to give way to it. But disk records are fragile and quite liable to crack if dropped.

As a substitute for the disk record, an inventor has recently brought out a "thread" record, which is so compact that a five-minute talk may be coiled in a watch case. The thread is made of a special composition, and on it the point of a recording needle cuts the record in the same way that the ordinary recording needle cuts its record on a disk or cylinder. Then the thread is run through the machine under a reproducing needle, and the thread gives back the sounds that have been recorded upon it.

One thing that has to be guarded against is twist. If the thread turns over on its side, the reproducing needle will not bear on the record; and so care must be taken to run the thread through with the record side always uppermost. Any ordinary thread will twist, because it is made up of twisted fibers; but the inventor calls this thread "structureless"—that is, it has no twisted fibers in it, and hence it can be wound up or reeled off without showing any tendency to twist.

The advantages of this kind of a record are apparent. Instead of writing a letter to your friend, you may put your message on a thread and send it to him or her by mail.—A. Russell Bond, in St. Nicholas.

The South's Best Book Store

HUNTER & CO

105 E. Broad Street

Richmond, Va.

Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen

Prompt and Reliable Service

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER.

All summer hats reduced. $15.00 hats to $7.50; $10.00 hats to $5.00. Avail yourself of this opportunity and wear a pretty summer hat.

103 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

COUNTRY BOARD.

IN PRIVATE FAMILY, ON LARGE plantation near Rapidan, Va. Shady porches and lawn; large, comfortable house; modern conveniences. No children. Address Box 64, Rapidan, Va.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—LADY, WITH COLLEGE DEgree, to teach high school mathematics in Southern Boarding School for girls. Address Willanow, care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—A TEACHER IN PRIVATE family. A refined Christian woman to teach three children in first, fifth and sixth grades. Music and French desired. References exchanged. Give references and salary desired in first letter. Mrs. J. S. Cochran, Brookewood, Augusta County, Va.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN elderly lady for three months or longer. Attractive home in the country near Annapolis. Duties not hard. Require reading aloud and general attention. Please addresss communication to Mrs. R. B. Dashiell, 90 Duke of Gloucester Street, Annapolis, Md.

SITUATION WANTED.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant or matron in a school, or as chaperon in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, MIDdle-aged woman, capable of taking entire care of children, wants position as nurse for one or two little girls. Can sew. Address "S. L. H.," care of Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, BY refined, capable woman, position as useful companion or housekeeper for lady. Address Mrs. H., care of Southern Churchman.

ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, GREAT EXperience, highest references furnished, wishes position in parish having good field for teaching. Address Organist, 4054 North Hermitage Avenue, Chicago.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

NATHANIEL BEAMAN.

Died in Norfolk, Va., June 15.

In the death of NATHANIEL BEAMAN, president of the National Bank of Commerce, Norfolk has lost one of its most loyal and useful citizens and the Episcopal Church one of its most faithful and devoted members.

Mr. Beaman was born in Murfreesboro, N. C., but came to Norfolk in 1880 and entered business. His career has been not only one which brought him what the world calls success, but one of continued service to God and to his fellowman. He was devoid of personal ambition, and he filled no public office, except in the service of the city. It is safe to say that when he died he was one of the prominent citizens of Norfolk, but it was the prominence not of position, but of character. All men trusted him, and all who knew him loved him.

The life of Nathaniel Beaman is a remarkable exemplification of the power of personality to make itself felt, in spite of an innate modesty, through the force of purity, honesty and a readiness to help in every way his fellowman. Quiet, unassuming, full of simplicity, he went his way through life cheering those whom he met, and ready at any time to take his part in every good work.

The large congregation which gathered in Christ Church, of which he was an earnest communicant, to honor him when he was laid to rest was a tribute to the place that he had won in the hearts of the people of Norfolk.

He was a man of marked ability in business, of wise judgment and of broad vision. The work that he did, however, as the head of a great financial institution is not to be compared to the fact that he did it without losing the power to sympathize with the struggling and the poor, without a touch of arrogance or of hardness, but always with a simple willingness to help and to serve, which expressed itself in his kindly voice and his gentle smile.

One of the most touching tributes offered at the time of Mr. Beaman's death was a gift of flowers and a note from a colored woman, sent, as she wrote, as an expression of gratitude for the remembrance of one who had always been kind and helpful and courteous to her people.

His kindly spirit, his broad altruism, his readiness to sympathize were not only a part of himself, but they contributed, unconsciously to him, to his business prosperity. There would be no question of conflict between what is called capital and labor if all men did their part in life in the spirit of loving fellowship which dominated the career of Nathaniel Beaman.

He was an earnest and faithful member of the Church, always ready by counsel and service to do his full part, not only to advance the interest of his own congregation to which he was devoted, but those of the parish and of the Diocese.

What he was in the home that he loved, as husband and father, only those to whom he was bound by these closest or human ties, can know. In all the relations of life he was guided by a sense of duty, learned through fellowship with Christ, with whom he kept in daily touch.

And then, unexpectedly, to those whom he met day by day, he was called from the lower life to the higher, from the earthly tabernacle to the temple of God in the heavens. And so he died, as one who passes from one room to another, realizing the ever nearness of his Saviour, Christ.

Christ leads us through no darker rooms
Than He went through before.

We can give thanks to God for the good example of this His faithful servant, who has been gathered unto his fathers, having the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, in favor with his God and in perfect charity with the world.

B. D. T.

Comfort Your Skin With Cuticura Soap and Fragrant Talcum

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. Samples free of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars

ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.

9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning

FEET

that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE

Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.

Flowers of Quality

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.

Special attention to out-of-town orders. Samples sent upon request.

615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

R. L. Christian & Co.

514-16 E. Broad St.

Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocers

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES.

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Nick Bull's Market

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME.

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

One of "two books which only America cares enough to produce and publish."—Expository Times

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF CHRIST

BY FREDERICK C. GRANT

Rector of Trinity Church, Chicago

Associate Editor of the Anglican Theological Review.

The author seeks to present the Life of Jesus in such form as will appeal religiously and educationally to youth of thirteen or fourteen years. The method employed has been largely the narrative, though the teachings of Jesus have been held quite constantly in the foreground. The author has handled his material in such a way as to bring into clear consciousness and give vital force to the motives which Jesus' character and teaching inspire in young lives.

"It makes no attempt to be inspirational, but quotes the Bible at the most touching parts of the story."—Minneapolis Tribune.

"If there is a better book for the use of classes early in the beginning of their study of Christ and Christian teaching we have not seen it."—The Christian Advocate.

Illustrated. Net, $1.25; by mail, $1.35.

AT THE BETTER BOOK SHOPS

THE ABINGDON PRESS

NEW YORK CINCINNATI
Chicago, Boston, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Kansas City, San Francisco, Portland, Oregon

The Evangelical Education Society

Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia.

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M. A.

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board

E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President

J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas.

DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

The messages of the Rev. R. E. Schultz on "Church Loyalty" were convincing, broad-minded and of the utmost help.

The social side at these meetings was not forgotten, and the feeling of fellowship among all present was quite real. At one of the evening meetings Bishop Overs gave a remarkable address on his work in Liberia. The Bishop is a statesman as well as an ecclesiastic. There was an interesting exhibit of Church supplies, including many valuable books as necessary helps to the Nurture Series. As the nation-wide efforts grip the Church of God, the Christian Nurture Series and the Church School Service League will all function to the great good of all concerned, but people must not be too hasty or unkind in speech or written words because others cannot see everything at once. Our Church is not a sect of a few years ago; we have roots in the past; mere novelty for work or design does not grip Church people unless they see it is absolutely necessary. But these conferences have a bright future if we are patient and prayerful, and work.

R. S. R.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

St. Stephen's, Sewickley; Memorials Dedicated.

The memorial tablet to the men of St. Stephen's who served in the World War was dedicated with appropriate services on Sunday evening, July 10, by the rector, the Rev. A. C. Howell, D. D. The address was made by Mr. Samuel Hardin Church, president of the Carnegie Institute.

The tablet, which is of bronze and beautifully designed and executed, bears the names of eighty men who served actively with the colors, two of whom made the supreme sacrifice.

There were also unveiled two memorial windows, viz.: "St. Paul" in the South Transept, given by the congregation in commemoration of Lieutenant Tingle Woods Culbertson, and Lieutenant Charles Hyde, Jr., both of whom died in France, August 5, 1918, and "Sir Galahad," in the Narthex, given by Mrs. J. D. Culbertson, Sr., in memory of her son, Lieutenant Tingle Woods Culbertson.

NEVADA.

The Rev. Edward J. Hoering was found Friday morning, July 1, by passing automobilists, wandering in a dazed condition near the town of Winnemucca. He had been shot through the head, just back of the eyes. He was clad only in his underclothes. Since then his clothing, with the exception of his trousers, has been found. He is rational and says he went for a walk Tuesday evening, June 28, and after reaching a point about a mile from town, turned around to return, and remembers nothing more until shortly before he was found by the tourists. Search was not made for him because it was thought he had gone to one of his various missions. He is unmarried.

The surgeons do not hold out any hopes of his recovery. If he lives he will be blind, as the optic nerves were cut by the bullet. He is in a hospital at Reno.

Mr. Hoering is vicar of the missions at Winnemucca, Battle Mountain, Austin, Midas and Lovelock.

Personal Notes

The Rev. W. L. Loflin, formerly rector of St. Peter's Church, Norfolk, Va., has taken charge of St. Luke's Memorial Church, Cleveland, Tenn.

The address of Chaplain Sydney K. Evans, U. S. N., has been changed from U. S. S. Pennsylvania to U. S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

The Rev. John A. Gardner has resigned the rectorship of St. James' Church, Providence, R. I., and will take up missionary work in Oklahoma the first of September.

The Rev. Alexander E. Hawke, rector of St. John's Church, Parsons, Kan., who has accepted the call to become the rector of St. Andrew's Church, Emporia, Kan., will take charge on September 1.

The Rev. Thomas F. Opie, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Red Springs, N. C., is now convalescing from a recent operation for appendicitis at Connelly Springs, N. C. In September he will supply at Blowing Rock and will probably take up his regular work in October.

Ordinations.

In St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, Idaho, on June 11, St. Barnabas' Day, Bishop Touret ordained to the priesthood the Rev. W. R. R. Simmons, the Rev. A. Leonard Wood and the Rev. W. S. J. Dumvill. They were presented by the Ven. Howard Stoy, the Rev. Thomas Ashworth and the Rev. Martin Damer. The Rev. A. Leonard Wood is in charge of Grace Church, Glenns Ferry; the Rev. W. S. J. Dumvill is in charge of the two missions at Shoshone and Hailey; and the Rev. W. R. Simmons is in charge of the missions at Gooding and Wendell.

In St. Mary's Memorial Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., on the fourth Sunday after Trinity, June 19, Bishop Whitehead advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Ross Randall Calvin, Ph. D. The Bishop preached and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Walter N. Clapp. Other clergymen present and uniting with the Bishop in the laying on of hands were the Rev. Messrs. C. J. DeCoux and R. B. Evatt. In the latter part of July Dr. Calvin will take charge of the Church of the Transfiguration, Clairton.

Deaths.

The Rev. Hugh D. Wilson, Jr., for the last two months Canon Missioner of the Diocese of Newark, died Tuesday night, June 28, in St. Luke's Hospital, New York, at the age of forty-two. Funeral services were held at Trinity Cathedral in Newark Friday afternoon, July 1.

It is hypocrisy to pray, "Thy kingdom come," and then not do anything, or give anything, or sacrifice anything, for the sake of promoting that kingdom.—The Bishop of Carlisle.

Basil, the Monk.

Four hundred years ago, long before the United States was thought of, there lived in the mountains of Montenegro a good man of great learning who was called Basil the Monk. He was the Bishop of Niksic. He ruled over a monastery in a fertile valley, and far and wide everybody loved him.

But in those days there was war between the Turks and the native people of the Balkans, and one day the Turkish soldiers won a great battle and came through the valley, killing and burning. The people fled before them, carrying the little children, and seizing what they could from the homes they were leaving. The good Bishop Basil went with them. From the high, bare mountain tops they looked down and saw the soldiers destroying their village and driving away their cattle and sheep.

They were hungry and cold in the mountains. There was nothing but rock beneath their feet; nothing but boulders and cliffs of stone all around them. But the good Bishop counselled and comforted them, and since his monastery was destroyed he set to work to make another where he was. He began to cut into the solid granite of a cliff among the clouds, and after many months he had made two small rooms with a door and a window

By this time the Turks had gone, and the people went back to their valley. But Basil the Monk remained in these rooms, thousands of feet above the village. A dog, a cat and a rooster lived with him. Often he went down to see his people and to give them lessons in religion, history and industry. The cat, the dog and the rooster always went with him. The rooster walked in front of him, stepping proudly on the narrow trail and sometimes stopping to stand on a boulder and flap his wings and crow. The dog followed him sedately, and the cat rode on his shoulder. When the people heard the rooster's crow echoing among the cliffs above their heads, they smiled and said, "Basil the Monk is coming." Then mothers put another stick on the fire in the center of their huts and added another handful of beans to the pot, while all the children went to meet the good Bishop.

"Learn to till the soil," he told them, "and always be kind to animals. Each family should have a dog to give alarms, a cat to keep the house free from rats and mice, and a rooster to awaken the household so that work may begin at dawn. Thus from the animals we learn prudence, cleanliness and industry."

Those who heard him thought that these were wise words. They repeated them to each other, and so it came about that all Montenegro knew them. When Basil grew old and died the people told their children about him, and when the children grew up they told their children. So, although there were no books and no one could read or write, the story of Basil the Monk was kept alive through the centuries.

The two rooms he cut from the granite cliff have grown into the large and beautiful Monastery of Ostrog, in the mountains between Niksic and Podgoritza. In the whole country every bit of fertile earth is cultivated, even places too small to hold more than one plant. And to this very day, in all Montenegro, every family keeps a dog, a cat and a rooster.—Rose Wilder Lane, in Junior Red Cross News.

There are two freedoms—the false, where a man is free to do what he likes; the true, where a man is free to do what he ought.—Charles Kingsley.

Caught in the Act.

One fine May morning about seventy years ago a little French bootblack was standing at the entrance of the Pont Neuf, one of the finest of the many bridges that cross the Seine between the two great divisions of Paris.

The boy was watching for customers, but there was none to be had yet, for it was too early. At length, finding nothing else to do, he took a piece of chalk from the one untorn pocket that he possessed and began to sketch a face upon the stone parapet of the bridge.

A strange face it was, very broad across the jaws, and narrowing as it sloped upward, so that, with its curious shape and the pointed tuft of hair that stood up from the high, narrow forehead, it looked at a little distance like an enormous pear. But it was plain that this was the likeness of some real man, and that the boy was immensely amused at it, for he chuckled to himself all the time he was working, and more than once laughed outright.

So intent was he on his picture, which was now nearly finished, as to be unconscious that some one else was much interested in it, too.

A stout, gray-haired old gentleman, very plainly dressed in a faded brown coat and shabby hat, and carrying a cotton umbrella under his arm, had come softly across the road, slipped up behind the young artist, and was looking at the pear-like face on the wall with a grin of silent amusement.

And well he might, for, strange to say, his own face was the very image of that which the boy was sketching so eagerly. The queer, pear-shaped head, the large heavy features, the tuft of hair on the forehead, and even the sly expression of the small, half-shut eyes, were alike in every point. Had the little artist not had his back turned, one might have thought that he was drawing this old man's portrait from life.

But just as the boy was in the height of his abstraction, and the single looker-on in the height of his enjoyment, the old gentleman happened to sneeze suddenly, and the sketcher turned around with a start. The moment he caught sight of the old fellow standing behind him he uttered a faint cry of terror and staggered back against the wall, looking frightened out of his wits.

"The king!" he muttered, in a stifled tone, as if the words choked him.

"The king, at your service," answered the old gentleman, who was indeed no other than King Louis Philippe of France. "It seems that I have come up just in time to serve as a model. Go on, pray; don't let me interrupt you!"

The boy's first impulse was to take to his heels at once; but there was a kindly twinkle in the king's small gray eyes which gave him courage, and looking slyly from the pear-like head to the royal model, he said, "Well, your Majesty, I didn't mean to make fun of you; but it is like you—isn't it, now?"

"Very like indeed," said the king, laughing; "and I only wish the pears in my garden would grow half as big as that one of yours. However, I'm afraid I haven't time to stand still and be sketched just now, so I'll give you a likeness of myself"—putting a gold twenty-franc piece (which was stamped with the king's head) into the boy's brown hand—"to copy at your leisure."

There was in Paris a few years ago an old French portrait-painter who told his friends and patrons that the first portrait for which he had ever been paid was that of King Louis Philippe himself, and he declares that "the old gentleman was not such a bad fellow, after all."—Henry Ross, in St. Nicholas.

The Peddler and the Monkeys.

Once a peddler was carrying his pack through a forest in South America. The day was warm and the way was long.

By and by he grew tired, and sat down to rest under the shade of a tree. He opened his pack and took out some caps. Putting on one of them, he soon fell asleep.

When the peddler awoke his caps were all gone. He began to look about for them.

Hearing a chattering among the branches of the tree, he looked up. There he saw a number of monkeys, and, strange as it may seem, some of them had red caps on.

As you know, monkeys are great mimics. They had seen the peddler put on a red cap, so they must do the same thing. They came down the tree, slyly picked up the caps, and away they ran.

The peddler called on the monkeys to bring back his caps. The more he called, the louder they chattered.

The poor man began to think that his caps were lost for good. How could he get the little rascals to bring them back? He tried many plans, but all in vain.

At last he pulled off his own cap and threw it on the ground. "Here," he cried, "if you little rascals will keep all the rest, you may have this one, too!"

No sooner had he done this than the monkeys mimicked him. Each pulled the cap from his head and threw it on the ground. Then the peddler gathered them all up and went on his way. —Virginia Guide.

"When you ask God for your bread today, thank Him for what He gave you yesterday.

WANTED.

WANTED—TWO SECOND-HAND wheel chairs; one for a crippled man, the other for a little girl twelve years old, who has permanent spinal trouble. Both live back in the mountains and are quite out of reach of any help except that supplied by the Church Mission. Persons having wheel chairs to dispose of can communicate with Miss Margaretta James, Deaconess in Charge, Holy Cross Mission, Batesville, Albemarle County, Va.

WANTED—BY A REFINED YOUNG lady, a position as companion or nursery governess. Address "L.," care of Southern Churchman.

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.

Banking Hours-

Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M.
6 P. M. to 8 P. M.

3% Allowed on Savings Accounts

Medical College of Virginia

(State Institution)

MEDICINE DENTISTRY PHARMACY

New buildings—Well equipped laboratories under the direction of full-time competent teachers.

The Memorial Hospital, Dooley Hospital and St. Philip Hospital are owned and controlled by the Medical College of Virginia and offer every facility for thorough clinical training. Staffs composed of the faculty of the College. Additional clinical facilities are offered through the Virginia Hospital, City Home, City Jail, etc.

For full information and catalogue, address

J. R. McCAULEY, Secretary, RICHMOND, VA.

WHEN YOU LEAVE HOME

AUGUST 1-12

Carry Yourself and Suitcase to the University of Virginia

You will enjoy a Summer School for Pastors, Teachers, Lay Workers and Ought-to-Be-Workers

This School will hold its sixth session under the auspices of the P. B. R. E. and Boards of Religious Education of the Dioceses of Virginia, Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia.

There will be no registration fee. Arrangements will be made to accommodate every one in the University boarding houses. Reservations should be made early with Mr. Beverley M. Boyd, P. O. University, Va. The cost will approximate

Table board, per day..... $1.25 to $1.50
Lodging, per day..... .50

Write for fuller information as to lectures, advantages and expenses to MR. BEVERLEY M. BOYD, UNIVERSITY, VA.

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 56[illegible])

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President — E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary — J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent — Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

R. Geissler, Inc.

56 West Eighth Street, New York
Memorials
FOR THE CHURCH
Furniture — Windows — Fabrics

School Desks

Opera Chairs, Folding Chairs, Church Pews, Kindergarten Chairs, School Supplies, Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

To Mothers

And all Friends of Children:

What will you read to your boys and girls this summer to give them a religious message they will love?

Thousands have found the answer in

Sunny Windows

By W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

Author of the Children's Year.

The first edition is already exhausted, and the second is on the press.

CLOTH, $1.25 NET

For Sale by
SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN
Richmond, Virginia

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 23, 1921. No. 30.

Hereafter

Thou knowest not now; for here we see but darkly
The outlines of His Grace;
The rest is learned in Heaven's eternal glory,
And face to face.

Then shalt thou know; that passionless
hereafter,
Shalt solve all mystery:
Dream not that life can hold the tide of wonder
In store for thee.

EDUCATIONAL

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other partriculars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean,
Petersburg, Va.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautifu Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation

CHAS. J. SMITH President

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B.,
Prin., Box 356-S

Posse Normal School for Gymnastics

Massachusetts, Boston, 779 Beacon Street. 33d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to the Secretary.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office addres to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Oh, ask not thou, "How shall I bear
The burden of tomorrow?"
Sufficient for the day the care,
Its evils and its sorrows.
God imparteth by the way
Strength sufficient for the day.
—Unknown.

Friends of mine, don't carry unsmiling faces with you! For, by doing so, you may be the ones to keep something worth while from the world. The effect that you have upon your friends—and even upon perfect strangers—may be a profound and lasting one.—M. E. Sangster.

Dead things are made; living things must grow. In finding this law of growth in the Bible we find the evidence of its life. We find also the witness of the tenderness of God's providence which slowly unfolded to men the revelation of Himself and His love as they were able to bear it.—W. Boyd Carpenter.

If everything stood still, or only moved round in a circle, it would be a dreary and a dreadful thing to live. But we rejoice in life because it seems to be carrying us somewhere. We bear with incompleteness, because of the completion which is prophesied and hoped for.—Phillips Brooks.

POTOMAC UNIVERSITY

offers for the eighteenth year systematic instruction by correspondence.
College of Liberal Arts,
School of Theology,
The Graduate School.
Degrees Granted.
For catalogue, address
1881 Third Street, N. W.,
Washington, D. C.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT,
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. From Montessori through College Preparatory courses. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health, outdoor life.

Boarding department planned for 1922.
ROSALIE HAXALL NOLAND, A. B.,
Principal.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D.,
CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D.,
PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

EDUCATIONAL

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

GUNSTON HALL,

1906 Florida Avenue, Washington, D. C.
A School for Girls.
Established 1892.

Preparatory and Academic Courses. Two years' post-graduate and college work. Music, Art and Expression; Domestic Science; Business and Secretarial Courses. Required athletics under trained supervision. Mrs. Beverley R. Mason, Principal.

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

WHEN YOU LEAVE HOME

AUGUST 1-12

Carry Yourself and Suitcase to the

University of Virginia

You will enjoy a Summer School for Pastors, Teachers, Lay Workers and Ought-to-Be-Workers

This School will hold its sixth session under the auspices of the P. B. R. E. and Boards of Religious Education of the Dioceses of Virginia, Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia.

There will be no registration fee. Arrangements will be made to accommodate every one in the University boarding houses. Reservations should be made early with Mr. Beverley M. Boyd, P. O. University, Va. The cost will approximate

Table board, per day..... $1.25 to $1.50
Lodging, per day..... .50

Write for fuller information as to lectures, advantages and expenses to MR. BEVERLEY M. BOYD, UNIVERSITY, VA.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

Medical College of Virginia

(State Institution)

MEDICINE DENTISTRY PHARMACY

New buildings—Well equipped laboratories under the direction of full-time competent teachers.

The Memorial Hospital, Dooley Hospital and St. Philip Hospital are owned and controlled by the Medical College of Virginia and offer every facility for thorough clinical training. Staffs composed of the faculty of the College. Additional clinical facilities are offered through the Virginia Hospital, City Home, City Jail, etc.

For full information and catalogue, address

J. R. McCAULEY, Secretary, RICHMOND, VA.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.
Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

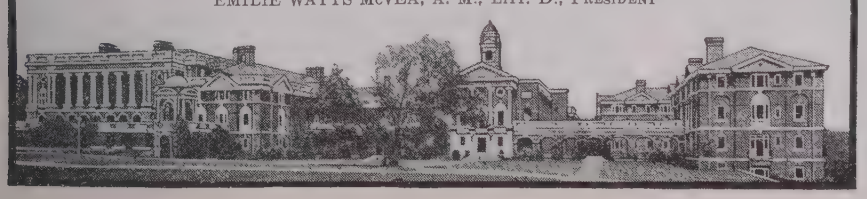
JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

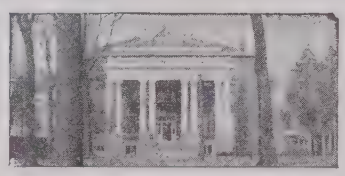
Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster



Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES



Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
BOX 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL

A Boarding and Day School for Girls under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. General and College Preparatory Courses. Music and Art. Intermediate and Primary. Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Pres.; Rev. W. R. Mason, Rector. Third term begins April 1st. Catalogue sent on request.

(Miss) EMMA YERBY, Principal,
Charlottesville, Va

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5001 Woodland Avenue.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

SERVICE

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State.
Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 23, 1921. No. 30.

A FURTHER STATEMENT REGARDING DR. SHIPMAN

Two weeks ago we stated our position in regard to the protest which is being made in certain quarters of the Church against the consecration of the Rev. Herbert Shipman as Bishop-Suffragan in the Diocese of New York. After seeking to review the facts with fairness and impartiality, we said that it seemed to us that the Bishops and Standing Committees, on the evidence as it stood, would take a very grave responsibility if they withheld consent for Dr. Shipman's consecration.

Our position had the advantage of detachment. The New York Churchman, from ties of personal association and because it is printed in the Diocese which elected Dr. Shipman, is, by every natural instinct, his defender. The Living Church, on the other hand, represents that section of the Church which feels itself personally aggrieved by utterances of the Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge, of which Dr. Shipman is President, and of the Chronicle, of which magazine he is one of the Board of Editors. But the Southern Churchman, as it so happens, has no direct affiliation with either side of this disagreement. We do not belong to the wing of the Church which would have occasion to take umbrage at anything the Chronicle or the Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge would be likely to say. Neither have we, on the other hand, any ties with Dr. Shipman and his friends in the Diocese of New York. We have never so much as seen him or spoken to him personally. We are interested in the whole matter simply with reference to the fairness of the issue and the good of the Church at large.

We should not be true to an increasing conviction if we did not say that it seems to us more and more clear that consent to Dr. Shipman's consecration ought to be given, and that the withholding of consent by any considerable number of Bishops and Standing Committees would be an exceeding peril to the peace of the Church. Increasingly we believe that opponents have failed to make out a fair case against him, and some methods have been used in the fight against him which seem to us discreditable in their ignorance and narrowness of mind. We refer particularly to a circular sent out by the Clerical Union for the Maintenance and Defense of Catholic Principles, which sought to create prejudice against Dr. Shipman on account of his having taken part in a memorial service in a Jewish Synagogue. A more lamentable distortion of Christianity and common sense than the idea that such a gracious act of human sympathy should be supposed to count against a man's standing in the Church, it would be hard for us to imagine.

For the editor of The Living Church we cherish the high respect, the honor and personal liking which is his due, and which we believe is his possession, from practically all the Church. We know that he has been wholly conscientious in the protest against Dr. Shipman, of which he has been the most conspicuous spokesman. But we believe he is mistaken, and we sincerely trust that he himself will realize that to be the fact. In The Living Church of June 25, the editorial stated, "Let no one seek to complicate this delicate problem by representing that the issue is a partisan one. The question is, first, whether the responsible head of the society which, through its organ, hurls charges right and left against those Churchmen with whom it differs is fit to be made bishop, and second, if fit, whether an episcopate that would begin with such a handicap would be for the best interests of the Church." We quite believe that The Living Church does not mean to be partisan. We believe it wants to rest the case on the two points which itself sees fit to select and emphasize; and it is precisely because of the failure of these two points that the whole protest seems to us to fall to the ground. From the evidence which we have sought impartially to weigh, though it be true that Dr. Shipman is technically the head of the Society for the Promotion of Evangelical Knowledge and is associated with the Chronicle, it does not appear to be true that in spirit and intent he has been back of the kind of expressions which The Living Church resents. Still less is it true, and this is the crux of the whole matter, that Dr. Shipman is a man of the character and temperament which The Living Church editorial would indicate—character and temperament such as to make him hostile, uncharitable, and therefore of necessity unwelcome in his ministry as Bishop to the Churchmen of the "Catholic" group. All the evidence which we have read, the testimony of Bishops, of clergymen and laymen who know him best, goes to demonstrate the exact opposite. The implications which The Living Church would seek to draw from the fact of Dr. Shipman's official connection with a periodical collapse before the living fact of the manner of man which those who know him best overwhelmingly hold Dr. Shipman to be. There is no use trying by paper argument and inference to invalidate the vital impression which a man creates among his fellows every day.

In conclusion, therefore, we believe that The Living Church and all conscientious men whom it represents, no matter how sincere they may have been in this issue, are mistaken. We believe, furthermore, that if the protest against Dr. Shipman is pressed, it will result in grave damage to the harmony of the Church. We do not believe for a moment that The Living Church or its editor wants this, but this is what will come. The protest, if continued, will set men of different opinions at odds. If successful, it would make New York feel that its choice had been defeated by a party spirit, which, in the heat of their disappointment, many men would call vindictive. It would tend to draw the lines sharply, and to provoke war, in many dioceses between the "Evangelical" and "Catholic" parties. If The Living Church should recognize that its inferences concerning Dr. Shipman were mistaken, and that so grave a matter as a prevention of his consecration is therefore, after all, not justified, it could, without discredit, but with large honor to itself, withdraw this protest. This, on the basis of the facts, we believe it ought to do. We trust that this it may do.

In any case, we hope the Bishops and Standing Committees will promptly consent to Dr. Shipman's consecration.

PAY THE CHURCH OUR OBLIGATIONS

On another page is printed a statement from Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer of the Church, concerning the present status of payments in the Nation-Wide Campaign. It is startling news. The payments in June fell behind the payments for June of 1920 by $130,042.06. The net gain in receipts which had been recorded this year up to June 1 is by this much reduced.

There is just one thing to be supremely urged at this moment. Every single parish should make an immediate effort to pay its obligations in full to date, and every vestry should ask its treasurer whether he has done so. The Board in New York ought not to have to pay needless interest charges for bank loans; and to save this waste, every dollar that belongs to the Nation-Wide Campaign ought to be forwarded. Parish treasurers have no right to hold money back either through carelessness or in order to borrow from it for their local expenses. The general Church has a right now to the money which the people have given for it.

Book Notices

The Parent and the Child. By Henry Frederick Cope. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

"Surely in every church," writes the author of this book, "there ought to be a class for parents in order that the church might guide them in their work, the very first, most essential and critical of all work, in religious training. Such a class should hold itself very close to the real and practical."

Ministers and all others who feel the tremendous need of more intelligent training of our people in the matter of religious education of boys and girls will say "amen" to that statement. There is growing everywhere recognition that churches can do no more vital service than helping fathers and mothers think through intelligently the problem of the education in character of their boys and girls. One reason that there has not been more effort to develop groups for study of this kind has been a sense of perplexity as to where to find guidance. This book both illustrates and supplies the need. It is simple, definite and direct. It takes up the actual difficulties which thoughtful parents are confronted with today, and discusses them on the basis of actual facts and real instances. It should be of exceeding value to many readers.

B.

Genesis; Volume I of the New-Century Bible. Edited by W. H. Bennett. Oxford University Press. $1.25.

In every respect this book is an admirable example of what a manual intended to stimulate study of the Bible ought to be. Its compact size, about 6½ inches by 4¼ inches, makes it exceptionally convenient to carry about in the pocket for study in odd moments. It is inexpensive, which is a rare virtue among books in these days. And best of all, it is written with admirable scholarship, with great clearness and with a thoroughly constructive purpose. In an introduction of sixty-three pages, the editor reviews the structure of the book of Genesis and outlines the basis on which the conclusions of modern scholarship rest. Then follows the text of the book of Genesis, printed according to the revised version, and at the bottom of each page are notes explaining in most luminous detail the allusions and references, the historical background and the literary origin of the text.

A study of this volume will not only open wide doors into a better understanding of the book of Genesis, but will open the way by illustration into right methods of the study of the whole Bible.

B.

The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments. $6.

The New Testament, together with the Book of Psalms. $3.35.

The Holy Bible. $2.

From the Oxford University Press there have recently been issued two editions of the Bible and one of the New Testament, which illustrate the able and versatile work of this great publishing house. First of these is an edition of the whole Bible, which is an extraordinary combination of beauty and usableness. It is bound in fine Persian leather and printed upon India paper in a type large enough for reading without undue eye strain, yet it is only three inches wide and a little more than four inches long, and one inch thick. It is exactly the volume for which many persons have wished when in traveling they would have liked to take a Bible with them, but had not space for the bulk in which the Bible is generally found.

Printed upon the same paper, and in the same type as the editon of the whole Scriptures reviewed above, bound in flat covers of Persian leather, in a size which will fit into the vest pocket, is a new edition of the New Testament and the Psalms. Like the larger volume, this is printed, not from the Revised, but from King James' Version.

A curiosity rather than a convenience is the third of the editions under review. This is a copy of the entire Bible bound in folding leather covers upon pages one and five-eighth by one and one-eighth inches, and slightly more than half an inch thick. The print, though microscopically fine, is clear enough to be legible to very strong eyes, and a tiny magnifying glass inserted in a pocket of one of the covers enables it to be read by one who chooses to try.

B.

Record of Service in the World War of V. M. I. Alumni and Their Alma Mater. Compiled by the Historiographer of the Institute, Mr. Joseph R. Anderson.

Few institutions proved their value in the great war more signally than the Virginia Military Institute, and it is a long and striking record which Mr. Anderson has compiled of the services rendered by her sons in every branch of military operations at home and abroad. A book which the friends of the brave men commemorated and every alumnus of the Institute will desire to own.

Daily Manna. Compiled by James Gilchrist Lawson. George H. Doran Co. $1.50.

The purpose of this little book is higher than its achievement. It is meant to be "a help to the practice of the presence of God" through such selection and arrangement of verses of the Bible as shall help the reader day by day to feel the vividness of God's promises and precepts. The selections from the Bible bring their own message, but the verses from hymns which are added to the daily readings are so generally chosen from crude and ugly revivalistic doggerel that the book can hardly hold the discriminating reader.

B.

What Christianity Means to Me. By Lyman Abbott. The Macmillan Co. $1.75.

Not everybody agrees with all of Dr. Abbott's theology, any more than everybody agrees with all of his politics when he writes as editor of "The Outlook," but as preacher and as journalist he has the supreme gift of luminous clearness in thought and style, and a fertility of suggestion which makes him always rewarding. This latest book he calls "a spiritual autobiography." We commend it to all who would think afresh upon some of the great Christian themes, under the stimulus of one who has himself thought and lived abundantly. Whether readers share all of Dr. Abbott's conclusions or not, will not make much difference if they are helped to clearer conclusions of their own.

B.

THE CHURCH TOMORROW

The Rev. Samuel S. Drury, D. D.

The dim notion that the Christian ministry needs recruits must become a keen conviction. An army as short in officers as our Christian army is, will lose in power. Today there are not nearly enough able ministers. Ten years from now, how many will be the unfilled and ill-filled parishes! These painful facts need not here be proved by statistics or explained by solemn reasoning. It is the fact that counts, and it is the future that matters. Let us spend not a line of type or a throb of regret on things as they are. What shall we do about it; what's the solution—that alone can interest the Christian who, seer-like, thinks in terms of decades or generations?

Our ministry, and our forms of service, and our relation to other Christians, are the three dominant Church problems today. More and better men as ministers, revised forms of public worship, and hearty affiliation between churches—these themes of the Kingdom should beset the minds of us who pray "Thy kingdom come." What shall be done about the ministry? How shall our Church stimulate more men and better men (never forgetting an improved supply) to dedicate themselves to the happiest of careers?

The following plan, still chaotic, concerns the Church's boys: Not the lad of twelve or the youth of twenty, but the boy of high school age. At that point lies the true seed-bed of vocation. To wait till our boys are in college is to wait too long. From fifteen to seventeen the questions, What shall I do? What shall I be? possesses a boy's mind. All of which is, of course, normally concealed—but it is there. Nor is it tampering with personality to help a boy settle on a vocation, so long as we are honest about it. The church, and the parish, and the minister, and the parent, and the friend should think with prayerful purposefulness about the boy, the boy of sixteen, and lead him openly and honestly to an outspoken study of the ministry as his work in and for the world.

If a parish or a pastor or a parent will lead a fine boy to such a clear-cut consideration of the ministry, when and where shall all such boys be got together? The answer is at St. Paul's School in Concord, N. H., on August 1, 1922. There is no harm in being definite; there is every loss in being vague. St. Paul's School is available. It is well equipped with needful diversions. If, like all New England, it is generally considered off the centre of things, then let's meet in Ohio or Michigan or Illinois. But let us meet. If a better place or a better plan will be offered, I shall give up this and throw all my energy into that. Let us have a gathering (I hesitate to use the word conference) of at least 200 boys from all over the country inwardly to digest the subject of the Christian ministry. Let us air the project now, criticize it this summer, get it into the minds of people a year ahead. For it must be a success; it must be well-attended; it must be furthered and fathered by the best men in the Church. We do not contemplate failure, or rest content with a handful of perhaps twenty-three or fifty-seven pale, adolescent pietists—young ghosts—but we should gather an earnest big group of our best boys from everywhere, led by our most alert laymen, our ablest priests, our most zealous bishops.

Can you picture it? Do you at all get the vision? Or do you, glancing over this, say: "What an interesting idea—a trifle wild, to be sure, but interesting," and forthwith forget all about it? It is the Christian privilege to love the Church and to work for her welfare. Though our highly specialized ministry and our tight parochialism may be wrongly emphasized, surely we cannot have a church without ministry. And unless we think remedially and constructively about ministry, pretty soon there won't be any ministers.

This is all preliminary. It is chaotic. It is without form and void. Let us give the project that momentum which will whirl it into shapely definiteness. This summer let us air it. In the autumn let us define it. In the winter let us organize it. In the spring let us enroll our representatives, and next summer let us have it.

The data so far submitted, the ideas so far suggested are: (a) To interest boys of high school age in the ministry; to have (b) only the best and manliest candidates selected (c) to attend and represent a parish (which will not pay the boy's way) at a week's summer meeting somewhere (d) on August 1, 1922. These thoughts should be discussed, criticized and amplified. It is taken for granted that the thing must be done in a big way, that any officer of the Church would be glad to be asked to help it in any possible way. The whole idea is to benefit the Church ten years from now. The future is as real as the present and as sacred as the past. Today let us nourish tomorrow.

God's Encompassing Presence

Alan Pressley Wilson.

"As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people from henceforth even forever." So sang the Psalmist (125:2), and his audience believed it more thoroughly than do we today! Yet it is just as true now as it was when written and sung in the temple. To the Hebrews, God was a real Personage, but we have so long regarded Him as an Influence, or far-off Being, that we find it hard to think of Him as being close to us. He may not speak to us directly, as He did the prophets of old: He may not reveal Himself to us through direct intervention; yet He is the same loving Father and Companion. If we will read and believe Psalm 103:13, we will never think of Him in any way other than as a loving Father and Counselor.

It is of the companionship of God that I would speak. There are earthly parents who, while they dearly love the children God has committed to their care, and do all in their power to make them happy, are kept by inclination or press of other matters from being the real friends and companions of these children. Again, there are parents who encourage their children to consider them as companions and who share in the games and pursuits of their children. Fortunate, indeed, are the children who feel that their parents are interested in whatever concerns them. Such children seldom drift away from the teachings of the home. Now, God is the Companion and Counselor of His children to an even greater extent than is any earthly parent, and is anxious that we shall consider Him as our best Friend.

The Psalmist used a beautiful simile when he said, "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people." Jersalem is located on a spur of table land 2,500 feet above the Mediterranean Sea and 3,800 feet above the Dead Sea. The city is surrounded and protected by three ranges of mountains—Mount of Olives, Mount Moriah and Mount Zion. These completely secure the safety of the city, and its inhabitants regard the stately sentinels as their friends and almost reverence them.

So, when the Psalmist compared God's presence and companionship to the surrounding presence of the mountains, the people realized the security in which they lived.

Has God changed? Is He not willing to surround us still with His loving presence? God loves us and cares for us with just the same solicitude and consideration that characterized Him in the days of the prophets, and He would have us apply this Psalm to our own lives today. He is ever ready to surround us with His presence. The degree of love and companionship depends upon us.

When the children of Israel were traveling in the wilderness, God said, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest" (Exod. 33:14). Appreciating the safety thus assured, and also the danger, should this not be the case, Moses replied, "If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." Even so God comes to us and promises His loving and abiding companionship. Shall we refuse to accept the gracious presence? Shall we not open the doors of our hearts and welcome the loving Father?

A Prayer.

Our heavenly Father, we do most earnestly plead for Thy divine presence with us. We would not undertake anything without knowing that Thy guiding hand directs every move and without the whisper of Thy loving voice in our hearts telling us Thy will. Be Thou our Companion and Counselor; then shall we accomplish all things through Christ, Who strengtheneth us. Amen.

THE CHRISTIAN HEALING MISSION

From the Council Address of Bishop Guerry

Since Mr. Hickson's visit to this country three years ago, there has been a remarkable revival of interest in the Healing Mission of the Church. Many of our Bishops have had healing missions in their dioceses, and there is hardly a large city which has not had one or more of such services. Our clergy are many of them profoundly interested in this movement, and our lay people are beginning to ask questions. The Healing Mission, therefore, can no longer be ignored nor treated as a sort of religious fad which must soon pass away.

The history of the Ministry of Healing, both in the New Testament and in post apostolic times, is familiar to every one who has studied the subject. What, therefore, we are witnessing today is simply a revival of an ancient and apostolic practice which has never altogether died out. Certainly there is nothing new in being told that God answers prayer for temporal blessings or that faith and repentance are necessary conditions upon which He works. All this is so obvious that no devout Christian will question it for a moment. The fact that there have been so many specific answers to prayer in the ministry of every earnest priest of the Church that he needs no further evidence outside of his own experience to convince him of the truth of St. James' words that "prayer and faith shall heal the sick."

What has impressed me in connection with the Healing Mission in Charleston is not the number of persons healed, but the great number of people who have had their faith strengthened and who came away from the mission feeling that they had received a definite spiritual blessing. When I saw the crowds who went up to the chancel to be blessed through the laying on of hands, it made me realize how much quiet faith and undreamed of spiritual possibilities there are in the Church. It was most impressive and apostolic.

It is perfectly evident to my mind that we are dealing here with a deeply spiritual and religious movement, and one that needs to be sympathetically studied and guided. The world is in such dire need of a revival of religion at this time that when any movement is begun which is at all constructive, or which aims to lift the burdens under which men groan and to strengthen faith in God, the feeling that one has is to thank God and to co-operate even where he cannot altogether approve or perhaps fails to understand. It is therefore with profound gratitude to God for the wonderful manifestations of His love and goodness vouchsafed to us through the Healing Missions of the Church that I would venture here to point out what seem to me to be some of the dangers of this movement.

I speak not because I question any well authenticated case of healing, nor because I doubt Christ's continued and abiding presence in the Church, or His power to heal, or the fact that He does heal in answer to faithful prayer, but because already I seem to see the beginning of a false teaching underlying much of the current theology on this subject which if not corrected is certain to bring the Healing Mission into disrepute.

The first of these false premises on which much of the preaching and teaching of those who conduct these missions rests is that all sickness is the result of sin. If this initial statement is allowed to go unchallenged, then of course it follows that all sickness is against the divine will, or that God desires every one to be healed. It is but a step from this initial mistake, and that a perfectly logical step, to say with Mr. Hickson, that "We must not be content with the wavering and uncertain faith that says, 'If it be God's will, He will heal me.'"

The Rev. Henry B. Wilson, the head of the Society of the Nazarene, very much in the same vein, says: "Remember that if the prayers of the faithful are not answered, there is something wrong. It may be in one's self; it may be in the faith of the one being prayed for. It is not with God. He desires perfect health in body and soul for every human being." If God desires perfect health for every one, then we are tempted to ask what was the matter with St. Paul, whose thrice repeated prayer that he might be healed of his bodily infirmity was not answered. Did the apostle lack faith? What was wrong in his case?

"But," continues Mr. Wilson in his special article entitled the 'Will of God in Healing,' "all sickness and disease is in opposition to God's will. When it comes it is because God's will for man has been set aside. Even after illness has come it is against the divine will that it should continue." We confess that we are unable to separate between God's will and the operation of natural law which is one expression of His will. If I drink water from a polluted well and have typhoid fever, I have by that act violated a law of health and also a law of God, and the sickness which ensues is certainly in accordance with the will of God. It is part of the Father's discipline to teach me to avoid polluted wells in the future.

But, however sickness may come, whether by our own sin or through ignorance or violation of natural law, how can we say that it is against the divine will that it should continue? Let us suppose that God in His infinite love and wisdom sees that we need to be made perfect, as the Master before us, by the things which we suffer; can we imagine an all holy and loving God sparing us or lifting that cross or putting an end to any particular sickness before faith and patience have done their perfect work in the moral and spiritual purification of the human soul? According to Mr. Wilson, all spiritual discipline through sickness must cease the moment the individual supplies the faith necessary to release Christ's power to heal. Although, as in the case of the Apostle Paul, God may have seen that he needed this particular cross to test and prove him, and that his bodily infirmity had wrought in the apostle a much more exceeding weight of glory; yet we are told that such sickness is clearly against the divine will and must cease just as soon as one prays with faith sufficient to be healed.

Now that was certainly not the view that St. Paul took of it. He tells us in 2 Cor. 12:7 that the "thorn in the flesh" was given him to keep him humble, "lest" he "should be exalted above measure through the abundance of revelations" which had been given him. The apostle saw clearly the loving and merciful hand of God revealed through his physical infirmities. I am quite sure he would be amazed to read in Mr. Wilson's pamphlet, that his failure to be healed in answer to his oft-repeated prayer was "the only instance of what might be called failure in St. Paul's whole life." The context shows clearly that by "failure" he means that St. Paul lacked faith!

To say, or to imply, that all sickness is the result of sin, either the sin of the individual or of the race, is plainly contradicted by the Scriptures. Let us freely admit that by far the greater part of the sickness and suffering in the world is caused by sin, yet to teach that all sickness is the fruit of sin is obviously untrue. . . . God has deliberately put us in a world of poisonous insects and noxious plants and subjected us to constant danger in order to develop in us character and intelligence. To say that He visits upon us the consequences of our own folly and disobedience is to state only half of the truth. It would be far more correct to say that having endowed us with free will and intelligence in His divine love and wisdom He has so ordered and constituted the world in which we live that it is the best conceivable world for the formation of character and the testing of faith and love.

The leaders of this movement in the Church would do well, therefore, to revise some of their premises if they are going to make their teaching square with the teaching of Scripture or the undeniable facts of human experience. To omit from the prayers of the Church the words, "If it be thy will," is nothing short of sacrilege. To attempt to explain away the force of our Lord's words in the Garden of Gethsemane, "Father, if Thou be willing, remove this cup from me, nevertheless not my will, but thine be done." By saying that His prayer had no reference to sickness is to misinterpret the whole meaning and spiritual value of His example.

When our loved one is lying at the point of death and we kneel and implore Christ to heal and save, how dare we omit the words, "If it be Thy will"? Shall we undertake to dictate to God what He shall do? Shall we say to some poor distracted, heartbroken mother, "It is God's will to heal all sickness; he desires perfect health for your child"? And if the child is not healed, "there is something wrong!" Which means, something wrong with the mother, as the child may be too young to have faith. Are we prepared to lay at the door of that poor, grief-stricken mother the tragedy of her child's death because she lacked faith? Such an alternative would be enough to drive any conscientious parent insane. Where is such teaching leading us?

. . . If, therefore, this great movement, so full of wonderful possibilities for a real spiritual revival in the Church, is to meet with general acceptance and commend itself to the devout and spiritually minded, it is necessary now that some of the false philosophy and teaching which has characterized this Healing Ministry in various parts of the country be eliminated and the Healing Ministry of the Church be placed upon a saner and more scriptural basis.

. . . Nor is this all. I think that wherever the claim is made that organic troubles have been cured in answer to prayer, the Church ought to be willing to submit the claim to the test of scientific investigation and medical diagnosis. Experience abundantly proves that we cannot, as a rule, rely upon the testimony of the patient himself in such cases. Such willingness on the part of the healing ministry to submit the results of all cures to medical examination would go far towards the confidence and support of the Christian physicians of the country. Nothing could show to the scientific world the Church's faith in Christ's power to heal more truly and convincingly than a readiness to recognize and accept the results of scientific investigation in those matters which lie within the domain of science. The faith of the Church is manifested not only in the prayers of the faithful, but equally in her readiness to obey the will of God as revealed in the operation of natural law.

House of Mercy in Washington, D. C.

By Lillian M. Yeo, Deaconess-in-Charge.

It is now twenty years since I took charge of this work. Ten years ago we moved out into the suburbs of Washington, into a beautiful new house which was the gift of one lady. The old house had become so badly in need of repair that it seemed better to build than to spend money on it; so the property was sold and the proceeds were put into an endowment fund which has been slowly growing ever since. In building this house I stipulated that it should not accommodate over twenty-four girls and their children, as I felt that in dealing with these girls it is better to handle small numbers, where one can come in personal contact continuously, than to deal with them in the mass.

This work, which is thirty-seven years old, had been closed for several months when I took charge, and when I came here we began with one girl. The work has grown, of course, and ever since we moved into the new house we have averaged twenty-two girls, much of the time being overcrowded. We give no temporary shelter, feeling it very important that the girls should be with us a sufficient length of time to enable us to do some permanent work. We take only first offense cases, and the age limit is from fourteen to twenty-two. In our reconstructive work we must change habits of many years, which takes time. We, therefore, require a girl to remain two years, if she is under eighteen, and one year if she is over that age. The girls come to us from various sources—their parents, juvenile courts, children's societies and other agencies dealing with these girls.

This is the only institution of its kind under the control of the Episcopal Church south of Jersey City, and it has always seemed a great pity to me that it has been so little known to Church people, for most of our girls come to us from other denominations. They are woefully ignorant about even the most ordinary things, and consequently our teaching, which is entirely industrial and domestic, is very hard and requires a great amount of patience and perseverance both on the part of the girls and of their teachers. I give all the religious teaching and conduct the chapel services both morning and evening, also prepare the classes for confirmation. We have a very good chaplain, who comes every week and performs all the priestly offices, but one has to live with the girls and have a personal knowledge of each one to do really effective work.

A very important part of the work here is the children. We have from eighteen to twenty, ranging in age from newly born to five years. We endeavor to give these little ones a good physical start, and everybody who sees them testifies to our success along these lines; but in spite of all the social service work, conferences on illegitimacy, commissions and committees, when you really come down to the individual child you realize how much time and energy is being wasted in talk. To really give these children a right start in life is most difficult and discouraging; we must protect them from mothers who are not fit to have them, and convince people how utterly unworthy most of the mothers are, while it is the prevailing idea that giving birth to a child necessarily renders a woman a good mother, no matter what her past training and environment has been. We have learned from experience that in most cases legal adoption into a good family is the best solution of the problem. After the girl has been here the required time she has the privilege of boarding her child here until the child is five years old. During this time we are protecting the child and at the same time watching carefully the development of the mother. We endeavor in every possible way to keep in touch with our girls, both by writing and visiting, so that we are fully able to speak with accurate knowledge as to results. A large number of the girls are married and doing well, and I am in touch with girls and children over the entire twenty years.

This is difficult and discouraging work, but I think I have shown it is very well worth while. But it does not appeal to the present day social service workers or to young women who are seeking work in the Church. One of my great difficulties always has been to secure the right kind of workers, because this work above all other kinds of Church work must have, in order to be successful, people who are really interested in the souls of these girls, and who feel that there is much good in them if it can only be brought out, and who have the supreme art of making goodness attractive. The hours are long, work sometimes monotonous, girls are often trying and difficult, and the salary is small, as most Church salaries are small.

Is there not some one who will respond to this need?

Daughters of the King

"Its sole object is the spread of Christ's kingdom among women and the strengthening of parish life. The two rules are Prayer and Service. First, to pray daily for the spread of Christ's kingdom, especially among women, and for God's blessing upon all members of the Order and for the spiritual growth of the parish. Second, to take regularly some part in the worship, study and work of the Church; to make constant effort to bring other women within its influence, and to render, at all times, such aid to the rector as he may deem necessary for the spiritual upbuilding of the parish."

The members serve a three months' probation and are then admitted with an impressive service. They are invested with the cross by their rector and take the solemn vows of Prayer and Service, and are then sent upon their mission of leading their sisters to their Father's home above.

In the prayer for the Order by the rector, the petition is made that "they may think nothing, do nothing, say nothing, which may injure themselves, their neighbors or Thy Holy Word, and that in all temptations they may be ready always to forget self in obeying Thy most blessed will."

One who has not taken the vows of the Order nor heard the words of the prayer just quoted cannot possibly have any idea of the restraint the little silver cross has upon unruly tempers, sharp words, and upon moments of grim despair. Often, when sorely tried, it means a hand tightly clenched around the silver cross; a determination to "carry on" bravely "for His sake."

The Daughters of the King is a branch, and the most important branch of the Women's Auxiliary, and a church that lacks a chapter has an incomplete Auxiliary. Our Order is to the body of the Women's Auxiliary as the nervous system is to the human body; the twofold rules of the Order, prayer and service, corresponding to the sensory and motor nerves.

Money and material things are the outcome of these rules; never are they put first. The members of our Order realize thoroughly that "Whoever fears God fears to sit at ease."

Daily prayer for the spiritual and moral uplift of woman throughout the world; prayer that our own lives may be fitting examples for other women to follow; prayer that we may be strength to the weak (and "it is very good for strength to know that some one needs you to be strong"); prayer that we may be courage to the discouraged; that we may be confidence to those who have lost hope, and faith to those who behind the clouds of life's storms forget that the sun of God's love is still shining. Can any one earnestly and honestly pray for such things and strive for their fulfilment, believing in Him Who said, "O woman, great is thy faith, be it unto thee even as thou wilt," without giving gladly and cheerfully the service required?

This is why, when the call for service comes to a true Daughter of the King, it is given with such forgetfulness of self; it is because the eyes of her soul have seen and the ears of her soul are open. This is why there are no dark corners in the lives of the real Daughters of the King. They needs must be filled with the sunshine of the King's presence. Even as no one can work for others and live in close fellowship with them, without the bond of human love growing stronger and deeper day by day, so no one can do the King's work and live in close personal relationship with Him, without greater love for God, greater love for man.

"Each soul has its own secret place
Where none may enter in
Save it and God—to them alone—
What goeth on therein is known—
To it and God alone."

The Power of Love in Missions

By Rev. D. A. Sanford.

In a period from the year 1860 to the year 1890 thousands of human lives were lost in troubles and wars with Indians. The Sioux massacre of 1862 in Minnesota and the Custer massacre in Montana in 1876 stand out prominently as deeds of horror in those days, when Sioux Indians especially were in the forefront as Indian warriors. White settlers on the frontier—men, women and children—were murdered. Travelers on western plains and in the Rocky Mountain regions were in great danger, and many were killed. Indians, too, suffered, as in the Chivington massacre in Colorado in 1864, when some five hundred of them were killed.

In defense of our white people United States soldiers were sent. and after enduring the hardships of the frontier hundreds of them, too, lost their lives in warfare with Indians, while millions of dollars flowed from the United States Treasury, all on account of troubles and wars with the Indians.

And it was not altogether an honorable warfare, for, although Indians in many cases were cruel and savage, they had been greatly wronged and had abundant cause for hatred of the white man, and felt it right to drive out the white people from what was once entirely their own land.

Today a great change has come. The gospel of Christ has been brought to the Indians. The power of divine love has touched their hearts and changed their lives. We today have Christian Indians, living in civilized ways. We have churches among the Indians, in many cases with Indians as clergymen, working in connection with white clergymen.

If, in former days, thousands of soldiers had been placed on each Indian reservation, their presence would have produced fear and dread. The Indians would have learned to fear the white man, but not to love him. The presence of soldiers would tend rather to breed hatred of the white man and his ways. A greater power than fear of the white man was needed, and that was the power of divine love.

The gospel of Christ, through the missionaries of the Church, have supplied that power.

On that subject, witness the testimony of an army officer and United States Indian agent. Major Kinney, United States Indian agent at Yankton Indian Reservation in South Dakota, said in the year 1887: "To the untiring efforts of the missionaries on the reservation more than to all other influences, may be attributed the progress made by the Indians in civilization and Christianity."

In those early days missionaries of the Church went back from civilization to live among Indians. Women workers went with the clergy. They cared for the sick. They opened mission schools. By deeds, as well as by words, they told the story of the cross and of the love of God in Christ. In time the hearts of the Indians were touched and won. Mission schools and missionary work came first, before government agencies took up work among Indians. Later government schools were established. The government sent farmers to teach them how to farm. Indians, who formerly had been on the war-path, came and were fed rations and beef by the government. These were material benefits, used by the Indians but not always prized by them, as witness the Messiah craze, about the year 1890, when Indians hoped for the return of the buffalo and the expulsion of the white man. Material benefits were used, but back of all was the power of divine love in the work of the missionaries.

After the Sioux massacre most of the Sioux Indians were driven from Minnesota. The Rev. Samuel D. Hinman, who had long been with them, finally established work among some of them on the Santee Reservation in Nebraska. Other Sioux Indians were placed on reservations in Dakota.

To speak of the work in one other locality: In the year 1870 Rev. Joseph W. Cook began the work on the Yankton Reservation in Dakota, across the Missouri River from Nebraska. He had been associated with Rev. S. D. Hinman, the earlier missionary. He remained there among those Indians for nearly thirty-two years, until he died in the year 1902. He accomplished a most excellent work.

The writer visited him and his work in the year 1885, thirteen years after the work had been begun. Good work was being done. Church buildings had been erected. Church services were attended. A Church boarding school for boys had been established, and also a government boarding school. Some visible progress had been made. But there was more to be done. The Indians were living in the tents, called tepees. The men wore long hair and dressed in blankets. They were fed rations by the government, and to a large extent were living in idleness.

The writer again visited that same locality in October, 1920—thirty-seven years afterwards. Now he saw no Indians in blankets; no Indians were living in the tepee; but all were living in houses, in civilized ways. Many were living on farms, in some cases five, ten or twenty miles distant. Church buildings had been established, with Indian clergy as helpers.

Out of a total of over $8,000 brought to their annual convocation as their offering for Church purposes, over $900 was brought from the church of Sioux Indians on the former Yankton Reservation.

In the same month of October, 1920, the writer also made a visit on the Santee Reservation in Nebraska. In a church, out among the farms, on a Sunday morning fifty Indians were gathered in attendance at a church service. The church service was in their own language. An Indian woman was at the organ. Familiar hymns were sung in their language. Twenty-five Indian people received the Holy Communion. The Indian clergyman and many others were the direct descendants, or at least belonged to that tribe of Sioux Indians who had taken part in the massacre in the year 1862.

What a contrast with the scenes of former days! The power of love had wrought the great change.

Today the Episcopal Church has about 14,000 baptized persons among Sioux Indians and over 5,000 communicants—one communicant out of every five in the population. Also, we have thirty ordained Indian clergymen as helpers, and others as lay helpers. Besides our own work, the Presbyterians have nearly 2,000 communicants and Congregationalists report over 1,400 communicants.

A half-century ago the conditions among Indians formed the background for a very dark picture. Conditions now among several tribes of Christianized Indians present a bright picture instead.

When the world war came more than five thousand Indians went as soldiers to defend our country. Some lost their lives in that war. Many Indians bought Liberty Bonds. Indian women helped in Red Cross work.

In many ways a great change has been wrought. The main-spring back of all has been the gospel of Christ through the missionaries, the power of divine love. An army of soldiers could not have touched and moved the heart of the wild Indian; but this has been done through the missionaries. One grand result has been brought about—the cessation of war.

Here, then, is a grand motive for the support of Christian missions. The same principle applies for the support of missions to other races, both in our own and other lands. Christian missions can prevent war among people and nations. For therein is the power of love.

USES OF THE NAVY.

July 16, 1921.

Mr. Editor: As an ex-officer of the navy, I shall take the liberty of replying to the editorial on page eleven of the Southern Churchman of July 9, entitled "Keep At It Till We Get It."

The work of the navy is much wider than merely "learning to draw swords in the most scientific and deadly manner possible." In time of peace—which is, or has been, most of the time for this country, God be blessed—the mission of the navy is largely that of spreading friendship and good will throughout the world. It also has police duties such as are performed by most police. Even if well prepared for war, I do not see that it is at all ridiculous to hope and pray that there will be no war.

As for the illustrations in the article—must the fact that we train lawyers mean that we hope that law-suits will be many? Or the fact that we have physicians mean that we want disease? Lawyers and physicians can do much to avoid law-suits and illness; and the navy can and does do much to spread understanding and peace throughout the world.

It is necessary to have lawyers and physicians until the time comes when we do not need them—and may that time be soon; we have to have policemen until the time comes when there shall be no more crime—in fact, the mere presence of policemen is a preventive of crime.

It is not the duty of lawyers, physicians or naval officers to start crime, disease—or war.

Very truly,

THOS. WILLIAMSON, JR.

Washington, D. C.

"Look, Father, look on His anointed face,
And only look on us as found in Him;
Look not on our misusings of Thy grace,
Our prayer so languid, and our faith so dim.
For lo! between our sins and their reward
We set the passion of Thy Son our Lord."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

"FULFIL THE DOING OF IT."

Mr. Editor: I am sending you a copy of the lines from the "Humane Learning," by Lord Brooke, quoted in Mayor's Life of the Non-Juror, Ambrose Bonwicke:

"If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."—St. John 8:17.

"I memorized one verse. Then I went out and practiced it till I had it."—Korean Farmer, in Hartman's Oriental Religion.

"Now, if this wisdom onely can be found
By seeking God, even in the Faith He gives:
If earth, heaven, starres, creatures, be the bound
Wherein, reuealed, His Power and Wisdom liues:
If true obedience be the way to this,
And onely who growes better, wiser is:

Then, let not curious silly Flesh conceiue
Itselfe more rich or happy when it knowes
Works of Art—which men (as shells) must cleaue,
Before the Life's True Wisdome they disclose;
Nor, when they know to teach they-know-not-what!
But, when their doings men may wonder at!

For, onely that man vnderstands indeede
And well remembers (which he well can doe)
'The Laws liue only where the Law doth breed
Obedience to the workes it bindes vs to:'
And (as the Life of Wisdome hath exprest)
'If this you know, then, doe it, and be blest.'"

How grateful the Church of Christ throughout the world must be, that always, in every age, there have been these "lights of the world," this "salt of the earth," who have continued without a break in passing on the simple fundamental virtue of Christ's life. Our present state of unrest and indeterminateness is probably due to the overwhelming percentage of adherents to the Christian religion who know but stop short there. They do not go out and "practice it till they have it"!

W. Herbert Mayers.

King George, Va.

YOUNG MEN FOR THE MINISTRY.

Mr. Editor: In your issue for July 2, in an editorial, you say that fathers and mothers should "pray their own boys into the ministry." I answer that praying alone is not sufficient. There are causes why, in the past, so few young men have prepared for the ministry.

Remove the hindrances and obstacles, and then we may expect that prayer will be more effective.

Let a few facts be stated. Large numbers of our clergy have taken secular or semi-secular work. The number is larger than is generally realized. Why have they done so?

A more distressing fact. Many others are not adequately employed. They have charge of some small parish or mission. Their field of labor is limited. Their stipend is small—too small for the proper support of a family. Their tenure of office is uncertain. Such conditions result in frequent changes. The expenses of moving are borne by the clergy. These removals are numerous. It is wrong to blame the clergy for these frequent changes. In most cases they are helpless. Removals become necessary.

Young men who see these things are not attracted thereby to the ministry. It is the wrong treatment that some of our clergy have received that deters some young men from the ministry.

Modern conditions have brought changes which affect the Church. Our parish system now works wrongly. Ten thousand of our communicants, in vacant parishes and missions, are without pastoral care, while at the same time hundreds of clergy, properly qualified, are without adequate and proper employment, doing little or no pastoral work as clergy of the Church.

It is the lack of any proper system by which all the clergy fit for duty are given employment, and all the people that can be reached are given pastoral care.

What can be the remedy? One suggestion is made. Establish a common fund in each diocese and missionary district for the support of the clergy. Let all our people give to that fund, regularly and systematically. It would be inspiring to young men, to work together, supported by a common fund, in the noblest of all work, the ministry of the Church.

Prayer is proper in its place, but when things go wrong there should be doing to effect a remedy.

D. A. SANFORD.

Camp Benning, Ga.

The Great Commission.

SLIPPING BACKWARD.

For the first five months of this year cash receipts on account of the Nation-Wide Campaign showed a gratifying increase. And then came June!! A decrease of $130,042.06 in one month, which wipes out nearly 70 per cent. of our previous gain, is alarming.

What is the matter? Is it delay in remitting? Is it lack of organization? Is it repudiation of pledges? Is it lack of interest in God's work?

Whatever the cause, a remedy must be found. The decline in receipts has made necessary an addition to our bank loans in the sum of $50.000 with its consequent interest charges.

How does your Diocese stand?

Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer.

THE FIRST DONATIONS.

The first financial statement of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, presented to the first triennial meeting, May, 1823, lists the following contributions:

Cotton goods, hardware, tea, ink powder, quills, 1 barrel sugar house molasses, church hymns, 1 bridle, 1 cross-cut saw, 1 dozen pad locks, Episcopal catechisms, 1 pair pantaloons, 1 pair shoes (valued at $1.62), material collected by several ladies for clothing heathen children.

The most costly donation was "2 hogsheads of tobacco, from several tobacco dealers."

A BRASS BAND FOR A DEACONESS.

Few of us know the glory of having a brass band and acrobats and sleight-of-hand performers at our humble birthday parties. Deaconess Stewart, of Changsha, does, and besides all this there were at her last anniversary celebration three hundred women and children. No, they did not all bring presents. The giving of gifts on such occasions has become such a rigid matter of form that it often is really burdensome on the native workers, and the missionaries have protested strongly against it.

WORLD CONFERENCE.

Most religious people, whether they are members of churches or not, have a great desire for Christian unity. But they despair of it because they do not know how many other people all over the world share that desire. A day in the office of the World Conference on Faith and Order, 174 Water Street, Gardiner, Me., U. S. A., would fill them with hope.

On one day recently the secretary received letters from South Africa, Italy, Germany, the United States, Czecho-Slovakia, Madagascar, England, India, China and Japan, all expressing interest or reporting progress. Of the printed matter received, the only important papers were from Italy, Germany and South India. While the World Conference on Faith and Order does not undertake direct efforts for reunion, but only to prepare the way for them, its daily mail, of which this day's mail is not an unusual sample, shows that its work is appreciated. If people would send for the publications explaining the movement, they would find it full of encouragement.

The basis of the movement, in which all the great Trinitarian communions throughout the world, except Rome, have taken official part, is the growing conviction that conference affords the only means for the solution of those questions on which the churches have been, and still are, divided, and which must be squarely faced before the world-wide desire for the world-wide and visible unity of the Church of Christ can ever be fulfilled. The progress already made in the World Conference movement shows how well-founded that conviction is, and how not only ecclesiastics and theologians, but plain lay people, can cooperate effectively toward that end.

Charles H. Brent, Chairman.
Robert H. Gardiner, Secretary.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

IS WORLD PEACE IN SIGHT?

The national meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society has announced a splendid slogan, "A Warless World by 1923."

It is one of the most decisively Christian mottoes that has ever been adopted by any Church organization. It may not be brought to pass within the next two years, but surely its consummation is in sight.

The cry for the abolishment of war is coming from the most unexpected sources. Senator Boise Penrose is recognized throughout the country as one of the most practical politicians in Congress, yet he has announced his hearty support of an international disarmament plan.

The Prime Minister of both France and England acted with extraordinary promptness in responding to President Harding's suggestion for an international parley on this subject when they sent their replies on the same day that the invitation was received. Their response, too, was as cordial as it was prompt, and leaves no doubt as to their desires on this subject.

It is altogether fitting that November 11 should be the date suggested for the opening of this epoch-making conference. What could be more appropriate than that the date which marked the cessation of the world conflict should also mark the beginning of a plan for the disarming of the nations!

There will be many hitches and numerous delays in the negotiations, but the fact that Premier Briand himself is spoken of as the head of the French delegation, and that Viscount Grey will come from England, is clear evidence that both these nations are taking the matter with the utmost seriousness, and all the indications are sufficiently auspicious to make the hearts of lovers of peace beat high with hope.

Let every Christian throughout the world add to their daily prayers a simple but fervent petition that God will find a way to bring about world peace through international agreement, and we shall surely see the attainment of the motto of the Christian Endeavorers—a warless world.

THE PLIGHT OF RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS.

In two of our large cities appeals are now being made for funds to support Associated Charities and Welfare Leagues.

These appeals are coming at a time when it is generally thought that the drain upon such organizations begins to lighten. Such is usually the case, but this year is an exception, owing to the fact that the unemployment situation continues to be as bad as it was in the winter time, and that savings which have been accumulated by working people and carried them over the first few months of industrial depression are now ehhausted.

Many factories that are not actually closed down are only working three or four days a week, and are paying reduced wages for those days. On the other hand, a press report from Washington issued last week showed that the cost of living is still 80 per cent. higher than it was in 1913.

With these facts before us it can readily be seen that the pressing needs for funds by relief organizations is not due to any mismanagement or extravagance on their part, but to a pitiful situation which confronts them and requires immediate help to save suffering amongst our own people.

The daily papers have adopted a policy of striving to create optimism and do not allow the publication of figures that would show the actual present need of employment for many honest working men who have families to support.

No doubt this policy is wise, because, as President Wilson pointed out, business confidence is largely a matter of national psychology; nevertheless it makes it doubly hard to secure the necessary funds for carrying on charity work of the most pressing kind, when the daily papers are continually stating that the industrial conditions are improving steadily.

We trust that persons who can afford to give will heed the appeals that are coming from Baltimore and Richmond and possibly some of our other Southern cities, and will be sufficiently liberal in their donations to relieve the present crisis. It should be borne in mind, too, that many small contributions are equivalent to one large one, and that "every little helps."

COMMUNITY SERVICES.

In these days of intense heat, when the night is almost the only time when it is pleasant or refreshing to be out of doors, the possibility of a Sunday night service that will be even moderately well attended becomes more acute than usual.

At Washington the Church has inaugurated an afternoon open-air service at the Cathedral which has been successfully carried on now for several years.

A plan has been adopted in many small towns which procures good attendance and takes a step toward Church unity at the same time.

In most villages there is a park or Court House Square which is usually sufficiently centrally located to be of convenient access to all the people, and in which chairs or seats of some sort can be arranged.

By co-operation among the Protestant ministers a service can easily be planned in which each pastor can take part and familiar hymns used in which all the choirs can participate.

The Lord's Prayer, the Creed and the reading of the Bible are three parts of worship in which all Christians can join heartily.

Such services will frequently attract persons who would not go to a church to hear a sermon, but will enjoy a service of praise and worship in the open air.

Of course it requires some sacrifice for many of our Church people who love the service and the surroundings of the sanctuary, but it is worth while to give up something that pleases us in order to bring others to hear the Word of God.

It is inspiring, too, to remember that the three sermons of which we have the best record in the New Testament were all preached in the open air by different persons in widely scattered places.

Our Saviour's Sermon on the Mount was of course delivered with the sky for a ceiling and grassy slopes for a floor.

Later on, when St. Peter proclaimed in burning words Christ's fulfilment of Messianic prophecy, it was in the open streets of Jerusalem, where the multitudes of the people of every sect and nationality were his hearers.

And still further on in the book of the Acts of the Apostles we find St. Paul standing in open on Mars' Hill to proclaim the news of Christ's coming and His resurrection to the Athenians.

We have therefore the best of Bible precedent for betaking ourselves to the open air and for bringing the message to those who will not seek it for themselves.

If these services are planned with tact they can become a great power for good in any community and reach many who will not otherwise hear the Word.

We may work, hoping to be appreciated and honored of men, accepting gladly and gratefully the esteem and the love they award us; but we must not build upon it as a certain recompense of our endeavors. We must be prepared to do without it to be able to say, "I will work on, 'though the more abundantly I love the less I am loved.'" Our true reward is in the smile of the Saviour, the approval of our own heart, the consciousness that we are serving our generation, the blessing which awaits the faithful in the land of promise.—B. P. Cotterill.

Church Intelligence

Moving to Bitter Race Feeling.

News comes that the method of race conciliation through inter-racial committees is gaing recognition throughout the country.

The General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church, recently in session in St. Louis, endorsed "with the greatest possible earnestness" the attitude of the Inter-Racial Commission in commending to the ministers and churches of the South the need for discussing and meeting racial problems in the spirit of Jesus Christ. The Assembly further emphasized "the necessity for maintaining justice and righteousness between the races," endorsed the plan for conference and co-operation between white and colored leaders; and urged its constituency to encourage such conferences and cooperation in their local communities throughout the South.

Bishop Button, of Mississippi, takes a great interest in the formation of these committees, and is a recognized leader in all movements for better racial relations.

The Bishop of Georgia, as guest of the Kawanis Club of Rome, Ga., the first week in July addressed the members on the subject, "The White Man's Burden." "Lynching," the Bishop said, "is an evil that must be corrected. It cannot go on longer; it is a crime against the dignity and sovereignty of the State that must end. We have in Georgia two races radically different in temperament and characteristics, living together under similar instructions; races that cannot and must not be assimilated. I admit that I have not been able to find a solution of the race problem. The problem is too deep, too intricate and too complicated for quick solution." The Bishop discussed at some length the recent race riots at Tulsa, Okla., and asked that every decent Georgian assume a better attitude towards the negro stressing the subject of the right kind of education. He declared that the present situation must be solved in some way—that things could not continue as they are. In speaking of ex-Governor Dorsey's pamphlet, the Bishop said the Governor did the right thing, that what is needed is a reverberating echo, and Governor Dorsey's pamphlet furnished that, and he did his duty.

A Useful Man Gone.

The death of Bishop Clinton, of the A. M. E. Zion Church, removes a man known and honored by men of both races throughout the South. His strong influence with his people has always been thrown on the side of the Christian solution of vexed problems. He spoke fearlessly to white people of the rights and needs of his race; but he did it in a spirit which won their approval and co-operation. His counsel has long been sought and honored by such Southern bodies as the Sociological Congress, the Southern University Commission, the Inter-racial Commission; and by leaders in inter-racial work in the various white denominations. Leading white papers, since his death, have paid him high tribute editorially; and many white people attended the memorial service held in his honor in Charlotte, where he lived.

He was widely known at the North, and an influential member of the Federal Council of Churches; but his best work and his deepest influence will remain in the South. He proved in his own life that the man who walks in love toward all mankind, however closely he may be bound to his own race, cannot be measured in terms of race alone, but belongs also to the Race of Man.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Memorial to Bishop Randolph.

Art Studios of J. & R. Lamb, New York City, are erecting in St. Paul's Church, Suffolk, a memorial reredos of carved oak, in memory of the late Bishop Alfred Magill Randolph, the memorial being presented to the building by the Randolph Society of that church.

This three-paneled ached reredos of gothic design is impaneled with an appropriate treatment of the subject, "Christ, the Preacher." The central figure, Christ, standing in the Garden of Paradise, in pleading position; the two side panels filled with listening angels, many standing amidst the lilies of the resurrection which aworn the picture, while overhead hover two angels apparently enraptured at the plea. On either side of the reredos ornamental gothic panels will carry the main memorial to the full width of the chancel.

The memorial has been carried out from the designs of Mr. Charles R. Lamb, and in his forty-fifth contribution to ecclesiastical art in the State of Virginia in the past two decades.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., Bishop.

Bequests to the Church.

The will of the late Mr. William Irwin, trustee of St. Paul's Cathedral, Cincinnati, includes several bequests to the Church.

The Cathedral is to receive $3,000, the income from which is to be used to pay premiums on insurance on the church property. Any surplus is to be applied on clerical salaries.

A bequest of $1,000 is made to the Children's Hospital of the Church, Mt. Auburn, Cincinnat.

The General Board of Missions is to receive $250.

The Cathedral Chapter of the Diocese is to receive $250, to be used in the work of the City Missions, under the direction of Canon Charles G. Reade or his successor.

St. Andrew's Mission (colored), Eighth and Mound Streets, Cincinnati, is to get $500 as an endowment, the income to apply on the salary of the rector.

St. James' Mission, Westwood, Cincinnati, receives $500 to be expended in aiding to build a church for this congregation. If this is not built wthin five years from the date of the will, December 6, 1918, the money is to be used to aid in the building of a church or churches in the city of Cincinnati or vicinity.

The Home for the Friendless, the Children's Home and the new Orphan Asylum for colored children each receive $250.

Mr. Irwin has been a life-long friend to all the work of the Church, and his will is an indication of his loyalty and affection.

Information Wanted.

Lying on a bed in the Cincinnati General Hospital is the Rev. Edward Reginald Lewis, a Hindoo minister of the Church of England, suffering from a nervous trouble and under medical observation. He says that he was ordained by the Bishop of Bombay in 1911, and that he was stationed at Allahabad, where he has a wife and child. He says he was chaplain during the war of the Third Bengal Regiment, with the rank of lieutenant. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity. He came to this country via Cuba and Florida. The Church and social workers of Cincinnati are seeking further information about him, and if this publication comes to the attention of any one who knows him they are asked to communicate with Archdeacon Reade, 223 West Seventh Street, Cincinnati, O.

C. G. R.

TEXAS

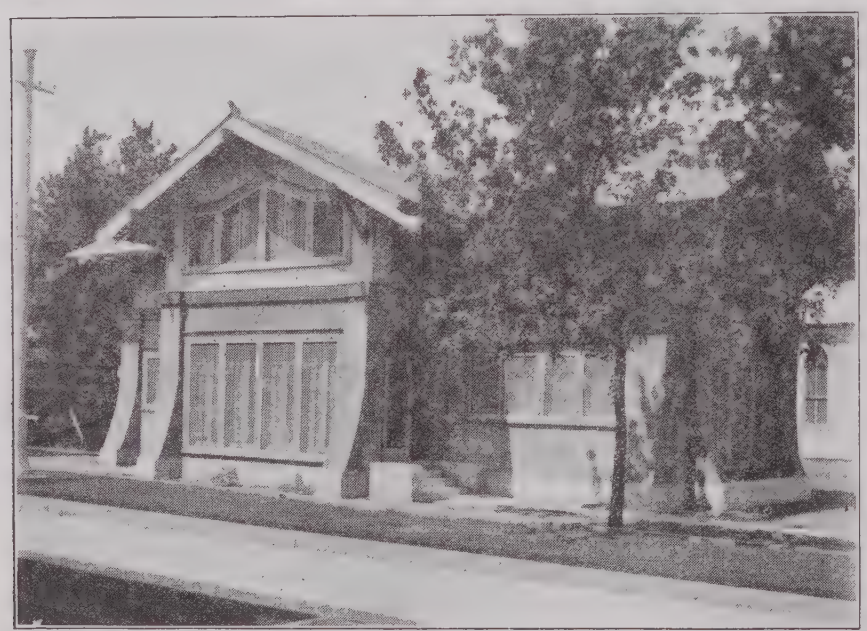
Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Quin, D. D., Coadjutor.

Texas Summer Conference for Church Workers.

"The Lord be with you;
And with thy spirit.
Let us pray:

The Lord be with you;
And with thy spirit.
Let us play."

"These six lines," said Gardiner Tucker, "express the spirit and atmosphere of one of the most remarkable conferences I have yet attended." He referred to the Summer Conference for Workers of the Diocese of Texas; and the conference deserved an interpretation. The Texas Summer School, or conference, was somehow "different"—not so much in scope, kind of programs, quality of instruction or personnel; but in what we may call for want of a better word, "atmosphere." Probably that which had gone before was responsible.



Bishop Quin and the Rev. Gordon Reese had arranged two nine-day camps at Sylvan Beach, La Porte, one for the boys and the other for the girls of the Young People's Service League. The conference for older people followed immediately afterward; and about twenty of the young people who won honors in their camps were retained for the conference. These youngsters "made" the conference. In all likelihood youth was that indefinable "atmosphere" which had been mentioned. At any rate, older folk played, sang, told stories, ate remarkable combinations of edibles, and wheedled extra quarter or half hours beyond bedtime, and came up smiling next morning!

The program opened with Holy Communion at 7 each morning. Every morning from 8:10 to 9 Bishop Quin conducted classes in Personal Religion, which all who were free to do so attended. They were an impressive uniting of instruction, devotions and practical suggestion on the practice of the Presence of God. The conferences and lectures followed in much the regular order listed below, with such changes and alternations as circumstances called for.

From 9:10 until 10 classes and conferences were held on the Y. P. S. L. by Miss Edith T. Parker and the Rev. Gordon M. Reese; on the Christian Nurture Series by the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker and the Rev. W. Aimison Jonnard; on Church History, a course of lectures by the Rev. W. Postell Witsell. From 10:10 until 11 the Rev. Lloyd Craighill spoke on China, and the entire school was given an opportunity to attend his lectures. From 11:10 to 12 Mrs. Quin and the Rev. W. A. Jonnard conducted classes and led conferences on the Church Service League; Mrs. J. C. Tolman, Mrs. F. R. Sawyer and Mrs. Fred W. Catterall addressed groups on the subject of the Woman's Auxiliary; and the Rev. Mr. Tucker held second periods in Christian Nurture, while the Rev. Mr. Jonnard gave courses on teacher training and "teaching the lesson" to teachers and prospective teachers. From 12 to 1 there were other courses on Religious Education, Administration and Teacher Training by Messrs. Tucker and Jonnard; on Social Service by the Rev. Raimundo de Ovies; on the Church Periodical Club by Mrs. C. M. Desel; on the Daughters of the King by Mrs. G. B. Kirwin.

There were certain changes from day to day, and the program was successfully adapted to the needs of the different groups who sought to specialize in particular subjects. The afternoons were given over to rest and recreation, much of the latter being of most strenuous character. One high dignitary in the Church is reported to have ruined, almost beyond repair, three outer garments while playing baseball. The eveenings were devoted to camp fire meetings and sessions of the Aboriginal Tribe of O Wa, of which latter the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker is exalted and benevolent high Sachem (Sewanee men can imagine the details!). And, finally, the keynote and watchword were: "Information, inspiration, consecration"; for even the ludicrous tribal rallies of O Wa were not without their serious overtones, and the closing pageant of Peace and the Prince of Peace was a revelation of the close relation of laughter and tears, of fun and fear of God; and few will soon forget with what natural, spontaneous and serious devotion the whole body knelt and transmuted light-hearted laughter into thanksgiving and praise.

St. John's Rectory, Marlin, Tex., recently built. A seven-room California bungalow type, stuccoed, containing French casement windows throughout. Cost $8,000. The Rev. W. W. Daup is rector of St. John's.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Cornerstone Laying of Holy Comforter Parish House.

The ceremonies connected with the laying of the cornerstone of the new parish house of Holy Comforter Church should bring to the public attention the spirit with which rectors and laymen of Virginia parishes went into the Nation-Wide Campaign.

The plans for this building were drawn and arrangements under way for the raising of the necessary funds in the early summer of 1919. Then came the inauguration of the Nation-Wide Campaign. The rector the Rev. William E. Cox, put aside his drawings, suspended all of his financial operations for the benefit of his own work, and threw himself heart and soul into the great adventure of the general Church, leading his laymen with such enthusiasm that this parish sent out many four-minute speakers, who subsequently became licensed lay readers.

The parish "went over the top" handsomely in subscribing its quota, and has since met its pledge for the second year, with the expectation of doing the same next year, although this has meant the postponement of its own operations for three years. It is, however, this sacrifice of parochial objects to the good of the general Church that has put Virginia in the proud position which she now holds among her sister dioceses.

Exercises marking the laying of the cornerstone for the new parish house of the Church of the Holy Comforter were held Tuesday afternoon, July 19, at 5 o'clock. The religious services will be conducted by the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., assisted by the rector and others.

The parish house, which will cost $65,000, will be ready for occupancy by December. It is the first unit of the new Church of the Holy Comforter, completion of the entire scheme of which will cost $250,000 and consume five years. The structure will be of gothic architecture and of impressive design. The church will have a seating capacity of 600 and the parish house will accommodate a Sunday school of 500.

Vestrymen of the Church of the Holy Comforter are: George J. Freedley, senior warden; F. C. I. Tyndall, junior warden; J. Landon Browning, registrar; W. B. Anderson, F. W. Brooks, Jr., James L. Harty, J. H. Mercer, C. A. Page, E. W. Spence, W. R. Stansbury, T. S. Strade and E. G. Valentine. The Building Committee supervising the construction of the parish house is composed of: George J. Freedley, chairman; J. Luther Moon, vice-chairman; F. C. I. Tyndall, secretary; Carol Taylor, H. P. Beck and V. Bacigalupo.

The Church of the Holy Comforter was built in 1902, and the first service was held October 26 of that year. It was organized as an independent congregation May 21, 1903, by the Diocesan Council, then in session in Winchester, and the building was consecrated by Bishop Gibson June 1, 1903.

It has had three rectors: The first, Rev. John Hallowell Dickinson, from October, 1902, to January 29, 1911; the second, the Ven. A. Vaughan Colston, from July 1, 1911, to July 1, 1916; the Rev. William Edward Cox took charge December 1, 1916. The church edifice now in use was formerly St. Andrew's Church, on South Laurel Street, and was moved when the new St. Andrew's was built. It was moved and rebuilt, with parish house and rectory complete, through the generosity of Miss Grace Arents.

LOUISIANA

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Progress in New Orleans Parish.

St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, has experienced an unusually successful season. The Bishap made a special visitation a few weeks after his regular visit, the two confirmation classes numbering forty-six persons. The Sunday school enrollment and attendance is the largest in twenty-five years. The Rev. J. S. Ditchburn has accepted a call to become assistant minister, and will begin his duties on September 1. Mr. Ditchburn was an officer in the Canadian Army and has just completed his theological course in Trinity College, Toronto. Last summer he served most acceptably as lay assistant at St. Paul's. The rector, Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, has gone to Saluda, N. C., and will have charge of the Church of the Transfiguration in that city during the months of July and August. The Rev. Lucien Malone, of St. Paul's, Columbus, Miss., will be in charge of St. Paul's Parish in July, and the Rev. Holly Wells, of St. James' Church, Port Gibson, Miss., during August.

St. Paul's congregation was deeply interested in the consecration of the Rev. J. D. LaMothe, D. D., to be Bishop of Honolulu, which took place at Baltimore on June 29. Dr. LaMothe served as rector of the parish for nine years, during which time a large debt was liquidated and a parish house purchased, the membership being largely increased. He endeared himself to every member of the parish by his devotion and lovely character. In token of their love and esteem for him, his many friends have presented him with a pectoral cross, which was delivered to him in time for his consecration. The best wishes of the congregation follow him in his new field of labor.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The recently elected Standing Committee of Southwestern Virginia met in Roanoke on Friday, July 15, and organized. The Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, Amherst, Va., was elected president, and the Rev. William G. Pendleton, D. D., Virginia Episcopal School, Lynchburg, Va., was made secretary. All communications to the Standing Committee should be addressed to him.

The Executive Board of the Diocese will meet in the parish house of St. John's Church, Roanoke, the 25th. The special business before the Board at this time will be to receive and consider the report of its committee appointed to confer with a similar committee from the Diocese of Southern Virginia and a committee of the Presiding Bishop and Council relative to the Home for Boys at Covington.

Mr. J. E. Johnson, of Wingina, Va., who a few years ago gave the money for the athletic field at the Virginia Episcopal School, has made an additional donation which will make possible the enlargement and decided improvement of the Johnson athletic field. The school is in a most flourishing condition under the rectorship of the Rev. William G. Pendleton, D. D.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

A special service was held at Grace Church, Georgetown, recently, when a granite cross, twelve feet high, erected to the memory of the men who died overseas, was unveiled. The monument, which stands in the grounds surrounding Grace Church, has been given by members of the parish and was erected through the efforts of Rev. George W. Atkinson, rector of the church, who served overseas during the war with the Y. M. C. A. No men from Grace Church died overseas, but Mr. Atkinson's experiences while in France gave him such a deep appreciation of the patriotism of the men to whom he ministered, that upon his return to this country he determined that Grace Church should be among the first to erect such a monument. A bronze plate on the base of the monument bears the words, "Erected to the memory of our boys who made the supreme sacrifice in the world's great war." Back of the monument a beautiful American flag was unfurled. This flag was given by Justice and Mrs. McCoy in memory of their son. At the unveiling exercises an address was made by Representative Focht, of Pennsylvania. Among those present were several distinguished people in official life in Washington and about fifteen clergymen of the Diocese.

Funeral services for Seth Shepard, Jr., son of the late Chief Justice Shepard, of the Distrit Court of Appeals, were held by the Rev. J. W. Austin, retor of All Saints' Churh, Chevy Chase.

Rev. Dr. Edwin Clattenberg, of Hazleton, Pa., was the preaher at the Church of the Ascension on Sunday morning, July 17.

The special preacher at the people's open-air service, Washington Cathedral, on Sunday, July 17, was the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina.

The quarterly meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council was held for three days during the second week in July at Whitby Hall, Cathedral School for Girls, Cathedral close.

Rt. Rev. Alfred Harding and the dean and chapter of the Cathedral extended an invitation to the Presiding Bishop and Council to be the guests of the National Cathedral School for Girls during the sessions.

Many important matters were discussed and acted upon by the Council, but one of especial interest to the Diocese of Washington was Bishop Harding's invitation to the Council, on behalf of the officials of the Church in Washington, to remove the Church's headquarters from New York to Washington. After a short discussion of the matter by the Council, the Presiding Bishop appointed a committee to take it up with the various churches throughout the country and report at the session next October.

The Presiding Bishop and Council were guests at the White House at 1 o'clock on July 14, when President Harding received them, and on the closing evening of the meeting the Council and several others were guests at a dinner given by Canon and Mrs. J. Townsend Russell at their beautiful home, Beauvoir on Woodley Road. The deliberations of the Presiding Bishop and Council at these quarterly meetings which deal with all the important phases of the work of the Church are held in executive session.

The meeting of this, the executive and administrative body of the Church, which is composed of the outstanding representatives of the clergy and laity throughout the country, is of grave importance and has a direct bearing upon the progress of the Church at large. It is inspiring to have the opportunity as Washington has just had to entertain such a group for such a purpose.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Church Institutions Affected by Court Decisions.

In 1881 the Legislature of Pennsylvania appropriated $30,000 for the support of sectarian charities. This was the beginning. In 1919 the State appropriations for such objects had reached the grand total of $2,120,689. In those intervening thirty-eight years one Legislature had failed to make such appropriations, and two such appropriations had been vetoed by Governors on the ground that they were unconstitutional. But with these three exceptions, the period shows a steady development of the doctrine and the practice of State aid to sectarian objects.

Now, however, has come Willis Collins, a taxpayer and citizen of Dauphin County, with five suits in equity, brought in the Court of Common Pleas of his own county first, and directed against State Treasurer Harmon M. Kephart, to restrain him from paying moneys appropriated to five selected institutions, on the ground that these are denominational or sectarian institutions and that the constitution specifically forbids any such payments. These cases were heard and dismissed in the local courts; whereupon the plaintiff carried them to the State Supreme Court, which handed down its ruling on July 1, reversing the lower court and the legislative and administrative practices of forty years.

Among the institutions which will be crippled by this decision are St. Timothy's Memorial Hospital and the House of Mercy of Philadelphia, which are Church property.

The court was loath to make the decision that it handed down. It said:

There can be no doubt that all the institutions at bar are worthy charities; but it is equally clear that they are within the inhibited class, as far as State aid is concerned. We did not write the constitution; but whether agreeing with or dissenting from the rules of public policy there announced, our sworn duty is to enforce them. Those who adopted the restrictions against appropriating money to sectarian institutions must change the rule, if desired, either through the amendment to the present constitution or by making a new one; neither the Legislature acting alone nor the courts have power so to do.

And again:

If constitutions are to command respect and obedience, the people must know that their courts will constantly endeavor to interpret them according to the commonly accepted understanding of the words used therein; and when this rule is applied to the facts before us, the result is inevitable.

Accordingly the decisions appealed from were all reversed by the court, the records were remitted to the lower court with directions to reinstate the bills in equity and to grant the restraining orders, the costs of all this litigation to be borne by the defendant organizations.

Pennsylvania has been the State where the system of public grants to private charities has been deepest rooted and where its abuses have been most flagrant. At one stroke a great body of institutions have been eliminated from the system. Three courses are open: for these institutions individually to change their organization, for them to agitate for a constitutional amendment, or for the public opinion of the State to seize the opportunity to wipe out the system altogether.

Union Services at Marietta.

There are five Protestant churches, including St. John's Episcopal, in Marietta, and three of them have new ministers, likewise including St. John's. In order that the new men may have an opportunity to meet the members of the other congregations and vice versa; also, that there may be encouraged a spirit of fellowship among the people of the various congregations, community union services were decided on for the Sunday evenings of July.

As there are five churches in town and five Sundays, it affords each church an opportunity to have one of the services, with some minister other than its own to preach the sermon. Accordingly, they began by having the first service in the Methodist Church, with the Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson, minister of St. John's Episcopal Church, preaching the sermon. Then the other churches take their turn, and each one of the ministers is given a place on the program at each service. The minister in whose church the service is held has charge of the service for that evening and assigns parts in the service to each visiting minister. The loose offerings are equally divided among the participating congregations.

The services are very well attended and nothing but praise is being heard from the various members of the several participating churches. Each church is well filled at each service, and considerable conservation of electric lights, current for organ motors, etc., etc., is effected.

Plans for a series of buildings for

(Continued on page 14)

Family Department

JULY.

1. Friday.
3. Sixth Sunday after Trinity.
10. Seventh Sunday after Trinity.
17. Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Ninth Sunday after Trinity.
25. Monday. St. James.
31. Tenth Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Ninth Sunday After Trinity.

Grant to us, Lord, we beseech Thee, the spirit to think and do always such things as are right, that we, who cannot do anything that is good without Thee, may by Thee be enabled to live according to Thy will; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. James the Apostle.

Grant, O merciful God, that, as Thine holy Apostle, St. James, leaving his father and all that he had, without delay was obedient unto the calling of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, and followed Him; so we forsaking all worldly and carnal affections, may be evermore ready to follow Thy holy commandments; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

For the Southern Churchman.

Adornment.

Jesse Jouette.

The motto of the earth, alas,
Being of the earth, earth-born,
Bids me put forth my utmost care
The earthly to adorn;
But like the Psalmist, whose clear tones
Ring through the ages past,
I note who seek such fading joys,
Find vanity at last.

Rich garments nor the gifts of gold
Eternal ways shall find,—
The soul shall pass to other realms,
But these be left behind.
Then why should I let fading joys
Fill all my thoughts and days,
Instead of winning graces which
May pass to heavenly ways?

It Is the Heart That Counts.

It is the heart that counts—what is inside. He may be dressed in expensive clothing or in patches it matters not. He may be well up-to-date or woefully "behind the times." What he is—is what he is. And our church, be it little or big, is what the people and their rector make it. A church is what they are. In the little country church, if the people are loving and friendly and Christian, the parish is to that extent blessed. If otherwise, then otherwise. In the great city parish if the people are loving and friendly and Christian, that parish, too, to that extent, is blessed. It is what its people are that counts—the heart, the pulse, the life of the parish.

And so when the rector of a great city parish walked into the open vestibule on his return from his summer holiday, knelt for a few brief moments in a pew and thanked God for the gift of His Holy Spirit in the wide-spreading city parish of which the church he stood in was the centre and he the human head, he meant it. He thanked God in all faith and sincerity for his great field of work, with its multitude of people groping toward the Light. He looked upon the rich furnishings, the wonderful altar, the chancel enrichment, the gilded pipes of the great organ blending their golden attunement with the subdued woodwork, carved and beautiful, the things and emblems of useful harmony—he looked upon all these and thanked God for them—instruments placed in his hands that he might lead his people to use them and the wonderful temple in which they were to the glory of God.

And when the rector of the poor little wooden church that was hard for its people to build opened the plain front door, passed through the vestibule and—like the other rector—dropped on his knees and prayed for help in leading his little flock of plain and humble people, he, too, meant it. As he rose to a sitting posture he glanced about him, and, like the city rector, inventoried his surroundings. He, too, saw a glorified altar, this one made of plain pine wood and stained—but carefully and well made. Yet it was glorified, just like the other altar. There was no rich carpet on the floor—only a strip of crash up the narrow aisle. But he, too, thanked God for all this. They were his human instruments divinely ordained.

The parish—whatever parish—is what its people and rector are. United, they have been the architects and guardians of its traditions. Each rector would feel at home—with God—in the other's church. But for each his own is best. His own is best because he has done his work—God's work—among its people. Brown-stone mansion, homely cottage—in each parish homes, homes, homes. These contain the hearth-stones of the people, the centres of the family life, the springs of the inflowing and outgoing and all-hallowing tides of life that come and go, out and in, throughout the parish community.

Each rector loves his parish, his people. He loves his work among them, his play and theirs. It is the heart that counts—what is inside. Amid high or low, rich or poor, stately church or modest mission—and in the homes of the people; in these he finds his work and his satisfaction. The heart inside is what counts.—Selected.

The Difference.

"As for me, I think one religion is about as good as another. It's mostly a matter of climate and race and tradition."

"That's so," said the other man. "Christianity is sentimentally attractive. But what has it ever really done? It has broken down under the war. It's no better than any other religion."

The world is small, and travelers in America may expect the unusual. The two men were on a transcontinental train. A man seated across the aisle, who had the air of a foreigner, suddenly leaned forward and said very politely:

"Pardon; but your remarks, which I could not help hearing, deeply interest me. May I say why?"

"Surely. Go ahead," the first speaker replied, looking curiously at the foreigner.

"Thank you, sir. I am an Armenian. I was born in Bitlis. Bitlis has about forty thousand people. Have you a town of that size you can think of in America?"

"Just the size of my own town," said the second man.

"Take your town, then, and call it Bitlis; and say of your town these things: no hospital, no doctor, no dentist, no church except the mission and the Armenian, no press, no telephone, no sanitation, no water system, no library, no transportation, no nurse, no public school. And that is your town, here in America. That is, you understand, my town of Bitlis in Turkey.

"The one bright spot in my town is the Christian mission, which supports a dispensary and a school and the hope of life. During the recent uprising against the Armenians, in which over three hundred thousand of them were massacred, the missionaries in Bitlis, aided by those in Van, at the risk of their lives saved me from torture and death. All my relatives were murdered and our property was utterly destroyed. My wife and children were tortured and burned alive in my house.

"Do you wonder that I cannot agree with you that one religion is as good as another? Gentlemen, it is Christianity that has stretched out its healing hand to the tortured people of Europe, and after the war it will be the spirit of the Master that will build up life on the ghastly ruins. I am a witness of it."

The men who had flippantly dismissed Christianity in two sentences spent the next hour learning some wholesome truths about Christian missions and the heroes of the cross.—Youth's Companion.

A Prayer.

Dear Christ, whenever in some deep despair
I have been faithless, when my heart refused
Her portion of Thy bitter cup, abused
Thy tender mercies, would not cast her care
On Thee, what time my trembling spirit wept,
And was afraid, false-hearted vigil kept
With things that perish, guarding dust with dust,—
Let not my foolish heart her weakness plead,
E'en not her bitterest hour, her deepest need!
No advocate, no plea my soul can trust,
With this dark stain before the Father's throne
Save but Thyself, and Thy shed blood alone!

—R. L. Dodd.

Short Cuts.

The temptation meets us at every turn. And it is because the temptation is so general that it figures so prominently in the Temptation in the wilderness. He was tempted in all points like as we are; and therefore He was tempted to take short cuts. This is the essence of that weird and terrible story. It is notable that all the three things that Jesus was tempted to acquire were good things, things to be desired, things that He was destined to possess. But the whole point of the record is that He was tempted to make His way to the bread and the angels and the kingdoms by means of short cuts. Now this is vastly significant. It is significant because, when you come to think of it, nearly all the things that we are tempted to acquire are good things. The temptation consists in the suggestion that we should possess ourselves of those good things prematurely or illicitly. We are urged to make short cuts to our legitimate goal. Jesus was tempted to cut the Gordian knot, and to thus obtain an immediate but fleeting hold on the objects of His just desire. He rejected the proposal. He preferred patiently to untie the knot, and thus to make Himself king of all kingdoms forever and forever.

Of the perils attending short cuts, John Bunyan is our chief expositor. Wherever a dangerous but alluring footpath breaks off from the high road, a statue of Mr. Worldly Wiseman ought to be erected. For it was Mr. Worldly Wiseman that first got the poor pilgrim into such sore trouble. Mr. Worldly Wiseman knew a short cut to the Celestial City. Christian took that short cut—the footpath over the hills and through the village of Morality—and dearly did he pay for his folly. And yet it is difficult to blame him. Poor Christian was heavily burdened, and every inch that could be saved was a consideration. Evangelist had clearly directed him, it is true; but then, if Mr. Worldly Wiseman knew a short cut, why not take it? Let him who has no such burden as this poor pilgrim had cast the first stone at Christian. "I cannot," says Dr. Alexander Whyte. "If one who looked like a gentleman came to me tonight and told me how I could on the spot get to a peace of conscience never to be lost again, and how I could get a heart tonight that would never any more plague and pollute me, I should be mightily tempted to forget what all my former teachers had told me, and try this new gospel. Exactly! The temptation to cut the Gordian knot is very alluring. The advice to get-rich-quick, or to get-good-quick, or to get-there-quick, is very acceptable. But by his story of the short cut, and the anguish that followed, Bunyan has taught us that the longest way round is often the shortest way home. This is sound sense in the song that bids us "take time to be holy." The short cut that avoids the wicket-gate and the cross is merely a blind lane, from which we shall return sooner or later with blistered feet and broken hearts.—F. W. Boreham.

A Chinese Madonna.

The most intimately dear of childish memories are grouped around my gentle mother. She was a young woman of about thirty, who believed that the duty of a woman was to be loyal to her husband, devoted to her children, reverent to her parents and kind to her neighbors. After twilight she used to hold me in her warm arms as she sat on the red-lacquered bed of sandalwood, with a dimly lighted lamp of peanut oil illuminating her loving face before my wondering eyes. She rocked me with rhythmical motions and sang to me in soothing tones:

"Sleep, my good little son,
Sleep on and on till morn."

Her voice grew fainter as I slowly journeyed into slumberland, and yet, when I woke in the morning I found my head still resting upon the soft pillow of her arm. She would clear away the sleepy feeling from my eyes with her silken handkerchief, and then look at me tenderly with perhaps an air of pride as the thought that she had a son. And the overflowing devotion of motherhood would urge her to embrace me closely as though fearing that some one might snatch me away. This, perhaps, is the utmost demonstration of love that a Chinese mother can give, for in China the habit of kissing is not practiced. She would dress me and wash my face, and the servant would have soft-boiled rice, with some salted fish or salted meat, ready for my breakfast. Milk, which is seldom used in China even now, was then unknown. The Chinese mother feared that cow's milk might give some animal instinct to her child.—Asia Magazine.

God's Sanctuary.

God is never so far off
As even to be near;
He is within: our spirit is
The home He holds most dear.

To think of Him as by our side
Is almost as untrue
As to remove His throne beyond
Those skies of starry blue.

So all the while I thought myself
Homeless, forlorn and weary,
Missing my joy, I walked the earth,
Myself God's sanctuary.

—F. W. Faber.

As We Forgive.

"The Lord's Prayer," says Richard, of Saint Victor, "is a water so shallow that a lamb may wade in it, and yet so deep that an elephant may swim in it." The child who learns it at his mother's knee finds it no puzzle of strange and mysterious words. The greatest theologian sees depth in it beyond his sounding. Luther wrote exposition upon exposition of it, and then went to heaven to learn its full sense.

One of the petitions which does or ought to arouse thought in us is that which seems to equalize our forgiveness of those who have wronged us with that which God shows to us. The offenses we endure are so trifling in comparison with those we inflict upon God by our sins that there seems an incongruity here. And this is the more impressive because it seems to promise us that, if we forgive these small matters, God will forgive the sinfulness of our sins.

The seeming incongruity is in part due to our superficial view of what man's forgiveness of man must be when real and genuine. Our brother offends us in some way that ruffles our temper and excites our indignation. We regard his offense as purely personal toward ourselves, and for the time we are angry. Then with the lapse of time a different mood comes over us, our "good nature" gets the upper hand, and we say we have forgiven him. And the next time we utter this great petition it is with a degree of complacency. We may actually feel that we have complied with God's condition for forgiving us.

The wrongness of all this is first of all in our cheap appraisement of the wrong-doing, as if it were an offense against ourselves only, and not against the moral order of God's universe. We make the offense—even if it be a real one—altogether too small a thing to need deep feeling. We are not stirred, as Jesus was, to our depths by the wrongness of wrong. Consequently we feel neither the indignation nor the pity which the situation calls for. We do not hate the sin as God hates every sin, even the smallest! And we do not pity the sinner as God pities him, even the worst of sinners. After such a replacement of egotistic anger by mere careless "good nature," we have no right to plead our act as being such a forgiveness as is to be named in the same breath with the forgiveness of God.

As Dr. P. T. Forsyth says, it costs God something to forgive sin; and while that saying does not cover the whole field of Christ's sacrifice, it has far-reaching suggestion toward our understanding of it. So when we pray, "Forgive us our trespasses," we are asking for Jesus Christ and all He is and can do for our restoration to sinless fellowship with His Father.

Now, while human forgiveness can never parallel God's forgiveness, nor does the Lord's Prayer teach that, nevertheless in a true human forgiveness there is involved the purpose and the effort of restoration of the offender, not merely to a pleasurable sense of our good nature toward him, but to a better life, in which he will live on a far higher level, and get nearer to God. "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual," or faultless, "restore such a one in the spirit of meekness." His fault, even if known only to you and offending you only, is a summons to Christ-like love and activity.

What we often call forgiveness is cheap enough and fruitless enough, and, therefore, quite unlike to that of God. His cannot be named beside that, as our Lord names real forgiveness when He teaches us to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"—for that, let us be thankful, is not how God forgives.—The Diocese (S. C.).

The Great Commission.

The Great Commission does not mean Home Missions. Neither does it mean Foreign Missions. It means missions, here, there, everywhere—home, foreign, fashionable avenue, city slum, western frontier, jungle wild, desert isolation, wilderness waste places, and metropolitan centre, Orient and Occident, near and far, going from sea to sea, island to island, continent to continent, for the gospel is not racial, peninsular, provincial, sectarian or limited in any way whatsoever. To the contrary, it is inclusive of all people everywhere, irrespective of race, color, tongue or clime.

The missionary enterprise is love in action, love incarnate in men and women of the heroic breed and mien, and it expresses itself in the deeds of a Livingstone, who said, "Every land is my Fatherland"; it makes itself felt in the evangel of a John Wesley, who said, "The world is my parish." It awaits the plowing and planting and cultivation of the representatives of God and the exponents of His righteousness and the pathfinders of His kingdom. "No man, having put his hand to the plow and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God." This love in action represents itself in the annals of missionary biography and the chronicles of missionary autobiography. And the reason we are so glad and so willing to go into all the world is because the Master of all the world has promised to go with us. Well might we all sing with Watts and make our song a prayer:

"O for this love let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break,
And all harmonious tongues
The Saviour's praises speak!"

—R. Braunstein.

A little kindly deed in some life cast
Is never vain; its ripples running free
May widen with the years and touch at last
The shining breaches of eternity.

—A. W. Peach.

For the Young Folks

When Bobby Learned to Whistle.

When Bobby learned to whistle
He was proud as he could be,
For he had tried to do it
These many months you see.

He had screwed his mouth up round,
And had blown his breath out strong;
But not a whistle came—
There was surely something wrong.

He had practiced by himself;
He was drilled by other boys;
But his work was done in vain,
For he only made a noise.

Then he wondered if his tongue
Was unfitted for the art.
And he worried lest his teeth
Had been placed too far apart.

Till one glad day it happened!
His heart was filled with cheer,
For from his lips there issued
A whistle loud and clear.

He's been whistling ever since,
At morning, night, and noon;
His whistle's never silent—
And it's always out of tune!
—Margaret MacGregor, in St. Nicholas.

The Pound.

"I have an announcement to make," said mother one morning at the breakfast table, and as mother's announcements were usually interesting, father and David and Betty looked at her expectantly.

"I've decided," said mother, happily, "I've decided to strike!"

"To strike!" echoed David, in astonishment.

Father's eyes twinkled over the edge of his newspaper. "Why shouldn't you?" he agreed. "I've just this minute read that the tack-makers are going to strike! If tack-makers strike, I don't see why any one in the world who wants to shouldn't. Why do you want to?"

"You don't mean that you aren't going to cook any more, do you, mother?" asked Betty, anxiously, helping herself to another golden-brown muffin.

"Oh, no," said mother, laughing, "I'll cook and keep the house clean, and sew on buttons and darn stockings as usual, but I'm going to strike on picking up after people all day long. Aren't my demands perfectly reasonable? I'm going to open a pound."

"What's a pound?" asked David, with interest.

"A pound is a place where lost dogs are taken and kept till their owners call for them. Instead of dogs, I'm going to collect mislaid articles."

"Do they just go and get the dogs out—the owners, I mean?" went on David, far more interested in the real pound than in mother's imitation.

"The owners have to pay—that's the point," answered mother, in her most unruffled way. "So, as I'm going to have a business-like pound, owners will have to pay to get their things out."

"How much?" inquired Betty, anxiously.

"Father, too?" asked David.

"One question at a time," said mother. "A penny for each mislaid article," she said to Betty, and to David, "If you're as thoughtful as your father, you'll keep most of your pennies and find very few of your possessions in the pound."

"It's a good plan!" said father, and, flattered by such praise, added: "I'll pay five cents to redeem each thing of mine that gets into the pound. Where's this pound to be?"

"I've cleared off the big bench in the cellar," said mother, "and spread clean paper on it, so none of your things will come to harm. And I shall follow the most modern and approved methods of trusting my customers. You'll find a saucer on the bench, and you are requested to reclaim your own things and leave the correct change."

"Well!" said David.

"Here are your allowances for the week. I thought you might find it convenient to have them this time in pennies," went on mother, mischievously, as she put fifteen pennies at Betty's place and fifteen at David's.

"You don't mean, do you, mother, that just the very second we're through playing with anything we have to put it back in its place?" asked David, who wanted to be sure of his ground.

"If you're playing with your erector, you know I don't mind if you leave it a little while; but I do object when a boy ten years old leaves it strewn all over the floor at night and then next morning flies out the door to school with never a thought of a very untidy room."

"Oh!" said David, remembering.

"And dolls?" asked Betty.

"Same principles applies to dolls, and to all sorts of things. Some little girls of eight can remember to hang up their nightgowns and put their slippers in the closet instead of leaving just that much more for mother to do each morning."

"Oh!" said Betty, remembering.

"It's a good plan!" repeated father, as he was going out the door.

"Ho, ho!" said David gleefully. "Father always leaves his overcoat on the newel post, days he decides it's too warm to wear it. Does that go in the pound, mother?"

But the front door opened unexpectedly and father, hurrying in, said, "Something I forgot!" and after rummaging in the pocket and finding nothing, he hung the coat in the hall closet with an air of great unconcern.

Mother and David and Betty shouted with laughter, and father, trying at first to look surprised, had to join in. "Well, I'm not the first, anyway," he laughed as he went out the second time.

Mother went about her tasks, humming gayly. "I wonder how many exhibits I shall have in my pound by night?" she asked as she kissed David and Betty good-by at the door. "Won't kitty be surprised when he looks out of his bed by the furnace and sees upstairs things down in the cellar with him?"

"Maybe you'll never get a single thing in your pound," said Betty hopefully.

"I hope I never shall," answered mother.

* * * * * * *

That evening David and Betty went upstairs at half-past seven as usual, and as usual mother called after them, "Call me when you're ready for bed."

Presently above stairs Betty's door opened, then David's—then followed a whispered conference in the hall.

"I don't forget to hang up my pajamas any oftener than you forget your nightgown," whispered David. "Your slippers? Why, how could you forget your slippers when mother reminded you of them just this morning?"

"Come on," whispered Betty. "They're nowhere in my room, so they must be in the pound. I've got my penny. Get yours for your pajamas—and let's be quiet."

As quietly as possible they tiptoed to the landing.

"Ready for bed?" called mother, pleasantly.

"Not quite," said David.

"In a minute," said Betty.

Snapping on the light, the two ran down the cellar stairs and stopped in astonishment before the tool-bench.

"Why, I don't remember leaving my sweater around," said Betty, recognizing a neatly folded red garment.

"You never hang it up," commented David; "but I don't see where mother found these tops."

"You left them on the doorstep when you went back to school this noon. I remember seeing them!" giggled Betty. "Why, David Martin, this bench is 'most full this one first day! Here's your raincoat!"

"It didn't rain when I went back to school," David defended himself, "and I left it in the vestibule till I decided whether I'd take it or not. Here's your doll-carriage with Phyllis in it! Where did you leave that?"

"On the walk, I guess," admitted Betty. "David, what did we come down to find, anyway? There are so many things, I've forgotten. Oh, here are father's two pet pipes!"

"That's ten cents for him," chuckled David. "He's always hunting them."

"Well, that's all of father's that is here," said Betty, enviously. "Have you counted your things, David? I've got to go up and get ten more pennies."

Peter-Cat, curious as always, left his bed by the furnace and jumped up on the bench. "Mother said you'd be surprised to see upstairs things come down to live with you, Peter-Cat," said Betty, smothering a laugh in old Peter-Cat's furry coat.

"Come on, let's get our pennies," said David.

"How many do you have to get?" asked Betty, with great interest.

"Never you mind," said David. "I've got my things all in this pile and you're not to count my pennies after I put them in the saucer. Mother didn't say we had to tell."

"Then you must have more things than me," said Betty, with feminine acumen.

Upstairs two metal banks were shaken and finally clicked open.

"Ready for bed?" called mother, pleasantly.

"Not quite," said Betty.

"In a minute," said David.

Going down the cellar stairs for the second time, they met father coming stealthily up. In his mouth was one of his cherished pipes.

"What are you going down cellar for?" he asked in great surprise.

"O daddy, we wondered if you'd think to look in the pound for your pipes," chuckled David.

"There were a few other things there besides my pipes," remarked father, pleasantly, and added: "It's a good plan! It's such a good plan. I left four nickels instead of two in the saucer."

"Well, we can't leave twice as much as we ought to, or we'd be bankrupt," said Betty, mournfully. "It's lucky mother gave us our allowances in pennies."

Doll-carriage and tops were returned noiselessly to the toy closet, and again

David and Betty climbed the stairs, their arms heavily laden.

"Ready for bed?" called mother, pleasantly.

"Not quite," said Betty.

"Not quite," echoed David, for you see there were a great many things to be put away.

Four weeks after the opening of the pound, mother said one morning at the breakfast table, "I have an announcement to make," and father, David and Betty paid prompt attention. "I wish to announce," went on mother, "that the pound is temporarily discontinued. I haven't had a thing in it for three days. I found it a very profitable business, especially the first week, but I'm not sorry to give it up. Of course, I could open it again at a minute's notice. Here are your allowances, this time not in pennies."

"We haven't had an allowance to keep for quite a while," remarked David.

"No," agreed mother. "All allowances have returned promptly to the pound saucer. Think of the time I've saved, besides money. But these last three days—well, it has been wonderful!"

"It's just as easy to keep things picked up if you can remember," said David, with a superior air.

"It's easier!" declared Betty, going him one better.

"There's always the pound, if we should have relapses," said mother, solemnly, though her eyes twinkled as she looked at father.

"It's a good plan! I've said so from the first," said father.—Presbyterian Banner.

Grandma's House.

When we go down to grandma's house
(That's me and sister Sue),
I can't begin to tell you all
The jolly things we do.

We feed the chickens, help to milk
Old Nell, the brindle cow—
The little piggies, cute, we watch
With Moll, the mother sow.

Down to the meadow, by the brook,
We dearly love to go,
Where in the grass so thick and deep
The wild strawberries grow.

And Bruno, too, he goes along,
And barks, and barks, for glee,
And won't let any harm at all
Touch sister Sue or me.

Oh I can't tell you all the things
At grandma's house we do;
But, oh, we have a jolly time
(That's me and sister Sue).

—Annie McIntyre Van Eman.

Four Essentials.

A man from his shoulders down is worth $2 a day, but from his shoulders up there is no limit to his earning capacity. I never saw a boy or a man who got anywhere if he did not work. As a boy grows older he will find the competition between men very keen, and he who is fairly well educated has a distinct advantage over the man who is not.

Every boy has some kind of a vague idea that he would like to be something or other when he grows up, but he does not know just what. He will find, however, that there are three or four simple things that tend to a man's success. The first is good health. It is impossible for a boy or man to work against the handicap of poor health. The next thing is honesty. No man in this or any other country who was not honest attained success. He may appear to do this for a time, but when his dishonesty is discovered—which will be sooner or later—his success is at an end and his failure begins. The third essential is education; without education it is impossible to climb to any important position. The fourth essential is work. Nothing was ever accomplished without work, and if any man tells you differently it is not the truth. During this year many capable men will be required to fill important positions, and he who has the essentials to which I have referred is the one who will get the preference.

The things we admire most in other men are the qualities we should develop in ourselves. The first is honesty, the second courage, and third modesty. Without courage one could not go very far in this world. If a man is content to stand aside for others, he is bound to lose. Without modesty no man can secure the respect of his fellow-beings. Every man's hand is against the man who shows he believes himself better than others. When I was a youngster my father, who was a very wise man, used to say, "Never think you are better than anybody else, but always think you are as good." Modesty is one of the finest qualities a boy or man could have.—E. W. Beatty, President Canadian Pacific Railway.

The Discontented Pig.

A Thuringian Folk Tale.

Ever so long ago, in the time when there were fairies, and men, and animals talked together, there was a curly-tailed pig.

He lived by himself in a house at the edge of the village, and every day he worked in his garden; whether the sun shone or the rain fell he hoed and dug and weeded, turning the earth around his tomato vines, and loosening the soil of the carrot plot until word of his fine vegetables traveled through seven counties, and each year he won the royal prize at the fair.

But after a time that little pig grew tired of the endless toil.

"What matters it if I do have the finest vegetables in the kingdom," he thought, "since I must work myself to death getting them to grow? I mean to go out and see the world and find an easier way of making a living."

So he locked the door of his house and shut the gate of his garden and started down the road. A good three miles he traveled, till he came to a cottage almost hidden in a grove of trees. Lovely music sounded around him, and the little pig smiled, for he had an ear for sweet sounds.

"I will go look for it," he said, following in the direction from which it seemed to come. Now it happened that in that house dwelt Thomas, a cat, who made his living playing on the violin. Little pig saw him standing in the door pushing the bow up and down across the strings. It put a thought into his head. Surely this must be easier and far more pleasant than digging in the garden! "Will you teach me to play the violin, friend cat?" he asked.

Thomas looked up from his bow and nodded his head.

"To be sure," he answered. "Just do as I am doing," and he gave him the bow and fiddle.

Little pig took them and began to saw, but squeak, quang! No sweet music fell upon his ears! The sounds were like the squealing of his baby brother pigs when the wolf came too near. "Oh!" he cried, "this is not music."

Thomas, the cat, nodded his head.

"Of course not," he said. "You haven't tried long enough. He who would play the violin must work."

"Then I think I'll look for something else," Piggywig answered, "because this is quite as hard as weeding my garden."

And he gave the bow back with the fiddle and started down the road.

He walked on and on until he came to a hut where lived a dog who made cheese. He was kneading it and malding the curd into cakes, and little pig thought it looked quite easy. "I think I'd like to go into the cheese business," he said to himself. So he asked the dog if he would teach him.

This the dog was quite willing to do, and a moment later the pig was working beside him.

Soon he grew tired and hot, and stopped to rest and fan himself.

"No, no!" cried the dog. "You will spoil the cheese. There can be no rest until the work is done." Little pig opened his eyes in amazement.

"Indeed," he replied, "then this is just as hard as growing vegetables and learning the violin. I mean to look for something easier."

And he started down the road.

On the other side of the river, in a green field, a man was taking honey out of bee-hives.

Little pig saw him as he crossed the bridge, and thought of all the trades he knew of, this suited him best. It must be lovely there in the meadow among the flowers. Honey was not heavy to lift, and once in a while he could have a mouth full of it. He ran as fast as he could go to ask the man if he would take him into his employ. This plan pleased the bee man as much as it pleased the pig.

"I've been looking for a helper for a year and a day," he said. "Begin work at once."

He gave little pig a veil and a pair of gloves, telling him to fasten them on well. Then he told him to lift out a honey comb.

Little pig ran to do it, twisting his curly tail in the joy of having at last found a business that suited him. But buzz, buzz! The bees crept under his veil and inside his gloves. They stung him on his fingers, his mouth, his ears and the end of his nose, and he ran off howling at the top of his voice as he tore off the veil and flung it back to the bee man.

"Come back, come back," said the bee man. "You must expect to get stung at first. You must learn how to do the work."

"Then I'll have no more to do with it," exclaimed little pig, as he ran down the road; "it seems to me that every business has its hardships. Whether it be learning the violin or making cheese or getting honey. It all means work, and if that is so I think I would be better in my own garden."

And so he went back, and every day he worked in his garden, whether the sun shone or the rain fell; he hoed and dug and weeded, turning the earth around his tomato vines, and loosening the soil of the carrot plot, and each year he won the royal prize at the fair. —Presbyterian Banner, Australia.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER.

All summer hats reduced. $15.00 hats to $7.50; $10.00 hats to $5.00. Avail yourself of this opportunity and wear a pretty summer hat.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

WANTED — TWO SECOND-HAND wheel chairs; one for a crippled man, the other for a little girl twelve years old, who has permanent spinal trouble. Both live back in the mountains and are quite out of reach of any help except that supplied by the Church Mission. Persons having wheel chairs to dispose of can communicate with Miss Margaretta James, Deaconess in Charge, Holy Cross Mission, Batesville, Albemarle County, Va.

BOARDING.

GREER HOUSE, FOR STUDENTS AND Church women during the summer months. Reduced rates. Apply to Director, Greer House, 123 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A COMPANION FOR AN elderly lady for three months or longer. Attractive home in the country near Annapolis. Duties not hard. Require reading aloud and general attention. Please addresss communication to Mrs. R. B. Dashiell, 90 Duke of Gloucester Street, Annapolis, Md.

WANTED—A TEACHER FOR THREE children. Usual English branches and music. Address Mrs. J. C. Saunders, Premier, W. Va.

WANTED—A MATRON FOR THE BLUE Ridge Industrial School. For particulars apply to Rev. Geo. P. Mayo, 111 North Fifth Street, Richmond, Va.

WANTED — MATRON, HOUSEKEEPER and sewing teacher for Church Institution. Address "T," care of Southern Churchman.

SITUATION WANTED.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant or matron in a school, or as chaperon in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, MIDdle-aged woman, capable of taking entire care of children, wants position as nurse for one or two little girls. Can sew. Address "S. L. H.," care of Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

WANTED — BY A REFINED YOUNG lady, a position as companion or nursery governess. Address "L.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, BY refined, capable woman, position as useful companion or housekeeper for lady. Address Mrs. H., care of Southern Churchman.

ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, GREAT EXperience, highest references furnished, wishes position in parish having good field for teaching. Address Organist, 4054 North Hermitage Avenue, Chicago.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Valentine: Entered into life eternal, July 14, 1921, LILA MEADE VALENTINE, daughter of Jane Catherine Fontaine and Richard Hardaway Meade, and widow of the late Benjamin B. Valentine. The funeral service was held in the Monumental Church, Richmond, Va.

Tabb: Died Sunday morning, July 3, at his home, Summerville, in Gloucester County, Va., JOHN TABB, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

"I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith."

Battle: In loving memory of JOHN MANNING BATTLE second lieutenant, 23rd Infantry, A. E. F., who died of shell wounds near Soissons, France, on July 21, 1918.

MRS. MARY LATANE SALE.

In the passing of MRS. MARY LATANE SALE, May 2, 1921, the Woman's Auxiliary and Guild of St. Anne's Parish, Essex County, Va., mourn the loss of a faithful member. The removal of their oldest member takes from them a representative of the high ideals and devotion to duty of a past generation whose place cannot be filled.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thousand churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request Correspondence solicited

M. P. MÖLLER

Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING

72 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Gold, Silver and Brass

Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.

108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis

Big Mary Goes to the Hospital.

Big Mary is a doll, the very one that you have read about, whom her little mother brought to the church to help make up the "two or three."

When the little girl first came up to the church to help her father pray for the world, she brought Big Mary with her, and the doll was made to take her part in the service by kneeling.

That was two years ago, and Big Mary had grown old and shabby looking so, as she was one of the three who started the Order of the Thousandfold, it was thought that her life ought to be preserved as long as possible, as she may become an heirloom in the family. So she was taken to the doll hospital at Wanamaker's store in Philadelphia, and instructions were given that she must be cared for very specially, as she had an interesting history.

The rest cure lasted for over six weeks, which seemed a long time to the little girl; but this morning there was a long parcel post package, with Wanamaker's name on it, and inside we knew must be Big Mary. But family prayers were going on when the mail was brought in, which meant a few minutes' more delay. However, her father cut down the prescribed Scripture lesson to a minimum; and prayers being over, Big Mary was immediately released from her temporary prison.

The hospital treatment had indeed renewed her youth, and for a moment or two the little girl hesitated; but on trying on her clothes they were found to fit her exactly, and the doubt as to her identity was removed, and she said, "I know she's Big Mary now, because her clothes fit her."

Of course, when noon came she was taken up to the church, and the little girl made her kneel just as she had done, when she made her first appearance two years ago.—Our Mountain Work.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE

Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.

Flowers of Quality

R. L. Christian & Co.

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocers

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES.

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Nick Bull's Market

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME.

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

The Ivory Carver and the Painter.

(A Tibetan Story.)

A skillful ivory carver living in India once made of ivory a number of rice grains, which he took to Greece. There he lived in the house of a painter.

One day, while the painter was absent, the ivory carver gave the rice grains to the painter's wife, saying, "Cook this rice for me, if you please!"

The woman put the rice in a pot and set it on the fire; but, though she cooked it for many hours, it would not become soft. At last all her firewood was exhausted.

Presently the painter returned home, and his wife told him of the rice that would not be cooked.

"Let me see the rice," said the painter.

He perceived at once that the rice grains were carved ivory, and quietly told his wife so. Then he said aloud, so that the painter could hear, "Good wife, the water in which you are cooking the rice is salt. You must have fresh water."

The woman turned to the ivory carver and said, "Will you please bring me some fresh water?"

So the ivory carver took a jug and went to fetch some water.

Now the painter had painted on a rock nearby a picture of a pond with a snake lying beside it asleep. The ivory carver came upon this painting, and thought that he would get water from the pond. When he saw the snake he carefully stepped aside, and then tried to dip his jug in the water. But he only smashed his jug on the rock. "I have been properly fooled," he thought.

Then he went back to the painter's house. "I thought I was clever," he said to the painter, "when I deceived your wife; but you are cleverer than I. For I am an artist myself, and yet you deceived me."—W. Norman Brown.

Our Feathered Friends in Winter.

"Poor little birds!" said Mary as she looked out of her window one cold winter morning. The birds were sitting on the wires in front of her home. "They must be cold, mother."

"No, they do not feel cold; birds are very warm little creatures, Mary. Perhaps they are hungry; the ground is covered with snow, and they cannot find grains or seeds. You might sprinkle some crumbs on the porch for them."

Mary ran into the kitchen and soon had a breakfast sprinkled on the porch for the birds. She wondered how she could make the birds know that the crumbs were there.

"Never mind," mother said, "they will find them. When little birds are hungry they come very near to the home. It makes them quite tame."

At noon Mary was happy to see all the crumbs had disappeared, so she sprinkled about some more. Now every day Mary takes care of her little flock and has learned to love them.

Don't you think it would be very cheerless if we had no sparrows, chickadees and snowbirds with us during the long winter months? Birds are our friends. They eat the worms and insects that would hurt fruit trees and vegetables. They help to feed us; let us help to care for them in winter.—Sunshine.

God wants to hear about whatever occupies our time and thought, not that He may be informed, but that we may keep in communion with Him.—Ex.

Cuticura Soap
—The Safety Razor—
Shaving Soap
Cuticura Soap shaves without mug. Everywhere 25c.

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H. T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

the Philadelphia Divinity School, to be erected at Forty-second and Locust Streets, have been completed and bids are asked from builders. The proposed buildings will consist of dormitories, a chapel, a library, lecture rooms and residences for the faculty. It is hoped by the officials of the school that work can be started in the fall.

The contract for the new church for the Mission of the Advent, at Hatboro, was awarded to Contractor E. Barton, of Ivyland, last week. Rev. James H. Lamb, Jr., is the minister in charge.

The Rev. W. Herbert Burk, D. D., rector of Valley Forge Memorial Chapel, has made an appeal to Governor Sproul to overrule the action of the Valley Forge Park Commission in selling the old Gulph Road, over which the American Army marched to Valley Forge. "The Gulph Road," said Dr. Burk, "is the Appian Way of the new world. Its ground was soaked with the blood of America's heroic soldiers. That road does not belong to Montgomery or to Chester County, or even to Pennsylvania. We hold only the right and honor to preserve this great heritage. It belongs to America, to the world, to the ages."

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. E. G. Weed, D. D., Bishop.

During the absence of the rector, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, on his vacation, the Sunday services of St. Paul's Church, Augusta, were taken care of by the Rev. Mortimer Glover, of St. Paul's Church, Graniteville, S. C., and three lay readers of the parish. A large Bible class is one of the outcomes of the Gypsy Smith meetings. A small class faithfully conducted by one of the vestrymen has grown to a membership of thirty-five, organized with a president, a leader and other officers. The objective is one hundred members by fall. Due to the interest taken by St. Paul's Parish, at the mission of Christ Church, Augusta, which ministers to a mill population, the congregations are growing slowly and the interest more rapidly. Lay readers from St. Paul's hold the Sunday evening service, and recently the junior choir of St. Paul's took part in the service.

E. D. J.

PITTSBURGH

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Community Open-Air Services.

For several years during the Sunday evenings of July and August the churches of Wilkinsburg have held a community open-air service in the public square of the Borough. In attendance these services have perhaps proved to be the largest in the State of Pennsylvania. First-class instrumental music, a director of congregational singing, a printed program giving the order of service, together with the hymns, and a special preacher, constitute the service. A committee on arrangements, well beforehand, assign a certain Sunday evening to each communion. Sunday evening, July 10, was kept as "Episcopal Night" and was under the sole supervision of St. Stephen's Church. The attendance was a record one, it being estimated that three thousand people were present. The Rev. William Porkess, the rector, was the preacher. The Rev. L. N. Tucker, rector of St. James' Church, Pittsburgh, the nearest neighboring rector, presided. Mr. John S. Taylor, a licensed lay reader of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, read the Scripture lesson. Twenty-eight laymen, of St. Stephen's Parish, arranged the chairs for the service, took up the offertory and acted as ushers. This movement has been in operation eight successive summers, and it is strongly felt as a result that a remarkable community spirit has been established.

J. C.

Personal Notes

The address of the Rt. Rev. J. D. LaMothe, D. D., Bishop of Honolulu, is Emma Square, Honolulu T. H.

The Rev. Meade McBryde Sterritt has gone to spend a few weeks at the Chalfonte, Cape May.

The Rev. Francis H. Stephenson, rector of Trinity Church, Washington, Pa., has accepted the rectorship of Trinity Church, Orange, Cal., Diocese of Los Angeles.

During August and September Archdeacon Steel, of Havana, Cuba, may be addressed at the Church House, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Rev. E. J. Gates, of Camden, N. J., who has accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Oxford, N. Y., will assume charge September 1.

The Rev. W. S. Claiborne is devoting his whole time to the DuBose Memorial Church Training School and the Emerald-Hodgson Hospital. His address is Sewanee, Tenn.

The Rev. Herbert W. Prince has accepted a call to St. Mark's Church, Denver, succeeding the Rev. Fred Ingley, who has been consecrated Bishop Coadjutor of Colorado.

The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, S. C., delivered the baccalaureate sermon for the South Carolina Military College and the Confederate Home College, and also delivered the invocation at the great educational rally for the whole State at Spartanburg, S. C., July 15.

The address of the Rev. William Henry Pettus, rector of St. James' Church, West Somerville, Mass., during the month of August, will be "Church Haven," Nantucket, Mass. The Rev. Ambrose D. Gring, one of our retired missionaries to Japan, will be in charge of the West Somerville Parish during the rector's absence.

Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Bayard Hodge, of 420 West Walnut Lane, Germantown, announce the engagement of their daughter, Mary Robinson, and Rev. Percy L. Urban, assistant rector of St. Peter's Church, Germantown.

The Rev. C. Herbert Reese, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Philadelphia, left for a visit in Texas Monday, July 18. He was accompanied by his stepdaughter, Miss Virginia Thurlow. Mr. Reese was rector of Trinity Church, Victoria, Tex., for three years, and was chaplain of the 360th Infantry, which was composed largely of men from Houston and Galveston. He plans to visit his former parish and some of his former comrades who live in Houston.

IT PAYS

In a five weeks' canvass among the church members in one city, a subscription representative of the Southern Churchman earned in commissions and bonuses $186.25.

A young woman in a small community, by putting in an hour or two a day taking subscriptions for this paper, realized in a week $11.25.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

The Rev. Harrison B. Wright, rector of St. Asaph's Church, Bala, for nineteen years, has resigned, owing to illness. His resignation took effect Sunday, July 10, when he preached his last sermon at the church. Before going to Bala, Mr. Wright was stationed at Somerville, N. J., where he was rector eight years. During the war Mr. Wright was for a time in charge of Y. M. C. A. work at Camp Meade. He is a graduate of the University of Toronto and of the General Seminary of New York.

Ordinations.

In the Cathedral Church of St. Luke, Portland, Me., on June 12, Mr. Vincent Fowler Pottle was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Maine. He was presented by the Rev. George C. DeMott. The Rev. Edmund R. Laine, Jr., assisted the Bishop at the celebration of the Holy Communion; the Litany was read by the Rev. Frank Armstrong, chaplain of the United States Army, stationed at Fort Williams, Me. Bishop Brewster preached the sermon. Mr. Pottle will be junior assistant at St. Luke's Cathedral, his parish work being, for the most part, limited to the mission of St. Alban, South Portland.

The address of Bishop Clinton S. Quinn, of Texas, will be 209 East Chestnut Street, Louisville, Ky., from July 23 to August 20.

Deposition.

New York, July 5, 1921.

Notice is hereby given that, at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, on Thursday, June 30, 1921, acting in accordance with Section 1 of Canon 35, and in the presence of the Rev. Canon George F. Nelson, D. D., presbyter, and the Rev. Selden P. Delany, D. D., presbyter, I deposed from the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America the Rev. Harvey Officer, presbyter, he having declared to me, in writing, his renunciation of the said ministry and having requested to be deposed.

(Signed) William T. Manning,
Bishop of New York.

VIRGINIA SUMMER SCHOOL OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION, University of Virginia.

For the information of those attending:

I. The school has two sessions—the first beginning August 1 and the second August 8. It is hoped that as many as possible will attend both sessions.

II. The Diocese of Virginia will pay the traveling expenses and board for one delegate from each school or parish.

III. The Treasurer of the Diocese will be at the University to pay the delegates their expenses during the session of the school. The Diocesan Board of Religious Education earnestly calls the attention of the clergy to the splendid program, and urges them and as many representatives from each parish to attend as possible. There is inspiration and instruction not only for Sunday school workers, but in every department of Church work.

J. FRANCIS RIBBLE, Chairman.

IN MEMORIAM.

As the sun at eventide gently sinks into the arms of twilight, so the spirit of Eliza Waller, wife of the late James W. Pegram, of Richmond, Va., entered into rest on July 13, 1921.

Mrs. Pegram was the eldest daughter of Dr. George Blackman, of the United States and Confederate Navies, and Emma Blow, his wife, of Norfolk, Va. She is survived by her son, Robert Pegram, and three daughters, Mrs. Arthur Scrivenor, Miss E. W. Pegram and Mrs. Rufus Johnson, U. S. N.

In so limited a space it would appear unnecessary to chronicle more fully the established facts of birth and environment, but by the white searchlight of truth one must recognize a character so noble and a personality so gifted.

With great poise, dignity and much unconscious charm, she embraced these qualities to a marked degree, representing a traditional type "of the old regime," modesty and retirement being so accentuated that only a privileged few were aware of her brilliant capabilities.

"Her home was her castle"; here she reigned supreme in the hearts of husband and family, for like the Roman matron of history, "her children were her jewels."

During her lifetime three cruel wars passed over her devoted head. Many losses and sorrows were hers, as needs must be to those who linger on Life's highway, but all were met with characteristic bravery and Christian resignation, while the sun of her life fading and set, reflecting a beautiful afterglow of peace and promise.

"The golden evening brightens in the west,
Soon to the faithful warrior cometh rest,
Sweet is the calm of Paradise the blest;
"Alleluia."

"The Musical Hymnal In Every Pew."

Church of the Holy Trinity
Philadelphia, Pa.

"In response to your request, I am glad to state not only my own opinion regarding the New Hymnal, but the result of its use in Holy Trinity Church. The Hymnal as a whole I think to be a model of its kind. The selections and the tunes, and the whole appearance of the book prove it to be not only the result of earnest toil, but also of keen judgment. We have put the Musical Hymnals in every pew, and the result has been at once better congregational singing and a kind of pride, particularly among young people, in learning by practice how to read music."

(Signed) FLOYD W. TOMKINS,
Rector.

THE NEW HYMNAL

With Both Words and Music

Single copies ..... $1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more ..... 1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more ..... 1.00 cash

Carriage charges extra

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 WALL STREET, NEW YORK

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent

E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

MIDNIGHT

A STEALTHY SOUND IS HEARD!

The burglar is making a call.

While honest men sleep, the prowling thief is after the valuables lying carelessly around the house.

Protect your treasures the best way. All-steel boxes for rent here as low as $3.00 per year.

See Mr. Andrews.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main and Twelfth Streets

RICHMOND, - - - - - VIRGINIA

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

J. & R. Lamb

25-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

R. GEISSLER, INC.

NEW YORK CITY
56 W. 8. STREET.
CHURCH FURNISHINGS
WINDOWS — TABLETS
FABRICS — EMBROIDERIES
MEMORIALS

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

To Mothers

And all Friends of Children:

What will you read to your boys and girls this summer to give them a religious message they will love?

Thousands have found the answer in

Sunny Windows

By W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

Author of "The Children's Year."

The first edition is already exhausted, and the second is on the press.

CLOTH, $1.25 NET

For Sale by

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN

Richmond, Virginia

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 30, 1921. No. 31.

A Prayer

of Thomas a Kempis

WE beseech Thee, our most gracious God, preserve us from the cares of this life, lest we should be too much entangled therein; also from the many necessities of the body lest we should be ensnared by them; and from whatsoever is an obstacle to the soul lest being broken with troubles we should be overthrown. Give us strength to resist, patience to endure, and constancy to persevere, for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

EDUCATIONAL

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other partriculars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean,
Petersburg, Va.

St. Christopher's School

WESTHAMPTON, RICHMOND, VA.

A country Boarding and Day School for Boys under the auspices of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia.

Eleventh session begins September 21, 1921. Tuition in boarding department, limited to twenty-two boys, $650. For catalogue, address

REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, PH. D., HEADMASTER

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH President

POTOMAC UNIVERSITY

offers for the eighteenth year systematic instruction by correspondence.

College of Liberal Arts,
School of Theology,
The Graduate School.
Degrees Granted.

For catalogue, address
1881 Third Street, N. W.,
Washington, D. C.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.

The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls

Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.

B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Whatever is begun in anger ends in shame. —Benj. Franklin.

It is well said that a man's religion is the chief fact in regard to him.

Prayer is the aspiration of our poor, struggling, heavy-laden soul toward its eternal Father.—Carlyle.

Persistent sin brings on that worst of dooms, the paralysis of conscience.

No one who cannot master himself is worthy to rule, and only one who can, can rule.—Goethe.

The secret of being loved is being lovely, and the secret of being lovely is being unselfish.—C. G. Ames.

Find out what your temptations are, and you will find out largely what you are yourself.—Beecher.

Christian prayer is the submissive effort to make my wish what God wills. —R. W. Evans.

None shall walk in perfect white
Till every soul be clean;
So close for sorrow and delight
These human spirits lean.
—K. L. Bates.

Every evil to which we do not succumb is a benefactor. As the Sandwich Islander believes that the strength and valor of the enemy he kills passes into himself, so we gain the strength of the temptation we resist.—Selected.

The cross of the Master, in which is symbolized all the sacrificial endurance of His life, has done more than all else to win the world to Him. Nothing is so powerful as love that is willing to suffer to achieve its object.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL

Founded by
VIRGINIA RANDOLPH ELLETT,
Westhampton - - Richmond, Va.

A country day school for girls under the direction of the Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia. From Montessori through College Preparatory courses. Eight-acre playground. Emphasis on health, outdoor life.

Boarding department planned for 1922.

ROSALIE HAXALL NOLAND, A. B., Principal.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art. Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal.
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

EDUCATIONAL

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls

1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre campus and 8,000 acres added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

"A word of hope may strike a happy influence through an entire lifetime."

Only let love be strong enough, and pain cannot be too great, or loss to absolute.—Hinton.

John's gospel shows us how deep a sense Jesus had of being a stranger on the earth.

He who has a thousand friends has not a friend to spare,
And he who has one enemy will meet him everywhere.

The last wonder of every age is an ordinary individual enriched by the Holy Spirit, so as to tower Godward and lift others with him.

ST. MARGARET'S SCHOOL,
Tappahannock, Va.

A boarding and day school for girls. Beautiful location on Rappahannock River. Modern equipment. Home influences. Complete courses. Individual instruction. Terms very moderate. For prospectus write to MISS BERTHA A. LATANE, B. A., Prin., Tappahannock, Va.

CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL,
Middlesex County, Va.

A boarding and day school for boys. Farm of 100 acres, overlooking the Rappahannock River. Safe boating, fishing, bathing. Home influences. Healthy climate. Moderate terms. First session opens September 28, 1921. Apply to

REV. F. E. WARREN,
Christchurch School, Marl, Va.

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida. Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SPEND YOUR VACATION

at

Summer Training School for Workers

Sewanee, Tenn.,

August 9 to 22, inclusive.

Special railroad rates. Tickets on sale August 7, 8, 15, good to return until September 15.

Board and lodging at rate of $25 for entire period of school, or for less time $2 a day. Bring 3 sheets, 2 pillow cases and one light covering. For reservations write to Dean George M. Baker, Sewanee, Tenn.

For program and information address Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., Director, Charleston, S. C., until July 25, after that date, Sewanee, Tenn.

Medical College of Virginia

(State Institution)

MEDICINE DENTISTRY PHARMACY

New buildings—Well equipped laboratories under the direction of full-time competent teachers.

The Memorial Hospital, Dooley Hospital and St. Philip Hospital are owned and controlled by the Medical College of Virginia and offer every facility for thorough clinical training. Staffs composed of the faculty of the College. Additional clinical facilities are offered through the Virginia Hospital, City Home, City Jail, etc.

For full information and catalogue, address

J. R. McCAULEY, Secretary, RICHMOND, VA.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.

Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

Heaven's existence is not wrapped in uncertainty. We hear a great deal about "theories of the future life," but the facts of it are well established in God's Word. What a pity it is that many fine men shut their eyes to these facts, even when wanting to believe them! It was a pathetic statement that the late Franklin K. Lane, former Secretary of the Interior, made just preceding his death. After talking of the future as a mystery, he said, "Socrates said to those who stood by after he had drunk the hemlock, 'No evil can befall a good man, whether he be alive or dead.' . . . The apothegm, however, was not apposite to me, because it involved a declaration that I was a good man, and I don't know any one who has the right to so appreciate himself, and I had come to the conclusion that perhaps the best statement of my creed could be fitted into the words, 'I accept,' which to me meant that if in the law of my nature my individual spirit was to go back into the great ocean of spirits, my one duty was to conform. 'Lead, Kindly Light,' was all the gospel I had. I accepted." If there were no heaven with its eternal happiness, God would have told men so. Our Lord so stated Himself when, in speaking of "the many mansions" in the "Father's house," He said, "If it were not so, I would have told you." What a pity that so many today will not accept all that is involved in that wonderful statement, and be assured.—S. S. Times.

Central National Bank

Cor. 3d and Broad Sts., Richmond, Va.

Banking Hours-

Monday to Friday. ...9 A. M. to 2 P. M
Saturday..... 9 A. M. to 2 P. M
6 P. M. to 8 P. M

3% Allowed on Savings Acccunts

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

SERVICE

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Tr as
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State.
Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., JULY 30, 1921. No. 31.

TRAINING MEN FOR PREACHING MISSIONS

In the report of the proceedings of the last meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council, there are two items which we note with special interest. The first of these is the recommendation of the Commission on Parochial Missions.

It is generally agreed that there is room in the Church for much development of the Parochial Missions idea. Most of our clergy are completely unaccustomed to any sort of services except the regular and formal ones. They are confessedly frightened at the suggestion of evangelistic services. They do not know how to conduct them, and they do not know how to find out.

The Commission which made its report to the Presiding Bishop and Council seems to us to be on the right track. The Commission recognizes that it must set out to get the consent of the diocesan authorities first, and until it does get not only their consent, but their real co-operation, the Commission cannot make progress. But there will be a much greater spirit of hospitality to the whole thought of developing Parochial Mission services now than there was a short time ago, because the attempt made last fall for a Nation-Wide Preaching Mission, though it was not by any means nationally carried out, yet nevertheless produced certain actual ventures in this direction which were conspicuously successful in their particular localities. When men have seen what a few churches or groups of churches can do by taking hold boldly of an unaccustomed enterprise and carrying it out in faith to success, they are the more ready to follow in the path which has been thus blazed.

Here and there in the Church are a few men who know how to conduct Parochial Missions. They know how to give to these services the sort of informality which, while keeping the spirit of an essential reverence, will yet bring the people together in a freer and less conventional mood than we see on Sundays. They know how to create an interest in these services. They know how to make them such that a great many people other than the regular church-goers will come, and they know how to preach to the people after they get them there.

The Commission proposes to ask certain of these Missioners to hold themselves in readiness to conduct services where they are asked, and furthermore, it proposes to hold conferences where many men can be instructed in the methods which these leaders have made good. Therein lies the best hope of development. There is a far greater number of men than we yet know who can widen the Church's ministry of preaching immensely, when once they have shaken off the embarrassment of their own sense that they do not know how; and this they can do when they come together and confer with the experienced leaders and find out, after all, how simple and natural a matter these Parochial Missions can be.

CHECKING UP RESULTS

The second thing which seems to us of particular interest in the report from the Presiding Bishop and Council is the proposal of "evaluation." What this means is that the Council, particularly with reference to the Department of Missions, is about to check up the returns on its investment to find out whether it is getting results that are worth the cost.

We are glad that this is going to be done. There are no ways, of course, in which spiritual returns can be tabulated in money figures, but it is perfectly possible and right to find out whether anything is happening when the Church pours into a given field the money which represents the energy and self-sacrifice of the lives that have given it. If the Church is making appropriations year after year, and decade after decade, for a particular field, and the number of communicants is not increasing, and the Church is not, in any ascertainable way, growing stronger, something is wrong. Such a condition is bad business and it is bad religion. It is playing with shams instead of realities.

The announcement by the Council is, of course, somewhat tentative and cautious. All the Bishops receiving appropriations are to be asked for statements of results which have been obtained from past expenditures. That is one step toward real achievement if the Council will keep on. If the Church is failing to make headway in any particular place, this sort of inquiry may disclose the reason why. If the reason can be corrected, so much the better. If not, the Church will have to face the larger question, whether she must not concentrate her efforts at those points of opportunity where she can succeed.

THE POISON OF MOB LAWLESSNESS

The newspapers have carried recently reports of repeated instances in which persons have been seized and tarred and feathered because of some word or act by which they were held to have given offense to unknown groups in their communities.

These most recent outrages have developed in the South. Some have suspected that back of these actions is the so-called Ku Klux Klan. This is an organization recently revived, with headquarters in Atlanta and branches in many States, which adopted the name and the insignia of the organization which became both well known and notorious after the Civil War, and which justifies its existence now under various high-flown patriotic shibboleths. Because of its name and the associations which that name carries, the popular impression has been that it is directed particularly against the negro, and therefore when any incident occurs in which violence is done to some person because of alleged radical utterances on negro social equality, as happened in one of the Southern States a short while ago, suspicion is directed towards this Klan.

We do not, of course, know whether the Ku Klux Klan has been responsible for any of these acts of mob lawlessness; but if it is not, the very fact that it should be unjustly suspected is an illustration of the impression which the existence of the organization makes. A secret order of this kind is inevitably linked up in the thought of people with the acts of secret and anonymous mobs.

There is no place in the South today for the Ku Klux Klan, or for any other secret order that may arrogate to itself the right to take the law into its own hands. Neither is there any excuse for such action on the part of any other organization. A good many foolish people were inclined to applaud when in some communities of the North and West soldiers of the American Legion took it upon themselves to break up meetings of those whom they chose to call Bolshevists. Some comfortable citizens thought that to be a very highly patriotic act. They thought the American Legion would be a fine asset to this country for that particular reason. "We do not want these wild agitators in this country," they said; "it is a good thing to have the Legion drive them out." But lawlessness is lawlessness, no matter who commits it. The mob spirit spreads like poison. Once tolerated, because people choose to have a secret sympathy for its ends and admire for other reasons those who foment it, it infects the whole public opinion, until worse and worse outrages set law and order at naught.

It is time for Americans to realize that no individuals in any Klan, Legion, or any other kind of order, can take into their own hands the law of this country without exhibiting themselves as enemies of the common good.

A POSTSCRIPT TO WHAT GOES BEFORE

After the preceding editorial was written, there appeared in the afternoon papers of July 23 an Associated Press dispatch reading as follows:

Beaumont, Tex., July 23.—The Beaumont local of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan today sent long letters to both newspapers here, in which they assume full responsibility for the recent beating, tarring and feathering of J. S. Paul, local physician, and R. F. Scott, Marine Corps veteran, of Deweyville.

The communication bore the official seal of the order and contained more than 4,000 words as an explanation of the two attacks.

* * * * Belief was expressed here that the letters will be investigated by William Simmons, grand wizard of the order, of Atlanta, and the developments may be expected in accordance with the head official's declared intention to submit to authorities the roster of local branches violating the "law of the land."

No matter what the "grand wizard" may say, and no matter how much he may vociferate the Ku Klux Klan's loyalty to the law of the land, this incident is a demonstration of the menace which the Klan can become, and does become, to the good order of a community. An order which makes secrecy as to its membership one of its stocks in trade, which dresses men up in sheets and white masks, and thereby plays upon the fears and superstitions of the ignorant, is bound to attract under its mask many lawless and reckless men, whether it means to do so or not. The order, with its objectionable associations and its unwholesome tendencies, has no rightful place in American life; and unless it can change its spots more successfully than the leopard, the best celebration it could conduct would be its own funeral.

As we also said in the preceding editorial, lawlessness in thought and word is objectionable, no matter who sponsors it. One of the evil legacies of the war has been the "mob mind," and we have not yet got rid of it. As always in the time of a great struggle and in its aftermath, men revert to the instincts of the pack, and hunt down with hue and cry individuals and ideas which do not please the crowd. Such an instinct, unchecked, is fatal to the freedom of mind and spirit without which democracy would stifle.

In a recent number of "The Survey" there are two items which we wish to quote in conjunction, because one illustrates the tendency toward intellectual strait-jacketing which may become highly dangerous, and the other expresses in contrast what the American ideal of freedom in thought and discussion ought to be.

Says "The Survey," in commenting upon the appointment of John J. Tigert as United States Commissioner of Education in place of Philander P. Claxton:

"A mystery is by way of being solved. For some weeks people have been asking, 'Why was Philander P. Claxton relieved of his position as United States Commissioner of Education? 'and 'Who is John J. Tigert?' It was easily discovered that Mr. Tigert had been Professor of Psychology in the University of Kentucky, at Lexington. Now, however, other facts are coming out. Mr. Tigert is a protege of Secretary A. B. Fall, in whose department his own bureau is located; and he is one of the most popular members of the American Legion, whose candidate for the position he was. The legion likes him because he proved himself a 'good fellow' in overseas work during the war, and because he believes that the greatest need in American education today is a program of nation-wide 'Americanization.' The full meaning of the word 'Americanization' as used by the pronouncements on this subject assured the country that he was going to 'open war on Communism, Bolshevism, Socialism and all forms of government that do not recognize the rights of property and the right of genius to its just rewards.' He also announced that he was going to make large use of the lectures of the Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis, of Brooklyn, spreading them broadcast over the country as patriotic pamphlets. When Mr. Tigert's attention was called to the fact that a good deal of Mr. Hillis' material has to do with a 'patriotism' of racial bigotry and financial success, he replied that 'Nothing has been definitely decided in the matter, and we are going to proceed very cautiously.' "

Then, after reciting certain resolutions as to censorship of education which were proposed by the American Legion and adopted by the National Education Association at its recent meeting in Detroit, "The Survey" continues:

"If now we add to these proposals the plan of the Legion announced in May of a survey of the schools of the whole country for the purpose of determining whether the teachers of the country can be depended upon to teach the children '100 per cent. Americanism' and the plan to 'kick out' any teacher not acceptable to that body, we get a fairly clear picture of the program of the Legion which, in turn, may be assumed to be the personal program of Commissioner Tigert—even though he is finding it necessary to proceed cautiously in carrying it out."

As a counter-check to the tendencies there implied, there may well be lifted up these words of Roscoe Pound, the Dean of the Harvard Law School, in an address which he delivered at the commencement of Smith College:

"If we say to the university that teacher or student may not see clearly, but must look at the world through the dark glasses of some interest of the moment; if we say to them that they may not think critically, but must adjust their thought to that of an uncritical public without; if we say to them that their minds must not open, but may be no more than ajar at the precise angle of the average mind for the time being; if we say to them that their judgments must be as intolerant as those of the mob mind or the dominant class mind for the time being at peril of making no judgments; if we say to them that they may discourse of the unreason of the past, but must not expose the unreason of the present; if we tell them that they must bow to the fashion of the moment and put on and off opinions as they put on and off hats and coats; if we require them to follow in the wake of each popular hysteria and shout with the largest or most determined mob for the time being—if we impose upon them any condition whatever but the free and fearless and unremitting quest for the truth in every field into which the human instinct for inquiry leads them, we assume to set bounds where God has made men free, we assume to say that humanity shall not go forward in its age-long struggle with nature and by our mere human fiat usher in the twilight of civilization."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE PROTEST AGAINST DR. SHIPMAN.

Editor of the Southern Churchman:

Your two articles on this subject are characterized by great calmness, and were no doubt written under great restraint. The palpable inconsistency of the editor of the Living Church must be apparent to every one.

He is a Catholic, and would any good Catholic place his individual judgment against that of the Church? The Church has duly and truly expressed its will in the election of Dr. Shipman as Suffragan Bishop of New York. Every canonical requirement was complied with, and we are told that a beautiful spirit pervaded the convention from beginning to end. The Holy Spirit's presence was invoked, and there is every reason to believe that He was present, if He was ever present at the election of a Bishop.

No doubt the editor of the Living Church believes that the "Holy Spirit" presided in the council of the blessed apostles"; but that will not help us much unless He still presides in the conventions which elect our Bishops. In the Office of Consecration the question is asked, "Are you persuaded that you are truly called to this Ministration, according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the order of this Church?" How is a man assured of that call? That call comes, if it is ever a reality, through the voice of a Diocesan Convention. This is the medium through which the Holy Spirit registers His will. The Diocesan Convention, guided by the Holy Spirit, has made its choice, and that choice, every good Catholic must believe, expresses the will of God.

This is the normal way in which the Holy Spirit works in the selection of a Bishop, and will the editor of the Living Church tell us what special revelation has been given to him which causes him to seek to defeat the will of God as expressed in the election of the Diocese of New York? All Catholic Churchmen believe that the Church is bigger than any individual and more likely to be right.

Is the editor of the Living Church dead sure, absolutely certain, that he is the medium through which the Holy Spirit is to express His will, and that the burden of defeating the election of Dr. Shipman (which was falsely supposed to be the will of God) is laid upon him? Unless some revelation which he has not yet made public has been given to him, let him beware "lest haply he be found to fight against God."

E. H. WARD.

Hot Springs, Va., July 22, 1921.

[From the point of view of the Living Church and those for whom it speaks, the answer to this letter from Dr. Ward, of St. Luke's Church, Hot Springs, would doubtless be that the consent of Bishops and Standing Committees is one of the factors in the selection of a Bishop which is specifically provided for by the Church, and is the means by which the judgment of the whole Church is brought to bear upon the action of one of its parts. Doubtless the Living Church believes that the Spirit of Truth in the whole Church is calling for the revision of a diocesan action in which the heavenly will was imperfectly apprehended. But to take this position in any case is a very grave matter. A protest against the action of a Diocese can be maintained only on the strongest ground, and in this case, as we have said before, the evidence seems to furnish no such ground.—Editor S. C.]

Another Comment on the Same Subject.

Editor Southern Churchman:

Heartily do I commend your tempered editorial position regarding Dr. Shipman. I feel that it is the other side that is using propaganda: it is the so-called Catholic party that is doing much to break down the fine spirit of toleration for which the Church is noted.

As you intimate in the next to the last paragraph in this week's editorial, if there is a disruption in the harmony and solidarity of the Church, it will rest upon those who make the protest against the consecration.

As you make use of the term "Catholic," I can be content to be known as such a "universal" Churchman, but our High Church friends go you one better in being "Catholic for every truth of man: Protestant against the errors of those who do not agree!"

For the peace and harmony of an individual Church, I pray you "carry on!" The truths of God will win; especially if we are anxious for them to do so and work with sweet spirit and even temper.

Cordially,

ALAN PRESSLEY WILSON.

St. John's Church, Marietta, Pa., July 23, 1921.

MR. WELLS AND THE OUTLINE OF HISTORY.

Mr. Editor: Mr. Wells is by no means a pessimist. The concluding pages of his work, "The Outline of History," reveal him as a pronounced optimist. He has a glorious vision of the future destiny of the human race. To him the day will surely come when the free agents of God on the earth will enjoy a civilization vastly richer than any civilization to which they have hitherto attained. Among the many factors that will contribute to this blessed civilization, the two greatest will be, so he declares, religion and education. I believe that he speaks with the inspiration of a true prophet, when he assures us that religion and education will do more than any other factors to make real that superb civilization that he sees awaiting the free agents of God on this mundane sphere. But he does not believe that any of the religions now known to the world will be this mighty factor. This mighty factor will not be Buddhism. It will not be Islam. It will not be even Christianity. But it will be a religion of much greater power and vitality.

But Mr. Wells fails to grasp what Christianity is. His work, "The Outline of History," shows him to be, indeed, a man of much learning, and of great intellectual powers; but with all its rich treasure, it is tarnished with defects

(Concluded on page 10)

THE STORY OF A WESTERN DEACONESS

By One of Them

I can hardly explain why I wanted to come to this district to work. It just "happened" in the end, but now I can see a chain of events that led to it.

I was born in New York, but was only four years old when, on account of an older sister's health, we came to this State to live. My father, like so many men at that time, bought land from a map, and so we found ourselves apparently in the middle of a forest, though near a sawmill. We were only seven miles out from a large town, however, but the tall timbers stood then, not second growth as we have now.

As there was no church, my mother had Sunday school for my sister and myself, and gradually one and another child came, until our dining-room, sitting-room and parlor were full. From that grew a little mission that exists today, and so it was I grew up in mission life, and it is natural to me. Except for a few years I have always been in little mission churches, where I have done everything from scrubbing the floor and chopping the wood to holding services. I remember three services I once took in a small church in order to help out a law suit. The senior warden was not honest, and was trying to get the property, and if a service were missed it counted somehow on his side. No priest being able to come, I held the fort for three Sunday afternoons. I was only about nineteen, and I remember hunting wildly for the Ember Day Prayer, for I did not know where to find it. I have often wondered why the priest in charge did not ask an older person to take these services.

It was from a sister of Bishop Paddock, of Eastern Oregon, that I first heard about deaconesses. I was in her Sunday school class when about twenty years old, and from that time on I wanted to take the training. But my father had died when I was eleven, and my dear mother had a struggle to bring up her three girls. She needed me, and of course I stayed with her. I had learned millinery, and in time had a store of my own, and that helped us financially through my mother's long illness. Then when she was gone my opportunity seemed to have come. I sold my store and went to Philadelphia for training. There I took the two years' course, and after graduation stayed on for a third year, specializing in the Psalms, public reading and speaking, industrial arts and organized play. This third year has always been of very great value to me. I had also the great privilege of spending six weeks in the Virginia mountains, under one of our deaconesses there.

When we left the West I had no thought of returning, but we went East by way of California, and I saw some of the old Jesuit Fathers' missions, and somehow they started the thoughts that I might have to come back. Then when I heard a Western Bishop speak at the Church House in Philadelphia, I just felt that I knew this part of the country, the people, their temptations and difficulties, and the Church's great need of workers and money, and so I came.

The mission in which I work lies along a short spur of the Northern Pacific Railroad that follows a coal vein which has been tapped in eight places; so one speaks of Nos. 5, 6, 7 or 8, as the direction may be, in which one is going. Our headquarters are in a town of some 5,000 people, mostly foreign, the Croatians having the highest per cent. Quite a number of negroes are here, who were brought originally to break a strike, and have remained. There are also a good many Lancashire coal miners and their families, and our real congregations are largely drawn from them, but we have and welcome all. The mission here is about thirty years old, and has had many ups and downs. The present missionary is greatly respected and loved wherever he goes, an indefatigable worker and very quiet in all his ways. His wife, too, although not very strong, does a great deal of work.

There is a church building that holds a hundred people at a pinch, a rectory, and a parish house which answers the purpose of a community or settlement house. We encourage all young people to come to us for their pleasures, as all other places of amusement are pool rooms or dance halls. There used to be twenty-four saloons in the town. We have two basketball teams and two clubs, one for boys and one for girls; also the Scouts. There is no library, and we need books badly, especially for children. There are about two hundred in the Sunday school, and I have seventy-two boys and girls over twelve in my special care. Before Lent and during that season I prepared two classes for confirmation, and it surely sanctified my Lent. They were such dear children, and we had serious talks after the catechism lesson for the day was said. I did my very best, and loved each lesson, an it taught me more than the children, for I so wanted to make no mistakes in starting them off. We got very close together and are keeping so. There are usually thirty to forty-five at the Junior Auxiliary meetings. The Woman's Auxiliary is very small, but does splendid work. The older girls have a Church Service League which does finely, and the senior class in Sunday school is organized and working on a Five Field Chart. The Altar Guild is fine, the members very faithful and so reverent. We are starting a young woman's club. It is purely community work, but badly needed here. Its members are mostly school teachers, and girls who work in the post-office, company store, etc.

I have such a nice place to live in—a big, airy room with four windows, upstairs in the parish house, and it is furnished with things from my old home, and my own pictures and books which are like dear friends, especially those given me when I was set apart. Cold water is piped up here, and I do my own cooking. My time is so taken up that I seldom have time for personal visits. I shall be glad when I shall have managed to get a little more of reading. Even daily quiet time for prayers is sometimes hard to get. There are services at 8 and 11 A. M. and 7:30 P. M. on Sundays and on Saints' Days.

At the point where I am stationed there is a good deal of snow each year. Our first last winter came on October 15, and in all we had a snowfall of fourteen feet. It usually packs down hard and freezes, and I think we walked on two and a half or three feet all winter; but it is much deeper when not packed like that, and when I had to leave the tracks it was often above my knees.

After a fresh fall of snow it is like being in fairyland—the pine trees in their spotless dresses, the ugly dumphills near the mines covered with pure white, and, back of all, the wonderful mountains. One so often lifts up one's eyes to the hills, and the strength is given to go on.

Work does not stop because of the snow. The miners break the trail, and sleighs and cutters follow if they can, and we all walk. I shall never forget some of our winter walks up to the next station above us.

We work in five mining towns and camps, and in this one some of the women have a fine Sunday school—one hundred and five children, almost all foreign, and every other Sunday the missionary and I go there for service in the schoolhouse. There are often over forty persons out, and how heartily they sing! The climb up to this place is abrupt in one or two places, but mostly a gradual ascent. The lights and shadows shift and change, and on a winter's night, with the snow everywhere, it is wonderful. There are certain places where we always stop and rest and look, for the road seems to lead straight into the wilderness and there is nothing there but ourselves and nature and God. Then faintly we hear the schoolhouse bell ringing in the distance, and on we go.

There is another place still farther on, and then a lumber mill, and then one of a chain of five beautiful mountain lakes. In this region we rent the Methodist Church, as we have no building, and there are services every Sunday at 3:30, and at 8 A. M. the first Sunday in the month. We have a small but energetic Woman's Guild. A Methodist deaconess has worked for eight years alone at this place. We are good friends and I admire her greatly.

Nearby is the company hospital, where I love to visit. There are many sad cases of mine injuries brought there, and a visitor is always welcome. One man there now is Hungarian by birth. He has a bad hip and spinal injury. His little girl died of pneumona in the spring, and there are four little boys. His poor wife is losing her mind through contnued hard luck and the loss of her little girl. She was at the parish house yesterday, and I talked with her a long time and we went into the church together. She is a Greek Catholic. The foreign element is strong here, and we often come across such sad cases. There are two young widows we are trying to care for now, one Croation and one Polish, and each with four children, and only thirty dollars a month to live on. I am getting some help for them, and buying material and teaching them to cut and make clothes. So many of these women only worked in the fields in Europe, and know little of a household nature.

I am young in all this work, but very happy in it, trying to do my best and not to make mistakes.

A Long Rectorship

By Beverly D. Tucker, Jr.

The true account of a long rectorship must be sought chiefly in the unconscious influences that go out from the pastor to his people—the secret touch behind the scenes with individuals—the quiet but sure changing of the tone of a community. Like the kingdom of God, it is an influence that comes wthout observation. Measured against such abiding marks as these, the record of statistics is a poor estimate of achievement. And yet, lest we forget, it is well that we of the younger generation should count over some of the outward and visible signs of the long rectorship of the Rev. Dr. Lee of nearly twenty-eight years.

Dr. Lee came to Christ Church as an assistant to the Rev. Dr. Hanckel on February 1, 1890. At that time there was but one Episcopal Church in Charlottesville and the surrounding community. The congregation numbered 258 communicants; there was one white and one colored Sunday school and one Aid Society.

Upon the death of Dr. Hanckel in 1892 the Rev. Dr. Lee was elected rector. During the years that he served he presented 650 persons for confirmation at Christ Church, and the communicants on the roll today number 442. The offerings of the parish during this period have amounted to $160,000. In addition to this growth within, Christ Church has obeyed the missionary spirit and become the mother of six mission congregations in the rural neighborhood, and of St. Paul's Memorial Church at the University. The communicants of these daughter churches almost equal in number those of the mother church.

There are three pieces of constructive work connected with Dr. Lee's rectorship of Christ Church, which especially deserve to be associated with his name and influence. In the first place the present beautiful edifice of Christ Church was erected under his leadership and opened for worship in 1898. Even more beautiful than the building, however, was the spirit of courage with which Dr. Lee faced the discouragements encountered in the work. When the walls fell soon after their construction through the fault of the contractors, Dr. Lee set to work to rebuild without loss of faith in the undertaking. Generations that come after him will have cause to praise him, as they worship in this house of prayer, which his love helped build.

In the second place, when the Bishop of the Diocese and the Rev. Dr. McIlhany inaugurated the movement for the building of the Episcopal Mission at the University, the Rev. Dr. Lee gave the movement his cordial endorsement and moral support. It is not often that a new congregation grows out of the old parish church in the same community with as little friction as St. Paul's Memorial Church at the University has grown out of Christ Church, Charlottesville. This is largely due to the magnanimous spirit of the Rev. Dr. Lee.

In the third place, the Rev. Dr. Lee founded St. Anne's School for Girls in 1910. When the opportunity arose for purchasing the present site and buildings from the Baptist Institute, Dr. Lee set to work, and within nine months he raised, with the aassistance of certain persons in Charlottesville, the sum of $14,000. He later collected some $5,000 for the school itself.

The above statistics tell but some of the achievements that have marked Dr. Lee's ministry in Charlottesville—and a splendid record they yield. But half the story has not been told. Dr. Lee's parish has ever been larger than his own congregation; it has spread into all parts of the town and many parts of the county. Like the Master, Whom he has so faithfully served, he has preached the gospel to the poor, he has visited the sick and those in prison, he has bound up the broken-hearted, he has comforted the dying and given to many the hope of eternal life.

Fourth of July Sermon

By a Layman.

Text, "Make the world safe (fit) for democracy."

What more fitting time for a layman to write a sermon than on July 4, 1921? And what more fitting text than this, so often quoted during the last few years.

It makes no difference whether these words were spoken by a Democrat or Republican, by a capitalist or a laborer, by a millionaire or a pauper, by the promoter of a prize-fight or a reformer, by a slacking layman or a fighting parson. One fact stands out as an answer to the query—Would it be well to "make the world safe for democracy?" YES!

Can any one race or nation, can any one class in society or business, accomplish this unanimously desired result? As confidently I answer, No!

Then why discuss this great text any further? Why not discard it as impractible, impossible? There is no use hurrahing for the Fourth of July. Simply give it up and make the best of what is. But I aver with the positiveness of certainty that this query can be not only answered in the affirmative, but can be worked out by all peoples in the average, every day life. How? By following the simplest of simple rules, laid down with assurance by One Who knew it was practical and possible, the author of the accepted "Golden Rule," the carpenter of Nazareth, Who in three short years accomplished greater results than even in this day are claimed for certain individuals, and who sacrificed not only His personal reputation, but His life, in order that those who want democracy may not only have it, but have it more abundantly. I ask you, is not this a proven fact? Has not the text of the great Jewish lawyer, Gamaliel, been demonstrated? Need we wait more than 1,900 years for further proof? This same Jesus Christ not only can, but will, make answer to this great question; the rest is up to you and to me.

Awaken thou that sleepest! Many opportunities await you. To mention only one or two, the Nation-Wide Campaign and Social Service in every church, factory, store, community, family. His last appeal is calling you. Make the best of this great opportunity. You men of God who are His chosen agents, don't be satisfied with doing one hard day's work on Sunday. Occupy the other six days. Seek all kinds of work to be done, and by the help of your splendid men and women, do it. And you men and women of the Church, stop knocking your leader; get back of him, or if needs be pull him along. If you are too busy to actually help, then you are making more money than you need; so let your money take your place and do your work.

Play the game. Be a home run hitter, not a striker out. This new determination need not interfere with your business, golf or other pleasures. Try it! Take a sporting chance. "Try anything once." And after all is said and done, remember the two great commands. Love God! Certainly. He made you and put you here for a purpose. Love the fellow next to you! It makes no difference who he is; he needs your help and you believe in the Golden Rule.

THE HEALER.

(To a young physician, with Doris' picture of Christ Healing the Sick.")

So stood of old the holy Christ
Amidst the suffering throng;
With whom His lightest touch sufficed
To make the weakest strong.

That healing gift He lends to them
Who use it in His name;
The power that filled His garment's hem
Is evermore the same.

The healing of the seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch Him in life's throng and press
And we are whole again.

For lo! in human hearts unseen,
The Healer dwelleth still;
And they who make His temples clean
The best subserve His will.

The holiest task by heaven decreed,
An errand all divine,
The burden of our common need
To render less is thine.

The paths of pain are thine. Go forth
With patience, trust and hope;
The sufferings of a sin-sick earth
Shall give thee ample scope.

Beside the unveiled mysteries
Of life and death go stand,
With guarded lips and reverent eyes,
And pure of heart and hand.

So shalt thou be with power endued
From Him who went about
The Syrian hillsides doing good,
And casting demons out.

That Good Physician liveth yet,
Thy friend and guide to be;
The Healer by Gennesaret
Shall walk the rounds with thee.

—Whittier

The Great Commission.

TRAINING SCHOOL OPENS IN SEPTEMBER.

The DuBose Memorial Church Training School, located at Monteagle, Tenn., will be opened on the morning of the 21st of September. The purpose of this school is to develop men for the rural missionary work of the Church especially. The catalogue is out, and can be had by applying to the Rev. W. S. Claiborne, Sewanee, Tenn. All correspondence in regard to the school should be sent to the Rev. Mr. Claiborne.

LEPER MISSIONS.

In the month of June two new branches of the Leper Missions were organized in Virginia, one in Winchester under Professor Marshall, and another at Grace Church, Cismont, Albemarle County. Mrs. Edward H. Joslin has charge of the work there, with an efficient number of officers to assist her. At a recent meeting of the Junior Branch under Miss Allison, one hundred dollars ($100) was collected from Pete Banks. The work is growing in interest all over the world.

It is estimated that one person out of every 750 living today is suffering from this preventable disease. So all workers can feel they are obeying Christ's command, "Cleanse the lepers." Contributions, large or small, will be most gratefully received, and leaflets telling of the work can be sent at any time by request.

E. P. MERIWETHER,
Pres. & Treas. Richmond Branch, Leper Mission.
2346 West Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

Contributioons to Leper Mission, April 1 to July 1, 1921.

Miss Gayle	$ 1.06
Christ Church Sunday school, Kingston Parish, Mathews (from 12 Pete Banks) County, Va.	15.16
Woman's Auxiliary, Alexandria, Va.	10.00
Whittle Memorial Circle of King's Daughters (support two leper children in India)	50.00
Mrs. and Miss Meriwether and friends, Madison County (Pete Bank)	9.00
Miss Kasey	1.00
Dr. Kuyk	.85
Mrs. A. Walton, Nohead, Va.	1.00
Misses Carlton	1.30
Gunston Hall, Washington, D. C.	50.00
May meeting	13.55
In memory of Lillian Boyden, May 10	1.00
"Ridding the World of Leprosy" (booklets)	.80
Mrs. W. S. Cavedo	2.50
Dr. Lorraine (two camps)	.50
Sunday school, St. Timothy's Church, Herndon Va. (Pete Banks for April)	3.80
A friend of lepers	2.00
Miss Lou Jones' Sunday school class and friends, Webster Groves, Mo. (Pete Banks)	25.00
Millwood, Va., Branch (for the budget)	12.00
Mrs. A. Moore, Jr., Berryville, Va. (support of lepers from Pete Banks)	22.09
Mrs. H. H. Edmunds, Halifax, Va.	3.00
Mrs. James Grammer, Winchester, Va.	5.00
A member of Seventh Street Christian Church, Richmond, Va.	10.00
Camps (three)	.75
Miss J. Somerville, Mitchells, Va. (Pete Banks)	5.00
Mr. H. M. Kendall, Richmond, Va.	7.25
Total	$253.61

EVELYN P. MERIWETHER.
Pres. & Treas. Richmond Branch, Leper Mission.
2346 West Grace Street, Richmond, Va.

MANILA CATHEDRAL.

The Department of Missions, among other things, has reported to the Presiding Bishop and Council that the Cathedral at Manila in the Philippine Islands was in need of extensive repair. When this Cathedral was built it was impossible to utlize steel or native hard woods which were impervious to the onslaught of the white ants. It has been stated that Oregon pine would repel these ants, and so it was used in the beams which support the roof. The white ants have attacked this wood, however, and so weakened the supports that the roof is now in danger of falling. It was estimated that the repairs would cost in the neighborhood of $40,000. Much as the Council regretted this expenditure of money, it was necessary to take action or close the Cathedral. As no money was in hand for this purpose, it was necessary to authorize the Bishop to place a mortgage on the Cathedral in the hope that the funds could be secured to pay off this indebtedness.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

(Continued from page 7)

and mistakes and superficial interpretations. It has been well said that the great Homer sometimes nods. So it is no doubt true that that part of Mr. Wells' work in which he discusses Christianity is unworthy of his fine intellect.

Whether in discussing Christianty his mind was closed to conviction by reason of prejudice, or whether he was not properly prepared for the discussion of so great a subject, I do not hesitate to say he did not grasp it in its comprehensiveness.. Though he tells us that he writes simply as a historian, and that it is not the function of a historian to perform the work of an interpreter; yet it is, we know, the function of a historian, considering that word in its best sense, to perform such work, and that he himself, though he will not confess it, does perform such work in the discussion of Christianity. I do not think that I do him any injustice in saying that it is his belief that the Person, in whom Christianity originated, is no more than human. The utterances of Jesus of Nazareth, according to his interpretation, reveal Him as a man only, a very good man, a very wise man, the best and the wisest that any age ever produced, but still only a man. They do not present to him a Being Who was more than human, Who was divine as well as human, Who was God as well as man. But such is the Person these utterances do present to us. The Author of these utterances plainly teaches that He is such a Person, and such is the interpretation put upon them by the disciples, who followed Him for three years.

If it be true that Jesus of Nazareth was such a Person, then it follows necessarily that He had the power and wisdom to found a religion that would suit all races down to the great consummation. And it is reasonable to suppose that His religion would be of such a character. And what it is reasonable to suppose He would do, we know He actually did. We learn from His utterances, as well as from the words of His disciples, who spoke and wrote under the inspired guidance of the Holy Spirit, that the religion He gave to the world was intended for the free agents of God for all time and for all races. When the human race by the great law of evolution shall attain unto that magnificent civilization which is held out to it in the predestination of God; when knowledge shall run to and fro throughout this planet of ours, bringing with it comforts and peace and joy and glory and blessed aspiration for more and more glory, not only for a few of its rational inhabitants, but for all its countless numbers, it will be found that the religion that the Son of God gave to the world nineteen hundred years ago will not be decadent, but will be as suitable for that distant age as it was for the age which saw its entrance into the world. It will, indeed, be the greatest factor in producing that magnificant civilization that is awaiting the human race in the future history of this planet.

Many are the things, no doubt, that will contribute to that civilization. Knowledge in its various forms will do much to bring it about. But the chief instrument God will use in His wise providence to make it a reality will be the religion founded by His blessed Son. So taught the disciples of the Son of God when, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they gave to the world the New Testament Scriptures. They taught that the Christian religion contained all those rich and vital truths which, under the operation of the great spiritual dynamic, the Holy Spirit could and would advance the human race from progress to progress until it would be prepared for that great event in the history of the world, the second personal advent of the Ascended Lord in all the glory of heaven.

The writers of the New Testament, especially St. John and St. Paul, possessed a splendid optimism regarding the destiny of the human races. It eclipses the optimism of Mr. Wells. If the vision of Mr. Wells as to the glory of the human race is charming, the vision of the Seer of Patmos and the Apostle of the Gentiles is even more charming. If the blessedness that Mr. Wells saw awaiting the human race in the history of this planet is magnificent, the blessedness that these two inspired apostles of the Lord were favored to behold is far more magnificent. And they taught that this magnificent blessedness would be primarily due to religion; not to some new religion, as prophesied by Mr. Wells, but to that religion that was bequeathed to the world nineteen hundred years ago by the Son of God, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

(REV.) WILLIAM L. BRADDOCK.

Mechanicsville, Md., July 21, 1921.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

KEEP IN TOUCH WITH GOD.

All of a sudden the street car stopped and remained stationary.

"What's the matter?" exclaimed a fussy old lady with a large suit-case, who was evidently on her way to the station. "There is nothing the matter with this car, but one crossing the track in front of us has slipped its trolley."

"Oh, dear, I will surely miss that train!" said the old lady dolefully.

"Yes, ma'am, I am a little afraid you will," replied the motorman rather unconsolingly, "for there is no telling when they will get that car started."

As one looked out of the window, the other car could be plainly seen.

There it stood motionless and lifeless, because it had lost the connection with the vitalizing power that made it move. It had the same motorman in front, the same conductor on the rear platform; all its equipment was in place, but it would not go.

Now the cars began to line up behind, and passengers began to fret even more vigorously and vociferously than the old lady with the suit-case. No doubt many trains were missed and numerous engagements were broken because that one car had lost its connection with the electricity which ran it.

This is an incident out of real life. It actually happened a few days ago.

The interesting thing is that it is typical of what is constantly happening in the religious world.

Some person, man or woman, loses touch with God, and their spiritual growth stops—their religious life becomes dead. Instead of being a help to others, a means of leading people forward by their example, they become a hindrance. They block the progress of other lives. They cause other people to stumble and fall just in the same way that the lifeless street car had caused persons to miss their trains on other cars that were perfectly able to run, if that one had not blocked the way.

Sometimes such a homely incident as this brings home to us the interdependence of all life. Our spiritual growth and development is helpful not only to ourselves, but to all around us.

If the life-giving power of the love of God ceases to flow into our hearts, and our lives become selfish, cold and dead, it is not only ourselves who suffer thereby—but all those with whom we come in contact.

As Christians and church members, we have an enormous responsibility. If we do not show forth God's love, "not only with our lips, but in our lives," we may be having a deadening effect upon others, who will say, "What does his Christianity mean to him?"

It is a vital thing for us to look well to our spiritual trolleys—not only for our own sakes, but because of others.

We may call these trolleys by various names—faith, prayer or love. The name is more or less unimportant. The essential thing is to be sure that we are in touch with God, and that our spiritual life is moving and moving in the right direction.

REMEMBERING THE DEPARTED.

There are a variety of ways in which tribute is paid to the dead "who die in the Lord." At a meeting of representatives of many welfare organizations—the most practical plan of remembrance was announced of which we have never heard.

The president of a church body said that their members had long ago realized the uselessness of floral tributes and high sounding resolutions in commemorating a departed member, and had incorporated in a part of their by-laws the following plan: When one of their co-workers dies, mite-boxes are distributed to each person in the association, with the announcement that the amount collected in the boxes will be brought in at a memorial meeting for such and such a one deceased. The lady making this statement said that upon the occasion of the death of a highly esteemed member, no less than five hundred dollars had been brought in to be used for the benevolent purposes to which these godly women dedicate themselves, sometimes, educating penniless children, or providing homes for orphans and relief work of all kinds.

The plan sounded so thoroughly practical that we cannot but feel that in passing it on we may be helping to inaugurate a method of remembering the dead that would prove advantageous to the living and helpful to the deceased.

Some one has said that a loving thought is a ministering angel, and if some deed of charity or some act of relief is performed in the memory of one who is gone before, surely those are speeded on their way for whose sakes such kindnesses are rendered.

Away back in the book of Proverbs we find the statement that "the memory of the righteous is blessed." At first we think that this merely means that a righteous life leaves behind it such a trail of sweet recollections that it is a blessing to the world, but may not these words have a deeper significance, meaning that God blesses the memory because the memory constitutes the soul?

We are told by scientists that the body changes entirely every seven years, so that one who is forty-nine years old has had seven different bodies, yet there is something that binds those seven bodies together and makes them one person, and that something is the memory.

We say solemnly, "Man brought nothing into this world and can take nothing out of it." This, of course, is true as far as physical things are concerned; but is it true of spiritual things? Do we not carry to God the memories of a lifetime, and that God blesses those memories where there is anything to bless.

In this way we see that the words from the "Old Book" have a new and more literal meaning. God blesses the memory of the righteous, because that is all there is to bless. In other words, your soul is made up of the recollection of good deeds and kindly words that we have scattered through life, and if we hope to have a strong and healthy soul, it should be well nourished with this soul food of righteous works.

If even in dying we can add to the number of our worthy acts as is done by the commemorative plan we have referred to, surely that, too, will add to our blessings.

In the long day of lifetime the memory ranges far and wide, but at the eventide it comes home to God, bringing its record with it, "and the memory of the righteous is blessed."

NATURAL CONSEQUENCES.

We have not had time to verify the two following press dispatches, but presume they must have some foundation in fact, since the Associated Press vouches for them.

We use them here because they afford a striking example of the fateful effects of Ku Klux Klans and such like organizations to "supplement law enforcement."

Nacogdoches, Tex., July 20 (By the Associated Press).—J. W. McKnight, a plumber, was a victim twice of white-capping parties, it became known today when he returned to his home after a second flogging. Masked men took him from deputy sheriffs last night near Timpson, stripped and beat him and smeared tar on his clothing.

Shreveport, La., July 20.—Sheriff Smith, of Center, Shelby County, this afternoon announced that he had talked by telephone with the sheriff of Nacogdoches County, and the latter had informed him that J. W. McKnight was in a sanitarium in Nacogdoches, and his condition was not regarded as altogether favorable.

Lufkin, Tex., July 20.—Ben Wiley, about thirty years old, was seized here last night by masked men, given a coat of tar and feathers, and released from an automobile on a prominent corner as the evening theater patrons were passing. Wiley ran through the business streets to his automobile, and left hurriedly for his home at Diboll, about ten miles from here.

Church Intelligence

MID-SUMMER MEETING OF THE PRESIDING BISHOP AND COUNCIL.

At the invitation of the Bishop of the Diocese of Washington and the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral, the Presiding Bishop and Council held its mid-summer meeting on July 13 and 14 in the city of Washington as the guest of the National Cathedral School for Girls. After a celebration of the Holy Communion by the President in Bethlehem Chapel of the Cathedral, the Council convened in the gymnasium of Whitby Hall. Members came from as far west as Colorado and California to attend this meeting, which was of great importance, for it was planned to consider the evaluation of the work of the Council carried on through its various departments. There were sixteen members in attendance.

Relation of Council and Provinces

One of the first subjects considered was that brought up by the Department of the Nation-Wide Campaign on the relation of the Council to the various provinces. In order to give this full consideration, a special committee was appointed to consider not only the relation of the Council to the provinces, but the way in which the Council can use the provincial organization.

The committee reported recommending the appointment of a committee to take under consideration the desirability of changes in Canons 53 and 60 with a view to harmonizing the policies of the provinces and of the Presiding Bishop and Council. The committee stressed the importance at the present time of encouraging a national consciousness in the Church, and deplored any evidences of the development of sectional feeling and sectional action.

Parochial Missions.

The Nation-Wide Campaign Department also reported the result of the meeting of a Commission on Parochial Missions. The Commission reported that they had canvassed the matter of the Nation-Wide Preaching Mission and came unanimously to the following conclusions: "That the scope of the mission so invades diocesan rights that we hesitate to pursue any policy until we have conferred with the Bishops of the Church and secured from them the approval of our program, or else a disapproval. We believe that the usefulness of this Commission will depend upon a reply to this questionnaire, and we make our further recommendations upon the condition that we secure such a number of approvals as to justify our continuance as a Commission. The details of our program are as follows:

"First, that we secure from Bishops and other sources the names of such men as may be apt in holding missions, and that we shall ask them to hold themselves in readiness to conduct missions under the direction of the Commission as may be arranged.

"Second, it is our desire to hold at various centers throughout the country conferences at which clergy shall be trained in holding Parochial Missions, said conferences to be under the direction of leaders designated by the Commission.

"Third, this Commission will undertake to get out a Manual for Preaching Missions at an approximate cost of $1,000.

"Fourth, this Commission feels that it will be impossible for any general body to undertake the conduct of missions throughout all places in the United States, but would prefer to specialize in conducting missions at such strategic cities or centers in each Diocese as they may be requested to conduct by the ecclesiastical authority thereof.

"Fifth, this Commission has canvassed those present at this meeting as to their ability for serving the Commission as called upon with the result that Bishop Johnson, Father Hughson and Dr. Clark are prepared to give to the Commission such time as the work may require, but feel in so doing that the Diocese, Parish or Order to which they belong should be compensated by the Presiding Bishop and Council for the loss of their services in any continuous work undertaken for the Commission."

Evaluation of Missionary Results.

In presenting its report on evaluation the Department of Missions submitted figures showing the appropriations made to the dioceses and missionary districts in the domestic field in the ten-year periods from 1901, also showing the population of the State, the number of congregations, clergy, communicants, Sunday school pupils and contributions from the diocese or district during the same period. The same figures were presented for the foreign field. This report showed that while in some cases the appropriation from the Department of Missions either remained the same or was increased, the registered communicants had decreased. The Council felt that there was some good explanation for this, realizing that in country communities the parish very frequently acted as a feeder for the city churches. They felt, however, that it would be helpful in considering appropriations for 1922 if they could have from every Bishop receiving an appropriation from the Council a statement of the results that have been obtained from past expenditures. The Council felt sure that every Bishop receiving help from general funds would be only too glad to lay before the Council any information that would help it in determining the value of its appropriation.

Registration of Church Workers.

The Commission on the Registration and Reference of Church Workers came in for careful consideration. It will be remembered that the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., which was organized by the Rev. Arthur W. Brooks, and operated for twenty-two months, endeavored to secure the endorsement of the last General Convention. In this connection the convention adopted the following:

"Therefore be it resolved, the House of Deputies concurring, that a joint committee be appointed, to consist of five Bishops, five Presbyters and five Laymen, to take under advisement the whole subject of vacancy and supply; and especially to consider the advisability of giving the endorsement of the Church to the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., aforesaid: and to report during this present session of the General Convention" (Journal, page 71).

This committee reported that in its opinion it was "inexpedient for the General Convention of the Church to give official endorsement to an organization which both in its origin and status is largely, if not altogether, a private enterprise, no matter how efficient such an organization may be" (Journal, page 184).

The committee further recommended that there be referred to the Presiding Bshop and Council the following:

"The urgent need of a Department of Vacancy and Supply, created and controlled by the General Church, having Parishes may secure full, prompt and accurate information about clergy seeking cures or temporary work" (Journal, page 184).

In pursuance of the above, the Presiding Bishop and Council requested that the Department of Religious Education study this whole matter, and appointed a commission composed of Rt. Rev. Thomas A. F. Gailor, D. D., Rev. William T. Gardner, D. D., John W. Wood, D. C. L., Rev. Arthur R. Gray, D. D., Rev. Franklin J. Clark, Miss Grace Lindley.

Conferences were held with the authorities of the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., and an agreement was reached by which they turned over their consent to the transfer of their file, and dissolved their corporation in consideration of the payment of $1,500, which covered all the outstanding obligations of the Church Personnel Bureau, Inc., and the salary of the Executive Secretary for six months in advance.

The Commission began its work on April 12, 1920, and up to date there has been registered with it, both lay and clerical, 443 persons.

Through change of plans, or the securing of work through other sources than this Commission, 139 names have been removed from the register; of this number forty-seven were clergy.

The total number of references which we have made to date is:

Clergy	201
Lay workers	325

There is now an active list of 260 names, as follows:

Clergy	74
Teachers, grade, languages, English History, Mathematics, Physical Education, Domestic Science, Religious Education, etc	70
Social Service Workers, including deaconesses	40
Parish visitors	38
Organists	5
Work among foreign-born Americans	7
Office workers	26
Total	260

Of this active list there is now out ninety-three references of clergy and 165 of lay workers.

The Commission has placed six clergy and thirty-eight lay workers, and in addition has supplied temporary office help, exexcutive secretary, parish workers and many calls for Sunday supply and Lenten services.

It was instrumental in securing two workers for the foreign field. One is now in China and one goes to Cuba in September. We supplied a lay reader for one church, who takes all the Sunday services. He is at college and studying for the ministry.

The above report was made to the Council, and it was voted that the above facts be made known to the Church through the Church press, and that the Church be kept informed frequently of the work of the Commission.

Church Publicity.

The Department of Publicity reported especially concerning the two conferences held in New York and St. Louis, at which were gathered publicity representatives from many dioceses. These two conferences were unanimous in their expression of opinion about the value of Church advertising. Mr. John Stewart Bryan, editor of the News Leader, of Richmond, Va., presented a resolution, which was adopted by the Council, to the effect that "the Council having observed the undoubted effectiveness of Church advertising in the daily newspapers, would call to the attention of pastors generally the advantages that have accrued from employing this method of reaching and holding as their principal function the establishment and operation of a Bureau or Bureaus from which Bishops and the interest not only of Church members, but also of many who are outside of all Church influence."

The department also called attention to the value of a Central News Bureau. One is in operation temporarily to carry the Council over the period necessary to observe the centennial. The Council agreed with the department that this Central News Bureau would be a most valuable asset. It also endorsed the proposition of the Publicity Department to employ a traveling publicity agent. While it is recognized that many dioceses have some provision made for securing publicity material, it is difficult for one not trained in this respect to secure its publication and to distribute it widely enough to be effective. A traveling publicity agent could confer with these local representatives, could seek out human interest stories, and could place these in the way of wide dissemination to the public press in such a way as would greatly benefit the Church.

The Department of Christian Social Service, in the absence of the Executive Secretary, who was attending an important conference at Geneva, where he was holding a series of study classes, reported through Mr. John M. Glenn, of New York. It was noted with great interest that the Conference of Social Workers of our Church held in connection with the National Conference of Social Service Workers was a great success. The President spoke enthusiastically of this conference, which he had attended.

Church Literature for the Blind.

The Committee on Literature for the Blind made a report recommending that certain sections of the Book of Common Prayer be printed in braille. An appropriation was provided to make this possible. It was found that our Church has absolutely no literature for her blind in revised braille, which is the system used today in institutions for the blind. It will cost about $4,000 to issue 100 copies each of the Book of Common Prayer, of the Service of the Holy Communion, or Morning and Evening Prayer and the Litany.

Proposed Move of Headquarters to Washington.

Special consideration was given to the suggestion of the Bishop of Washington to have the Council move its headquarters from New York to Washington. This was placed in the hands of a committee of five laymen, who are asked to give careful consideration to the question in all its phases and report later to the Council.

C—Harris & Ewing

When the Council met in Washington, July 13 and 14, its members, together with the staff, paid their respects to President Harding and later were photographed on the White House Lawn.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Norfolk Loses Two Ministers.

The first of July Norfolk lost two ministers. Rev. W. Shiers gave up his work at St. Paul's and as Secretary of the Norfolk Episcopal Clericus, to take charge of Emmanuel Church, Franklin; Rev. W. L. Loflin resigned St. Peter's to take work in Cleveland, Tenn. Rev. C. P. Holbrook, of Craddock, was elected as Secretary of the Clericus to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Shiers.

Girls' Friendly.

In June the Girls' Friendly Society of St. Luke's Church gave the play, "Sophronia's Wedding," in the parish house of Christ Church. This was repeated at Larchmont and again at Kempsville a week or two later. The annual festival service of the Girls' Friendly of Norfolk and Portsmouth was held in St. Luke's Church June 26. There has been a substantial increase since last year.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

On June 19 five-minute speakers from the Brotherhood of St. Andrew spoke in all the Episcopal Churches of the city on the subject of the Brotherhood Convention to be held in the city in the fall. The Brotherhood has made great gains in Norfolk and vicinity in the past year, notably in St. Thomas', Berkley, and in Emmanuel Church, Kempsville. The value of the holding of the annual convention in Norfolk is fully realized.

Sunday School Institute Meeting.

June 22 the spring meeting of the Norfolk Sunday School Institute was held in St. John's, Hampton. There were two valuable addresses, one by Dr. E. P. Dandridge, of St. Paul's, Petersburg; another by Miss Lila Tucker. The Sunday school of St. John's Church presented three "mystery plays" as a practical illustration of this line of work. On motion of Rev. R. J. Alfriend the name of the institute was changed from "Sunday School Institute" to "Church School Institute." On June 24 Bishop and Mrs. B. D. Tucker invited the ministers of the Convocation of Norfolk and their wives to spend the day with them at their cottage at Virginia Beach. Twenty-nine were present. A delightful luncheon was served.

Buildings Proposed in and Near Norfolk.

The Church of the Ascension has adopted plans and is now at work on the building of a parish house to cost $25,000, with twenty-six rooms. It is expected to have it ready for the Sunday school by November.

St. Paul's, Berkley, has an architect at work on plans for a parish house, and will probably begin building within a month or six weeks. Extensive interior finishing in the church will be done in August, during which time the church will be closed.

St. Luke's congregation has decided to build a temporary frame church on Colonial Avenue at Fifteenth Street, to take the place of the church destroyed by fire resulting from lightning in May. The present parish house on Granby Street will be used for services until the temporary church is complete, and later will be used for meetings of various sorts for some time to come. Eventually a handsome stone church will be erected, probably on Colonial Avenue and Fifteenth Street.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

St. James' Church, Leesburg, decided to attempt something new this summer, and on the last Sunday morning in June it was announced that the night service would be held in the open air at the Court House Square, and that the other Protestant congregations and ministers would be invited to participate. It rained that night, so that the congregation had to move into the court house, but there were enough present to show that there was a strong sentiment in favor of an open air community service. On the following Sunday night there was a large congregation, and it has grown steadily. The other ministers and congregations have co-operated enthusiastically. On July 17 four hundred and sixty seats were provided, which were all filled, and almost as many more were present standing and seated on the grass. Rev. William E. Cox, of Holy Comforter Church, Richmond, was the preacher on the second and third Sundays of July, and ministers of other churches will speak later.

So general has been the interest that the Chamber of Commerce has appropriated $100 with which to buy folding chairs.

Bishop Brown visited Hamilton Parish and confirmed a class of fifteen persons from the churches at Purcellville, Round Hill and Hamilton. The class was prepared and presented by Rev. T. D. Harrari, who is doing most excellent and efficient work in Loudoun county.

The death of Mrs. B. B. Valentine was a serious loss to Monumental Church in particular and to the Diocese of Virginia in general. She had been active in every feature of Church work from her childhood up. By her own request women acted as honorary pall-bearers at her funeral.

It has been announced definitely that the proposed schools for boys and girls respectively in the tidewater section of the Diocese will be opened next session. Christchurch School, near Urbanna, is the school for boys, and St. Margaret's, Tappahannock, is that for girls. The terms for boarding pupils in both schools have been placed at the unusually low figure of four hundred dollars. Prospectuses of the schools are now ready, and may be had by writing to the heads of the schools. Other data is given in advertisements appearing elsewhere in this issue. There is every prospect that the enrollment of the schools will be filled before their first session begins.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, in Roanoke, July 15, the Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, of Amherst, Va., was elected president, and the Rev. W. G. Pendleton, D. D., of the Virginia Episcopal School, Lynchburg, was elected secretary. All communications should be addressed accordingly.

The Rev. Sanford L. Rotter, of Monroe, N. C., will take charge of the mission fields around Wytheville for five or six weeks. This is the missionary district recently resigned by the Rev. Francis H. Craighill, who is now rector of the church at Rocky Mount, N. C.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan

Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., D. D. L., was the preacher at the open air service on the Parkway at Twenty-third Street Sunday, July 17. The Bishop spoke on "President Harding's Call to the Great Powers for a Conference on Disarmament." Prayers for the success of the President in his move that he may become "a peacemaker among nations" were urged by the Bishop. The choir of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Kensington, presented a musical program.

The Rt. Rev. Theosophns Momolu Gardiner is a visitor in Philadelphia, and is the guest of the Rev. J. Da Costa Harewood, of the Church of St. John the Divine, Fifty-second and Vine Streets. Sunday afternoon, July 17, the Bishop addressed a union service of colored people at the Pro-cathedral of St. Mary, Broad and South Streets. On Monday the new Bishop was received by Mayor Moore at the City Hall, and and mission use the Centennial pa-

An interesting service was also held in the Pro-Cathedral on the afternoon of Sunday, July 24, when the colored congregation of the city gave a reception to the newly consecrated Bishop Suffragan of Liberia. Bishop Gardiner was born in Liberia, and is the son of a chieftain of the Vey tribe. He was educated at one of the mission schools of the Church and later ordained for the ministry. He will return to Africa to have charge of the work among native tribes in the interior of that country.

Large congregations gather on the lawn of St. Andrew's Chapel, McKinly, to take part in the evening service on Sundays and to see the pictures of the work which the Church is doing in its mountain districts. July 17 slides were shown, depicting scenes in the life of the people, as well as showing the way the Church is working in Shanghai, China.

On July 24 the pictures illustrated the subject, "The Indians of the United States and the Work the Episcopal Church Is Doing Among Them and Has Been Doing for Many Years."

The Rev. John M. Groton, of Jenkintown, the rector, has charge of the services.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Christian Healing services are being held regularly at Stephen's Church by the rector, Dr. George F. Dudley. These services are being well attended.

The congregation of St. James' Church gave a reception on July 25, St. James' Day, in honor of their rector, the Rev Mr. Clark, celebrating thereby the thirty-ninth year of his rectorship at St. James' Church.

The Rev. Christopher P. Sparling, rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, is seriously considering a call to take charge of a parish in Baltimore. A formal announcement of his decision has not yet been made, however.

The District of Columbia Chapter of the American Guild of Organists concluded the activities of the season by a reception and buffet supper at the New Ebbitt in honor of Dr. Victor Baier, warden; Mr. Oscar Franklin Comstock, general secretary, and Mr. Miles Martin, general treasurer of the Guild. These general officers visited the District Chapter in accordance with their plan of going to many of the Guild meetings throughout the country. Mr. Frederick L. Erickson, dean of the Baltimore Chapter, was also a guest on this occasion. Several addresses were made, and Dr. Baier's talk to the members was most helpful and instructive. He made a plea for good service playing and a right judgment on the part of the organist always, as well as greater co-operation between the clergy and their organists. Dr. Baier is organist of Trinity Church, New York. Mr. Erickson, in a short address, expressed the wish that the Baltimore and Washington Chapters might work together for successful recitals and musical services. A short business session of the District Chapter was held, presided over by Mr. John D. Wilson, dean of the chapter. Many of the organists of the Episcopal Church in Washington are colleagues of the Guild.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Fall plans for the Nation-Wide Campaign were made at a meeting of the department held July 20 in the Bishop's office, Savannah. The Rev. L. G. Wood, field secretary, will hold a training institute for leaders in Savannah, September 27-28. A group of nine clergymen selected by the department will attend the conference and will hold parochial conferences throughout the Diocese the first two weeks in October. For the Centennial plans there will be an essay contest for the Church schools, and prizes will be offered for the best essay on the subject, "The Missionary History of the Church." The department will urge that every parish and mission use the Centenniaal pageant, and a paper giving practical suggestions for conducting the pageant will be sent to those who are inexperienced in the giving of pageants.

The Men's Club of Waycross, at a recent meeting, heard an interesting talk from the new rector, the Rev. E. W. Halleck, on the activities of one of the Men's Clubs of Louisville, Ky., and discussed plans for raising funds to build a parish house. The advisability of erecting a filling station on the church lot in order to raise funds was referred to a committee for investigation.

The Boy Scout Executive for the Okeefeenokee District recently visited Frederica, St. Simon's Island, and organized a Boy Scout troop for Christ Church. The rector, the Rev. D. Watson Winn, is scout master, and three members of the vestry form the Executive Committee. There are fourteen members from the Dodge Home and several others from the Island boys.

Christ Church, Frederica, has received two handsome gifts from a former parishioner, Mrs. Brewster Phillips, in memory of her parents, who were members of the parish some years ago. At a recent service, just before the celebration of the Holy Communion, the rector and congregation read the twenty-fourth Psalm, after which the Junior Warden and one of the vestrymen, on behalf of the donor, presented the gifts, an Altar Service in red morocco, given in memory of Horace B. Robinson, and a silver Paten in memory of Jane Robinson. The rector, the Rev. D. Watson Winn, placed them on the altar, and they were dedicated to "the public worship of God, and separated from all unhallowed, worldly and common uses."

SPOKANE

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Herman Page, D. D., Missionary Bishop.

Plans are being made under the diretion of the Board of Religious Education and the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer to hold a Normal School for Sunday School Workers at Spokane during the coming fall. The principles of the Christian Nurture Series will be thoroughly taught, and it is hoped added interest secured, so that the system will prevail throughout the district. Bishop Page has been an ardent supporter of the system since its commencement.

Holy Trinity Church, Spokane, has suffered rather a disastrous loss in the fact of its rectory being burnt. The rector, the Rev. J. A. Palmer, is living in the parish house pending repairs and improvements. The work of this parish is steadily going forward, and it is hoped that the coming days will show developments in all its departments, such as shall gratify all her communicants and friends.

The Rev. George Henry Severance, Archdeacon of Spokane, will return to the District about the middle of August with his bride. He has been spending a few months at his home at Claremont, N. H.

The Rev. M. J. Stevens, vicar of St. John's Church, Spokane, is busily engaged in building a parish hall at Northport, Wash., in which town the Church has taken on increased life, and an outlet for its social activities will be met in the erection of the parish hall. Mr. Stevens is never weary in helping to realize the ambitions of his Bishop and the Church people in the making of suitable edifices to add to the efficiency of the Church.

The Rev. John G. Larsen, vicar of St. David's Church, Spokane, is busy with the erection of a parish hall adjoining his church. This is really a necessity, not a luxury, for there is no suitable building anywhere near this church for the parish activities, and now that the need is to be met, interest in the church is bound to grow considerably.

Sunday morning, July 3, Louis Jabine was made deacon at All Saints' Cathedral, Spokane. He was presented by the Rev. John G. Larsen, Diocesan Secretary, the Rev. F. Luke read the Litany, and Bishop Herman Page preached. The Rev. Louis Jabine has been placed in charge of the missions at Zillah, Sunnyside and Grainger.

The Very Rev. W. S. Hicks, D. D., has received appointment as the chaplain of the 161st Infantry, Washington National Guard, with the rank of captain. His duties at Spokane during his absence at Camp Lewis have been taken by Bishop Page, the Rev. L. K. Smith and his curate, the Rev. Frederick Luke. Captain Hicks is at Camp Lewis, American Lake, Wash.

LEXINGTON

Rt. Rev. L. M. Burton, D. D., Bishop

Trinity Church, Covington, Ky., will have a somewhat unique experience in the Church life of America when it receives its new rector, Rev. Jas. D. Gibson, on October 1. It wil be welcoming the grandson of one of its former rectors. Just a half-century ago Rev. Isaac Gibson left Hanover County, Va., and went to Kentucky, which was then all one Diocese. His son, Rev. John S. Gibson, served his deaconate in that Diocese, and now the grandson is going from Virginia to Kentucky to take the parish in which his ancestor served. The Diocese of Lexington got her Bishop in the same way. Dr. Burton came from St. John's Church, Richmond, Va., a little over a quarter of a century ago.

ALASKA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Rev. Thomas Jenkins to Return to Portland, Ore.

After the summer's work in Alaska the Rev. Thomas Jenkins, recently appointed Archdeacon of Alaska, will return to the rectorship of St. David's, Portland, Ore. Owing to the loss and shortage of clergy and the task of geting ready for the General Convention, Bishop Summers has requested Bishop Rowe to permit the Archdeacon to stay in Oregon for the present. Till September he may be addressed care Rev. C. E. Price, Jurnaw, Alaska, after that, Portland, Ore.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan

Memorial Tablet Unveiled.

A beautiful memorial tablet was unveiled at the dedication of the memorial church for St. Michael's Parish, Litchfield, on Wednesday, July 13, the donation to the Diocese of Mr. Henry R. Towne.

The tablet is inscribed in memory of Cora W. Towne, the wife of the donor. Sawn from Rosati marble, with Alps green marble border, the lettering is thus framed by this rich color, the lettering itself being in bronze, heavily gold plated. The combination of colored marbles and the gold letters form the central enrichment to the west wall of the church.

Christ Church, New Haven, has adopted a new method of fighting the divorce evil, by resorting to the drama.

According to press reports, the Rev. Charles Ceron, curate of this church, who was himself once an actor, has been taking the leading part in a play entitled the "Divorce Question."

The play pictures the tragedy of a divorce in its effect not only upon the parties to it, but upon their innocent children in the most striking and vivid manner, and by its presentation in a theatre has reached thousands of people with a terrible warning against this growing evil in our nation.

Mr. Ceron is credited with the following statement to a New York World correspondent:

"The idea that we are trying to carry out is to plant in the public mind the increasing evil of the divorce system which is making America the laughing stock of the world and which is poisoning our national life at its source. My belief is that if our parents are not to have control of our moral instruction and teach our children that marriage is a sacrament and not a contract or a thing to be terminated at individual caprice, then the Church must undertake the teaching plainly and firmly from the pulpit in order to save the nation from ruin.

"The stage is one of the most powerful allies that the Church can have in promoting Christian teaching on this vital subject. I am utterly opposed to the type of sermons which I read in some newspapers, which express sweeping condemnation of the theatre. The theatre is evil only when men and women make it such.

"We shall give plays, and continue to give them, as a part of the King's business. The plays will serve as a background for Christian teaching. Bishop Brewster has given his full approval and has expressed the hope that they will succeed."

MASSACHUSETTS.

Rt. Rev. Wm. Lawrence, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Samuel G. Babcock, Suffragan

Two Teachers in Fifty Years.

A Bible class in Trinity Church, Boston, observes its semi-centennial next fall. In all those fifty years there have been but two teachers, Miss Lucy Woods and the present leader, Miss Heloise Hersey.

Among the many small missionary societies already existing in 1821, when the general society was formed, a favorite title for the women's groups was "Auxiliary Female Missionary Association."

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

An addition to the working forces has lately been secured in the person of Rev. William B. Allen, who comes from Saluda, N. C., in the District of Asheville, to reside at Tucumcari, and do such work as may be assigned to him.

Family Department

JULY.

1. Friday.
3. Sixth Sunday after Trinity.
10. Seventh Sunday after Trinity.
17. Eighth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Ninth Sunday after Trinity.
25. Monday. St. James.
31. Tenth Sunday after Trinity.

Collect for Tenth Sunday After Trinity.

Let Thy merciful ears, O Lord, be open to the prayers of Thy humble servants; and, that they may obtain their petitions, make them to ask such things as shall please Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

In the Heart.

If sin be in the heart,
The fairest sky is foul, and sad the summer weather,
The eye no longer sees the lambs at play together,
The dull ear cannot hear the birds that sing so sweetly,
And all the joy of God's good earth is gone completely,
If sin be in the heart.

If peace be in the heart,
The wildest winter storm is full of solemn beauty,
The midnight lightning flash, but shows the path of duty,
Each living creature tells some new and joyous story,
The very trees and stones all catch a ray of glory,
If peace be in the heart.

—C. F. Richardson.

"Higher Than Your Ways."

Mrs. Seaver tapped lightly at the door of her husband's study. Then, without waiting for an answer, she pushed it wide and entered.

"I'm sorry to disturb you, John," she apologized, "but the groceries are here, and I haven't a solitary cent."

Absently dipping into his pocket, the minister brought forth a handful of loose coins. "How much, Ellen?" he inquired mechanically.

"A dollar fifteen." Leaning forward, she picked out the change. "Poor dear," she murmured, and for an instant her lips touched his graying hair. "I've told Hannah she could go at the end of the week. That'll help quite a bit."

"You're looking tired," he frowned. Then his shoulders lifted and straightened. "When you've settled that bill," he said, "I wish you'd come back. I've something to talk over with you."

"All right, dear." Turning, she hurried from the room.

Disposing of the groceries, she pulled a kettle farther back on the stove and took a hurried look into the oven. Then she hastened to the sitting-room and dusted tables, shelf and piano; for morning callers were by no means unknown. "I wonder," she mused, shaking the duster, "what John has on his mind now."

In a corner of the yard Dorothy was sitting under an old tree, chatting with Elizabeth Graves. Dorothy was seventeen, and reveling in summer vacation. Esther, home from her first year of teaching, was busily sewing nearby on a new gown. Between them Donald, aged twelve, blissfully happy in the arrival of the last "American Boy," was stretched full length on the grass, lost to all sense of sight or sound.

Turning, Mrs. Seaver made her way to the study.

"I knew you'd have to see to the affairs of the nation," the minister announced as she entered; "so I got in a ten-minute nap." He yawned; then his glance strayed across the yard and over the open space ahead, out to where the edge of sky dipped to meet hills and trees beyond. "Ellen," he confessed thoughtfully, "I'm beset with anxiety. You need Hannah, now, if you ever did. You're looking worn. I noticed half a dozen gray hairs this morning when I was standing beside your chair; and maybe—" he was trying to introduce a touch of humor—"it was a dozen. I didn't count. But, seriously, it isn't right. How can I help? You were always better at figures than I. We ought to live and—grow, in some way, it appears to me."

Ellen Seaver drew a long breath. Then she, too, looked across at the trees, and the hills, and the sky. "I used to think," she mused—a strange catch in her throat—"that all one had to do was just go on, until they found the pot of gold at the rainbow's edge. And the rainbow, as I looked at it, was Life; and there were all sorts of edges along the way. One came to the edge of this beauty—that achievement—every little while, and kept gathering gold from them all, until arms and heart and life were full. But life's been rather too full of work to get very far along toward any of the edges, hasn't it, let alone reaching them?"

John Seaver's eyes softened. "You should have done better than a poor minister," he observed wistfully. "You should have had a chance to unfold."

She let her eyes meet his. "Is anything better than life, side by side with the partner of one's heart?" she asked gently. "Besides, John, we've three children as fruitage."

"Yes," admitted John Seaver dryly, "and I've always supposed they would be some sort of help when they got on. Instead, they seem to be more of a care. Where it used to be little folde-rols and a picnic, at ten and fifteen, now it's luxuries, week-ends and a steady consulting of their whims and pleasures instead of yours. God has been good to them. He gave them a wonderful mother—a passable father—and life. But, bless you, they don't realize it. Why can't Esther take a part of Hannah's work and Dorothy a part? Don, even, could have a share. It isn't right to you; and, Ellen, it isn't right to them."

Mrs. Seaver's worn face flushed; her eyes looked almost frightened. "No, no, John," she remonstrated. "It wouldn't do. They need their summer's rest and play. They'll not be young but once. Let them gather as much of the joy of life as they may."

Leaning forward, Seaver met her anxious eyes with steady, determined ones. "Ellen," he urged, "God's plan includes you, as much as your children. There are upper chambers in life for every soul to dwell in, and when they're there the joy of life beats for them full measure. But they don't get there by shirking; they don't get there by assuming the real duties of others, as you have been doing. I wish you would think about it, Ellen." With a twisted sort of smile he resumed his work.

"John's right," she acknowledged, returning to the kitchen. "But, dear me! he doesn't realize how impossible it is to begin."

With a snap the screen door opened and Dorothy stepped inside. "Motherie," she said coaxingly, "Tlizabeth and I are planning a tramp to Fairmount Heights this afternoon. Can I bring her home to supper? And will you have hot muffins, and boiled corn, and strawberries? We'll be starved, you know. And, besides, Esther has invited Dora Wayne over. I just heard her. That'll make you do something rather extra nice, anyhow, won't it?"

"Why, yes. I suppose so." Mrs. Seaver's mind was running rapidly over supplies. She had planned rather closely, and had none too much on hand.

On her way to the door Dorothy stopped to fluff her shining locks before the mirror. "It'd be dandy if we could have ice cream," she wheedled. "And sugar's not very scarce now. Couldn't you coax dad to turn the freezer?" Without stopping for a reply, she was off.

A moment later Esther, cool, and wrapped about with the new mantle of her teacher's dignity, entered. "You're frightfully hot in here," she remarked rather aggressively. "Why don't you let Hannah do this?"

"It's wash-day." Her mother's voice was lifeless. "Hannah can't be in two places at once, my dear. Besides, Hannah is going Saturday night. I'll be out here all the time then."

"Going!" Her eldest daughter's voice was indicative of dismay. "And you'll have to teach a green hand, in hot weather! I'm truly sorry, mother. What is the reason? Can't she be induced to stay, perhaps by a little extra pay through the summer?"

Said Mrs. Seaver, lifting a steaming kettle from the stove, "No, I'll not be teaching a green hand. To tell the truth, Esther, expenses have been going higher and higher until it seems hopeless attempting to make both ends meet without some sacrifice, so I told Hannah this morning she could go. Five dollars a week will be a real help."

Dismay deepened the brown of Esther's eyes to sudden black. "And I've invited Hope Darrow for three weeks," she announced ruefully. "She's going home from the mountains Saturday, so Dora Wayne told me, and I skipped right down and sent a letter. Whatever'll we do? She's used to everything. They've all kinds of money. I knew her in college."

"We'll get along somehow. We'll do the best we can." Her mother sighed unconsciously. "We can't have extras, though; and there's one comfort—being war time, she won't expect it."

Esther spoke quickly. "Of course not," she agreed. "I'd be ashamed to have or give extras while Uncle Sam needs them. But I do want things nice. And if Hannah's going, I don't see how they can be. Why not keep her, just until Hope has been and gone?"

"I'll manage." It struck Esther, all at once, that her mother seemed to be growing old very fast. "Don't fret, child. At least, we'll not get into debt."

Esther turned. "And by the way," she announced carelessly, "Dora Wayne is coming to tea."

"Very well."

As the door closed Mrs. Seaver brought one hand wearily to her head. The weight of twenty extra years seemed suddenly to have descended upon her. "I'm thinking," she said grimly, "John's answer is close at hand."

Next moment, with startling suddenness, the words of yesterday's text seemed to stand out clearly before her: "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways." And as she sensed them, something of quiet touched the nerves of the overburdened and sorely troubled woman. Pausing for a second, she was only half conscious of a quickly uttered sentence, "In Thy way, O Lord, deliver us!" and at the dinner table, a few moments later, she spoke of the expected guest with an almost appealing glance at her husband. "Esther's invited company for the last of the week," she said casually. "It will be pleasant to have a new face among us for a bit."

The minister smiled, but said nothing; and when the telephone rang a few moments later he went into the hall to answer it. When he returned he was smiling like a boy. "Who'd you say was coming Saturday?" he demanded.

"Hope Darrow. Why?" Esther's voice was defiant.

"Your informant appears to have got things twisted. John Darrow's her father, and they're at the hotel now. He and I used to be the greatest chums in the world. Do you suppose, Ellen, you could—" He stopped, and sat weakly down. "If I didn't go and invite them both for a visit," he declared blankly. "Oh, Ellen!"

"Never mind. We'll—" Hannah appeared. "If ye plaze, mum," she interrupted, "I'll be afther lavin' the night. Ye said as I could go whinever I liked, an' I've a grand place fer sthartin' the morrow."

Supper was rather a gala affair. The table linen was spotless; the glass and china shone. Soft blush roses graced the table and sideboard, and the talk was animated and gay among the young people, while the minister and John Darrow lost themselves in reviewing college days. But a specter crowded close to Mrs. Seaver's side, whispering incessantly betwixt the gay chatter, "Three weeks! three weeks!" until she was at times on the verge of crying aloud from pure nervousness.

She arose next morning with a dull headache and heavy circles beneath her eyes. Her movements were lifeless, for she had spent the greater part of the night trying to plan some method of getting through the coming weeks, and as she dressed with nervous haste she did not note the clearness of the morning air or the song of the birds. Her mind was on the work of the day. But as she descended the stairs Hope Darrow pushed back the screen door and stepped inside. "I was out glorifying," she beckoned gleefully. "Come, for just a moment. Do!"

"I'm afraid I haven't time, my dear."

The girl's quick glance took in the circles beneath the heavy eyes—the drawn look about the tired mouth—and she spoke softly.

"You've a headache, I know," she said. "The air may do it good. Then we'll get breakfast together. It'll seem almost like having—mother again." Reaching for Mrs. Seaver's hand, she drew her into the fresh day. A moment they stood silently, then the girl drew a step closer.

"I love to come into the clean, new morning," she said impulsively, "and say 'Thank you, God, for the fresh day.' "

The elder woman laid a worn hand on her arm, her eyes suddenly dim. "Thank you, my dear," she said. "After all, one doesn't have to search too far or too long to find a rainbow's edge. I'd forgotten they were so close. I haven't heard the birds this summer before, or really seen God's morning sky."

Again there was silence. The girl, sensing a force she did not understand, watched the swiftly changing face of the minister's wife as the early morning wrapped its healing touch about her until at length a soft, new peace in her eyes, she turned. "Thank you, my dear," she said again. "How little one knows just when or where the message from God is needed. You brought me one just now."

"I was half afraid," faltered Hope Darrow, "yet I knew He—wanted me—to—speak."

After breakfast the minister and his guests wandered into the yard; but when the rest of the family would have followed, Mrs. Seaver motioned them to wait. Sitting down, she glanced quietly from one to the other.

"We'll have to work hand in hand after this," she said. "Your part, Esther, will be looking after the sweeping, dusting and chamber work. I shall expect you, Dorothy, to set the table, do the dishes, answer the bell and telephone and assist about meals. Don will sweep the piazza, steps and walk each morning, and keep the yard neat, as well as the wood-box filled. I will do the cooking and planning, and fit in for all the other odds and ends. We'll all try and live in upper chambers after this. Now, I'm going to lie down for an hour. I've a headache."

Quietly the door closed behind her. How simple it had been, after all!

In the dining-room the three looked dubiously at each other. "We have been selfish," acknowledged Dorothy contritely.

"And I never so much as dreamed it," amended Esther.

"Bully for ma!" said Don.

The minister glanced ruefully from the rose bush to the house, his wife's face flitting reproachfully before him. He had prayed long and earnestly for a solution of the problem. He could not understand how that invitation had slipped so unthinkingly from his tongue! But in her room the minister's wife closed her eyes with a blissful sense of peace. Surely, God had sent their guests!

"For as the heavens are high above the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways," she whispered, remembering her swiftly uttered prayer of yesterday; and a moment later— "Thank you, God," she murmured in her sleep. —Christian Herald.

The New Eden.

When every child shall, through his native gift,
Be truthward led along the ways of joy;
When every man shall at his labor lift
Hand, heart and head to God, Who gave employ;

When every one an artist soul shall be,
At forge or easel, at the desk or loom—
Then through his task shall every man be free,
And none shall toil as captive to his doom.

Cities shall then become the shrines of art;
Towns, gardens all, shall bloom as the May;
Laughter shall thrive, of every life a part,
And rest await each man at close of day.

Then shall be born the kingdom of the blest;
In every heart shall love enthroned be;
Then God once more shall see His garden dressed
With flower and fruit and every pleasant tree.

—The Banner.

Sorrow's Use.

The sorrow that is meant to bring us nearer to God may be in vain. The same circumstances may produce opposite effects. I dare say there are people who will read these words who have been made hard and sullen and bitten and paralyzed for good work because they have some heavy burden to carry or some wound or ache that life can never heal. Ah, brother, we are often like shipwrecked crews, of whom some are driven by the danger to their knees, and some are driven to the spirit casks. Take care that you do not waste your sorrows, that you do not let the precious gifts of disappointment, pain, loss, loneliness, ill health or similar afflictions that come in your daily life mar you instead of mending you. See that they send you nearer to God and not that they drive you farther from Him. See that they make you more anxious to have the durable riches and righteousness which no man can take from you, than to grasp at what may yet remain of fleeting, earthly joys. So let us try to school ourselves into the habitual and operative conviction that life is a discipline. Let us beware of getting no good from what is charged to the brim with good. May it never have to be said of any of us that we wasted the mercies which were judgments, too, and found no good in the things that our tortured hearts felt to be also evils, lest God should have to wail over any of us: "In vain have I smitten your children; for they have received no correction."—Alexander Maclaren.

"Even Thine Altars."

"A day in thy courts is better than a thousand . . . . Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, even thine altars, O Lord of Hosts."—Ps. 84:10, 3.

How dear Thy courts, my God! I cried;
My soul forever for them longs;
Who dwellest in Thy house is blest
In praising Thee with grateful songs.

Why go I mourning, why cast down?
Why yet should grief my tongue employ?
I will with haste His altars find,
For God is my exceeding joy.

He will give grace, and glory too,
No good thing holding back from me;
From strength to strength He leads me on:
My sun and shield, and song is He!

A day within Thy courts, O God,
Is better than all earthly days;
Let me be keeper of the door,
Let me be singing still Thy praise.

Thither Thy winged birds may come,
The swallow build her nest and sing;
The sparrow, too, has found a home—
Even Thine altars, O our King!

—Martha Elvira Pettus.

The Bible and Hope.

The Bible is the very embodiment of hope. Hope is one of its classic words. True, it puts paradise behind, but it puts another paradise before. According to the inspired writers, the soul has had no sordid starting point, and it has no sordid goal. The best definition of religion is that it is a blessed hope. A hope that reacts in self-purification. It brings this life under the power of a life that is endless. "Life is not a shroud; it is a wedding garment." Christianity is the only religion that is hopeful.—Selected.

For the Young Folks

"Suppose You Could Not Go."

I did not want to go to school one day,
And I told my mother so.
I told her that I wanted just to play,
That I did not want to go.
She said—and it surprised me, too—
"Well, son, I'll let you stay at home today—
I'll let you do just what you want to do—
But think about one question if you stay."

That sounded easy, so I said I would.
"Just think," she said it is easy like and cool—
"How it would be, and whether bad or good,
Suppose that you could not go to school."
Suppose that I could not go to school!
Oh, my, that sounded like a jolly lark!
I started out to play beside the pool,
And thought that I would stay away till dark.

"Suppose that I could not go," at first
I dreamed of all I'd do, and all I'd play,
The boys would envy me, but then, the worst,
The other boys would be in school all day!
It would not be much fun to play alone,
And I'd be out of all the things they'd do,
And then I just sat down upon a stone
And thought until I thought the question through.

I never asked before, "Why is a school?"
But now I seemed to see a lot of "whys."
I did not want to grow up like a fool,
When all the others would grow old and wise.
Then for a while I wished they all could quit,
And all alike be stupid, dull and slow,
You see I did not like my school a bit,
That's why I thought I did not want to go.

But I began a-thinking, pretty soon,
About the things I really want to know.
I got up and home I went, that afternoon—
I went to school—and I was glad to go!
You may think that it was queer, what I did then—
But I don't always say my prayers by rules—
I thanked God for the women and the men ....
Who knew our need, and lived to give us schools!

—The King's Builders.

The Birthday Gift.

"What are you going to give me for my birthday, mother?" inquired Teddy Lee.

The following day Teddy would be eight years old, and of his own free will he was going to bed a whole hour earlier, so that the longed for day might come the sooner.

"You must have patience till tomorrow, dear," said his mother, as she kissed him good-night. "The sooner you get to sleep the shorter the time will seem."

Teddy shut his eyes tight and tried —oh, so hard, to sleep. But the more he tried the more wide-awake he felt. At last he forgot to try, and before he knew he was dreaming of a wonderful aeroplane that nobody could drive but he. And of how he gave the boys at school rides in this aeroplane, all except Jack Towne, that is to say. He would just show Jack Towne that he had better not stick pins into his leg when the teacher was not looking.

The next thing Teddy knew was that the sun was streaming into his room, and the little birds were singing their morning songs. It was quite two minutes before he remembered that he was eight years old. Then with one bound he was out of bed and into his father's and mother's room.

"Happy birthday!" they said, very very sleepily.

"Where are my presents?" demanded Teddy.

"Go and get dressed first," said his mother firmly.

Perhaps never did a little boy of eight years old dress more quickly than Teddy did that morning, and if he did not clean his teeth and wash his face quite as thoroughly as usual, who could blame him? For one is eight years old only once in a lifetime.

He could hardly wait until his parents were dressed. But at last they were ready, and all three went down to breakfast.

A pile of mysterious-looking parcels lay beside Teddy's place. He wasted no time in opening them, scattering paper here and string there, until at last they stood revealed. A pocket-knife from Uncle Bert, a book from grandmamma, an electric train with rails from Aunt Flo, a flash-light from Cousin Jim, and enough ties and handkerchiefs to last him until he was nine at least.

But had father and mother forgotten their little boy? He looked anxiously under his plate and in his teacup. Nothing there. His lips began to tremble.

"You forgot to look under the table, sonny," smiled his father.

Teddy did not require a second bidding. Lifting the edge of the tablecloth, he saw a large basket.

"What in the world can be in that?" he thought.

As if in answer to his thought a sharp bark came from the basket. It was only a matter of a few seconds to cut the strings with his new pocket-knife and raise the lid. As he did so, out jumped the cutest little Boston terrier, which stretched its cramped legs and then proceeded to smell Teddy with a great show of interest.

"Can I take him outdoors?" asked Teddy.

"When you have eaten your breakfast and fed Togo," said his mother. "You can take him out till lunch time. But don't go too far away. Remember, Togo does not know you very well yet, and you don't want to lose him, do you?"

"I should say not," replied Teddy.

Teddy was too excited to eat much breakfast, and Togo did not seem to be very hungry either, so Teddy carefully fixed a leash to Togo's collar and led him out. How he wished he could meet some of his school friends. None of them had a dog that could compare with him.

But what was the matter with Togo? Instead of following his master obediently, he was standing stock still, with his ears pricked up. Teddy pulled the leash gently at first, then with some impatience. But Togo was too deeply engaged in sniffing the sidewalk to pay any attention. Teddy jerked the leash again. Togo began to move certainly, but in the wrong direction. With his nose near the ground, he began to run, slowly at first, then faster and faster and faster, until it was all that Teddy's short legs could do to keep pace with him.

"Stop!" panted Teddy. "Bad dog, sir! Stop, I tell you."

But on they went, narrowly escaping being run over by street cars and automobiles, down one side street after another, until they came to one that was narrower and dirtier than any Teddy had ever seen before.

Here Togo succeeded in breaking loose from Teddy, and darted into an open door. Without a moment's thought Teddy followed. As he stood for a minute, uncertain which way Togo had gone, he heard a weak voice cry:

"Togo! Poor old Togo; did you come back to me, old fellow?"

Teddy pushed wider open the door of the room from which the voice came. Inside he saw a small bed, and on the bed a white-faced boy of about his own age, with tears rolling down his cheeks, which Togo was busily licking away.

The boy hastily wiped away his tears when he saw Teddy.

"Did Togo run away from you?" he asked.

"Yes," said Teddy. "I'm eight. How old are you?"

"I'll be eight next week," answered the boy.

"Why are you lying in bed?" asked Teddy. "Are you sick?"

"Well, I'm not what you'd call sick, but I haven't been able to walk since an auto knocked me down last year."

"Gee!" said Teddy. "'d call that pretty sick. Did Togo belong to you?"

"Yes," replied the boy sadly.

"Well, why didn't you keep him, since you are so fond of him?"

"Mother had to sell him," said the boy slowly.

"I guess she doesn't like dogs," put in Teddy hopefully.

"Yes, she likes dogs all right; but she wanted the money for a new doctor."

"To cure you?" asked Teddy.

The boy nodded.

"My father is a doctor," said Teddy. "I'll tell him to come here and see you. He's a very clever doctor. He cured my throat when it was sore. Well, I guess I'd better be going home now. Come on, Togo."

But Togo absolutely refused to leave the side of the little lame boy. Teddy tried force, he tried coaxing, he tried bribing, in vain. The sick boy ordered the dog away, but Togo only looked pleadingly into his eyes and wagged his tail.

"But he has got to come," said Teddy. "He's my birthday present."

In spite of his eight years, his eyes filled with tears.

"Why, who is this that has come to see you, Dick?" said a cheery voice.

Both boys turned toward the door.

"Oh, mother," said Dick, "Togo has come back and he won't go away. He belongs to this little boy now."

"Where do you live, my dear?" she asked Teddy.

Teddy told her.

"And you have come all that distance alone? How anxious your mother will be about you. I must go up to the drug store and ring up at once and let her know where you are?"

In a few minutes she returned.

"Your father is on his way here to take you home. Naughty Togo, to run away from your new master," she said, shaking her finger at Togo.

But Togo was sound asleep in Dick's arms.

"Here's daddy," cried Teddy, as an automobile drew up outside the house.

"Well, young man, what brought you here?" said Dr. Lee.

"Togo," replied Teddy.

Then he poured out the whole story into his father's ears.

"Dick's not sick, you know, but he can't walk. He'll be eight next week. And Togo won't come home, daddy."

"Let me have a look at Dick," said Dr. Lee.

Dr. Lee was a very clever doctor, as Teddy had said, and he found out why Dick could not walk.

"I believe I could make him not only walk, but run, within six months," said he to Dick's mother.

"Oh, sir, if you only could," she said. "But we are poor. We cannot afford to pay you much, but I will work for you, and Dick—"

"Don't say a word about payment," said the doctor. "That is going to be Teddy's birthday present to Dick. Teddy, how would you like to give Dick a present of a pair of legs?"

"Legs!" said Teddy doubtfully.

"Yes, real flesh and blood legs."

"If Dick would like to have them," said Teddy still doubtfully.

"Better than anything else in the world," said Dick.

"You are forgetting about Togo," he called out as the doctor and Teddy were leaving the room.

"I wouldn't waken up Togo for the world," said the doctor, "for Teddy and I are going to call at the dog kennels on the way home, and we are going to get another Togo. One that won't run away this time. Eh, Teddy?"—L. T. Cairns, in the Junior Herald.

A Summer Gown.

The meado wis a gown of green.
Sing ho, for grasses short and tall!
The meadow is a gown of green—
A gown of sunny, silken sheen,
And rich as that of any queen.
Sing ho, the gown of green, O!
The little brook 's a ribbon gay.
Sing ho, the winding, twisting stream!
The little brook 's a ribbon gay,
The girdle of the gown, I say,
Around, about it loops away—
Sing ho, the gown of green, O!

The daisies are the buttons round.
Sing ho, for yellow ones and white!
The daisies are the buttons round,
And never in straight rows they're found,
But, hit or miss, they dot the ground.
Sing ho, the gown of green, O!
Queen Anne's lace is the trimming white.
Sing ho, for fluffy, soft rosettes!
Queen Anne's lace is the trimming white.
It makes the gown a lovely sight,
Because it adds a touch so light.
Sing ho, the gown of green, O!
—Blanche Elizabeth Wade, in St. Nicholas.

How Twinkle-Toes Went to School.

Twinkle-toes was an orphan mouse; all he owned in the world was a gray velvet jacket, a pair of gray velvet trousers and the sheaf of wheat in which he lived. Of course he lived first of all and every day in the gray velvet suit, but the sheaf of wheat that stood beside the barn door was his real home. He had lived there all the spring, and now he felt that it belonged to him.

"There never was such a fine barn as ours!" Tilly, the little girl whose father owned the farm, often said. It was a fine barn and a clean one, too, for there were porcelain troughs for the cows to drink from and white china eggs to amuse the hens. It was the hired man who had stacked the two big sheaves of wheat one on each side of the door; but neither he nor any one else knew that an orphan mouse lived in one of the sheaves.

One afternoon, near the end of school, Tilly went down to the barn, but she was not thinking how fine a barn it was, for she was almost ready to cry, and she had gone there so that no one should see her.

"The school pageant is on Friday," Tilly told the cows, "and all the other children have new costumes to wear when they speak their pieces. My verse is about 'ploughing the fields and scattering the good seed in the land,' but I have no new hat to wear, nor any new dress. Mother's so busy cooking for the farm hands that she can't find time to make me a dress."

But the cows only crunched their feed and switched their tails. Not one of them said a single word to comfort Tilly. So she tried the hens:

"There is a beautiful wreath of wild flowers and grain down in the village in Miss Trim's, the milliner's, window. It would be just right for my old hat, but it costs a great deal."

The hens went on scratching and clucking; not one of them said a word. But Twinkle-Toes, feeling sympathetic with Tilly, started up a great rustling in his sheaf of wheat, which made Tilly look at the sheaf.

"The very thing! Why didn't I think of it before?" she cried aloud. "A wreath of real wheat will make my old hat look almost as good as new, and just before I go I can stick some real wild flowers into the band."

"And carry a small sheaf of wheat in your arms," suggested her mother, who had come into the barn for a panful of vegetables. "With your pink sash you will look as well as any one there."

So everything was provided for—everything, that is, except Twinkle-Toes. And as Tilly broke off sprays of golden wheat to make a thick, rich wreath and sewed the wreath on her hat and pulled out long, nodding stalks for the sheaf that she was going to carry, Twinkle-Toes kept jumping here and there, backward and forward—anywhere to keep out of the way. He tried to stay in the wheat that Tilly was not pulling apart; and he scampered about so briskly that she really did not know he was there. Indeed, Twinkle-Toes himself hardly knew where he was; but of one thing he was sure: he was not going to school.

The day of the pageant came. It was a lovely day; the wild roses beside the roads danced in the wind, and the pink clover blossoms nodded their heads, which were getting a little heavy. Tilly looked as sweet as the day; her old dress was clean and starched, and the pink sash was tied in a big, crisp bow. She had woven tight little bunches of pink clover into the golden wreath round her hat. Really, there was not another hat in the whole pageant that was so pretty. All the other little girls spoke of it.

The pageant was held out of doors, of course. The school benches had been brought into the school yard and set up under the elm trees; in front of the benches were the low chairs on which the little brothers and sisters would sit. The parents who drove over tied their horses behind the schoolhouse; those who had automobiles parked the cars in front. It was truly a great occasion.

Everything went well; the children who were to sing sang; and the children who were to speak spoke. No one was afraid and every one did his best. At last Tilly's turn came; she went forward holding her head very straight and high, partly to keep up her courage and partly because real wheat makes a heavy hat-band.

"'We plough the fields,' began Tilly, and then the hired man's two children, who sat with their mother near the front, snickered. This was just what they did: they snickered. Their mother nudged them, and they squeezed their handkerchiefs into their mouths; but the snickers popped out at the corners and slipped down their throats with noisy gurgles; and then all the little brothers and sisters in the front row began to laugh. Tilly felt terribly hurt. She thought that the children were laughing at the hat that she had trimmed, or at the sheaf of wheat that she carried. But one thing she knew: she must go right on and do her best.

"'And scatter the good seed in the land,'" she continued.

Then Miss Trim, who had run over from her shop with her fat pin-cushion and her sharp scissors dangling at her waist, really laughed aloud.

"She is making fun of my hat," Tilly thought, and two hot, salt tears trickled down her flushed cheeks. No one saw the tears, but every one noticed the pink in her cheeks that just matched her sash. She went right on to the end of the piece; Tilly had been brought up to make the best of things.

And when she made her bow, how the audience did clap! Tilly made a second bow, and off the rim of her hat jumped Twinkle-Toes!

He had never intended to go to the pageant. He had tried so hard not to go that he had hidden himself in a thick part of Tilly's wreath the night when she left the finished hat out in the barn until the bunches of clover could be added to it. All the time Tilly had been saying her piece, Twinkle-Toes had sat on the wide brim of her hat, with his beady eyes darting here and there and seeming about to pop out of his head. He was a young mouse, and having to sit there with all those children laughing at him frightened him. Then, too, his gray suit was more ruffled than he cared to have it, for he was very neat, and that made things still worse. So at last he jumped down and scampered as fast as he could to the orchard behind the schoolhouse, while Miss Trim and the hired man's children and all the little brothers and sisters were telling Tilly that a mouse made a delightful ornament for a pretty hat.

"After all," thought Twinkle-Toes out in the orchard, beginning to hold up his head and frisk his tail again, "why not make the best of things? An orchard is pleasanter in summer than a barn, and when winter comes I can hide in the school scrap-basket. Who knows? I may even hear something there that will be worth knowing!"—Carolyn Bailey, in Youth's Companion.

The Merry Rain.

Today the merry rain came down
Aslant the misty air;
With long, cool fingers washed my face
And wet my braided hair.

I watched it fill the ditches up
And spatter in the pool,
As slowly through the silvery shower
I homeward trudged from school.

It sang a busy, humming song
To greet the fragment grass,
And tinkled tiny raindrop tunes
To please a little lass.
—Josie Eppert, in St. Nicholas.

For the Children.

One of the games which boys like best to play, and which a good many girls like to watch, is football. If a football could speak, I expect it could preach us a good sermon about the different ways in which different boys play the game. I can think of three points which it might tell us about in that sermon.

The first point in the football's sermon is this: play the game clean. There are some boys who forget that. They will take advantage of mean tricks to hurt the boy playing against them, or to break the rules of the game unfairly when they think the referee and umpire do not see them. They will be rough when they do not need to be, and fall on the boy who has the ball after he is down. Boys like these are the toughs of football. They may seem to be very dangerous for a while, but they do not succeed in the end; for after a while their own teammates lose respect for them and do not like to play on their side. The boy who plays clean, who will not take a mean advantage, and is fair always, is the boy who will be the real leader finally.

The second point is this: Play the game hard. A boy can be fair and straight, and still play with every ounce of strength he has in him. There is no room in football for the boy who quits because he is hurt, or shirks because the game begins to go against him. The great player is the one who plays his best from the moment the referee's whistle blows for the game to begin until it blows again when the game is ended. Whatever the score is, whatever the way he may be feeling, he does his best as long as he is on the field.

Third and last in the football's sermon would be this point: Play the game together. No football eleven would be of much account if it did not have real team-work. That is, it could not win if every boy were thinking only of himself and trying to show off the way he can play, and not trying to fit in with all the others to make the whole team win.

I knew of a man once in college who gave a wonderful example of the fine, unselfish spirit which thinks not of one's self, but of the team. He and one other man were both trying for the position of center on the university eleven. The other man was a stronger player in every respect except one: he could not pass the ball as surely as this man whom I am speaking about. So this man went to the coach and told him just how he thought the other man could improve his passing. He preferred to lose his own chance of making the eleven rather than not have the team made just as strong as it possibly could be made. This man had his reward, too, because the other man whom he had helped to go ahead of him was injured and could not go into the big game; and so he himself was put on the eleven, and the team played such a game as no eleven in that college had played for years, and won the championship by a great score.

The things which are true in football are true in that other and much bigger game which we might call the game of life. In that game, too, the first rule is play clean. Not to be fair at school, to copy somebody else's examples, and somebody else's Latin exercise, and bring it into class just as though it were one's own work, to take crooked paths to some success in business, or to try to be popular in society by doing something which is not high and fine, may seem to work for a time, but it will not work in the long run. To play the game clean is the only way for any boy or girl to grow up into the man and woman whom all people will respect.

Then, just as in football, so in the game of life, we must play the game hard. It does not do to be discouraged when we fail at first. The boy or girl who stands at the foot of the class may get to the head before the year is over and stay there if that boy or girl has grit enough to persevere. It does not do to stop and sulk when things go against us, and think that we can be excused from our duty because it is hard, and because sometimes we may get hurt in trying to do it. Hurt or no hurt, our business is to play hard until the whistle blows for the end.

Then last of all, we must play the game together. We are responsible each one not only for himself, but for each other. We must help encourage others to do their best. It is a good thing to go to Sunday school, but it is a very much better thing not only to go, but to help make that Sunday school such a good one that others may be glad that they are there. It is a good thing to go to church, but it is a better thing not only to go, but to help others want to come. It is a good thing to stand up and say that we want to be followers of Jesus Christ, but it is best of all to serve Him so well that others will want to serve Him, too. We must try to be like the great player on the football field, who always is the one who plays his part in such a way that everybody else on his side finds it easier to do his best because he is there. —St. Mark's Outlook.

"Looking Unto Jesus."

He was a good farmer; the furrows in the field he was ploughing stretched like railway tracks to the fence a quarter of a mile away.

"How do you make such straight furrows?" I asked.

"You see that slender pole with a white rag tied to the top of it?" he said in reply. "Well, I set that pole at the point where I want my furrow to end. If I keep my eyes on it all the way across, I can make a furrow almost as straight as a crow can fly. Everything depends on the first furrow; if you get a crook in the first one, the rest have to follow it, for the guiding wheel of the plough runs in the old furrow. Get your first one straight, and the rest will be straight, too."

I reflected that as much depends on the first furrows in life as on the first furrows in the field. As I looked back over my own life and saw in it the many stretches of crooked ploughing, and remembered that they all began with a crooked furrow, I despaired of making it like the field of the ploughman. Then I remembered the slender pole with its fluttering white cloth, and again heard the ploughman saying, "I keep my eyes on it all the way across."

Now I understood. The crooked furrows had come when my eyes were not on Christ. I resolved that, God helping me, I would plough my furrows straight from then on, and that I would do it "looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of my faith."—Selected.

A Better Way.

If you have nothing to do but to discuss the weaknesses and the foibles of your neighbor and to point out his defects of life and character, then your stock in trade has run very low. It would be better for you and for the community if you would devote yourself to the pages of some good book or to the deeds of some lofty character. Out of these you would learn something profitable for yourself and for others. No good comes of dissecting the unfavorable side of human affairs. It is all right for vultures to dispose of garbage. They are created for a work of this sort, but a human vulture is a monstrosity, and no community is safe when he goes out on a foraging expedition.—Texas Advocate.

Thou Art the Way.

Thou art the way.
Hadst Thou been nothing but the goal,
I cannot say
If Thou hadst ever met my soul.

I cannot see—
I, child of process—if there lies
An end for me,
Full of repose, full of replies.

I'll not reproach
The way that goes, my feet that stir.
Access, approach,
Art Thou, time, way and wayfarer.

—Alice Meynell.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Girls! Girls!! Clear Your Skin With Cuticura
Sample each (Soap, Ointment, Talcum) of Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass. Sold everywhere.

The next time you buy calomel ask for
Calotabs
The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.
Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE

Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.

Flowers of Quality

R. L. Christian & Co.

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocers

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES.

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Nick Bull's Market

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME.

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

XANTHINE

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Harmonies.

At her door Myra stopped incredulous. She could not have heard aright. Then Dick's penetrating whisper came again:

"She did, I tell you—I heard her on the stairs! Myra'll spoil it if she sees it—we've got to hide it."

Myra went into her room and locked the door. She had not been mistaken. Dick, whom she loved best of them all, and whose favorite she had always thought herself! Dick! She had a queer, stunned feeling, as if something in the world had stopped. Well, as soon as the other boys went—

It seemed ages before they tumbled down the stairs and went pommeling each other down the yard. Myra waited until she was sure they were not coming back; then she went up to Dick

"Dick," she said, "what is it that I'd spoil?"

Dick looked up, startled. "Why—er—I don't know what you're talking about, Myra."

"Yes, you do. I was on the stairs and I heard you tell Tom and Chris."

Dick reddened all over his freckles. "I—aw—that wasn't anything!" he protested.

"Yes, it was—to me. I want to know what I'd spoil."

"It was just a—sort of book-shelf that I made at school," Dick stammered uncomfortably.

"But how in the world could I spoil it?" Myra cried.

Dick squirmed, but did not answer.

"Haven't I been a good sport usually, Dick?" asked Myra.

Dick looked up eagerly. That was easy. "You bet you have!" he said.

"Well, then, I'm going to be now. And you've got to be, too. You're not if you're afraid to tell me. Now, then, one, two, three; go!"

It was hard work, but Dick tried his best.

"It—it isn't anything really, only—you know you sort of take the shine off things. Like—like that frilly blouse thingamajig that Lottie made that you said wasn't right somehow, and Lottie cried 'cause it was the first she'd ever made, and the paper dad chose for his den that you said wasn't the right tone, and things mother wears, and the chair Aunt Nell bought, and—and—oh, lots of things! And we like 'em till—till you spoil e'm."

"Suppose, Dick," Myra said, "that you take a chance on me. Suppose I try not to spoil things that way any more."

Dick plunged into his closet and emerged flushed and disheveled with his book-shelf.

"Say, you don't have to like it. I guess I can stand it. I guess it isn't anything extra, anyhow—the first a feller makes."

Myra examined it carefully; then she looked straight into Dick's anxious blue eyes.

"Do you suppose you could make me one like it for my room?"

"Honest?" Dick shouted.

"Honest!" said Myra.

When she was back in her room Myra looked round with a curious smile. The book-shelf would not "harmonize"—but there were deeper harmonies than those of line and color after all.

None of us are given permission to pick out our talents. But the ability to do hard work, which is quite as effective as ordinary talent, can be acquired by any one who is determined to possess it. There is no disgrace attached to not being able to sing or to being dull in mathematics, but it is disgraceful not to know how to work hard.—Lutheran.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

Leake Printing Co.

ENGRAVING, PRINTING, EMBOSSING.

Special attention to out-of-town orders. Samples sent upon request.

615 East Main Street, Richmond, Va.

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning

FEET

that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

IT PAYS

In a five weeks' canvass among the church members in one city, a subscription representative of the Southern Churchman earned in commissions and bonuses $186.25.

A young woman in a small community, by putting in an hour or two a day taking subscriptions for this paper, realized in a week $11.25.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER.

All summer hats reduced. $15.00 hats to $7.50; $10.00 hats to $5.00. Avail yourself of this opportunity and wear a pretty summer hat.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

WANTED — TWO SECOND-HAND wheel chairs; one for a crippled man, the other for a little girl twelve years old, who has permanent spinal trouble. Both live back in the mountains and are quite out of reach of any help except that supplied by the Church Mission. Persons having wheel chairs to dispose of can communicate with Miss Margaretta James, Deaconess in Charge, Holy Cross Mission, Batesville, Albemarle County, Va.

BOARDING.

GREER HOUSE, FOR STUDENTS AND Church women during the summer months. Reduced rates. Apply to Director, Greer House, 123 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

ROOM, BREAKFAST AND 6 O'CLOCK dinner for a small number of students, in a pretty home near the University of Virginia. Law students preferred. Address "L.," Progress Office, Charlottesville, Va.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A TEACHER FOR THREE children. Usual English branches and music. Address Mrs. J. C. Saunders, Premier, W. Va.

WANTED — A REFINED, EDUCATED lady, with bright disposition, not over forty-five years of age, as companion. Must understand knitting and fancy work, and must be a good reader. Address Mrs. Haw, 816 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va.

SITUATION WANTED.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant or matron in a school, or as chaperon in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, MIDdle-aged woman, capable of taking entire care of children, wants position as nurse for one or two little girls. Can sew. Address "S. L. H.," care of Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.

A LADY WITH EXPERIENCE IN teaching and the care of a home desires position as matron in school or college, or as governess in private family. Branches taught: Mathematics, English, French, Latin and Music. References given. Address Mrs. W. M. Cunningham, 860 Paxton Street, Danville, Va.

REFINED, CAPABLE WOMAN DESIRES engagement as managing housekeeper, house mother in school, or care or gentleman's home and children. References. Address "L. S.," care of Southern Churchman.

WANTED—AFTER OCTOBER 1ST, BY refined, capable woman, position as useful companion or housekeeper for lady. Address Mrs. H., care of Southern Churchman.

ORGANIST-CHOIRMASTER, GREAT EXperience, highest references furnished, wishes position in parish having good field for teaching. Address Organist, 4054 North Hermitage Avenue, Chicago.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

RESOLUTIONS.

At the regular meeting of the vestry of Pohick Church, Virginia, held July 4, 1921, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the vestry:

Whereas, on the 24th day of June, 1921, God in His infinite wisdom was pleased to take out of this world the soul of our beloved brother and fellow-vestryman, CORBIN THOMPSON, Senior Warden of this vestry; therefore be it resolved.

First. That in the death of Brother Thompson, Pohick Church has sustained the loss of one of its most faithful members, and the vestry a loss which is well-nigh irreparable. Since his first affiliation, extend to the bereaved family our Corbin Thompson has ever been its true and trusted friend, and for a number of years served as its Senior Warden with efficiency and honor.

Second. That we, the vestry of Pohick Church, on behalf of the entire congregation, extxend to the bereaved family our deepest sympathy in this their hour of trial.

Third. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family of Brother Thompson, that they be recorded on the Church register, and a copy be sent the Southern Churchman for publication.

J. P. H. MASON, SR.,
J. P. H. MASON, JR.,
E. H. ALLEN,
Committee.

IN MEMORIAM.

As the sun at eventide gently sinks into the arms of twilight, so the spirit of ELIZA WALLER, wife of the late James W. Pegram, of Richmond, Va., entered into rest on July 13, 1921.

Mrs. Pegram was the eldest daughter of Dr. George Blacknall, of the United States and Confederate Navies, and Emma Blow, his wife, of Norfolk, Va. She is survived by her son, Robert Pegram, and three daughters—Mrs. Arthur Scrivenor, Miss E. W. Pegram and Mrs. Rufus Johnson, U. S. N.

In so limited a space it would appear unnecessary to chronicle more fully the established facts of birth and environment, but by the white searchlight of truth one must recognize a character so noble and a personality so gifted.

With great poise, dignity and much unconscious charm, she embraced these qualities to a marked degree, representing a traditional type "of the old regime." modesty and retirement being so accentuated that only a privileged few were aware of her brilliant capabilities.

"Her home was her castle"; here she reigned supreme in the hearts of husband and family, for like the Roman matron of history, "her children were her jewels."

During her lifetime three cruel wars passed over her devoted head. Many losses and sorrows were hers, as needs must be to those who linger on Life's highway, but all were met with characteristic bravery and Christian resignation, while the sun of her life fading and set, reflecting a beautiful afterglow of peace and promise.

"The golden evening brightens in the west,
Soon to the faithful warrior cometh rest,
Sweet is the calm of Paradise the blest,
"Alleluia."

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, that this auxiliary records upon its minutes its sense of deep loss in the death of MRS. EDITH LOGAN HURT, beloved wife of Mr. Thomas L. Hurt. Died on Sunday, May 29, 1921. She was a communicant of St. Paul's Church, Kenbridge, Va., and her devoted love of the church was the predominating characteristic of her life and an inspiration to others. She had kept the faith in the truest, deepest and fullest sense, and a heavenly crown awaited her.

MRS. J. R. ADAMS,
MRS. NAT MATTHEWS.
St. Paul's and St. John's Auxiliary, Kenbridge, Va.

Peace.

How shall I quiet my heart? How shall I keep it still?
How shall I hush its tremulous start at tidings of good or ill?
How shall I gather and hold contentment and peace and rest,
Wrapping their sweetness, fold on fold, over my troubled breast?

The Spirit of God is still, and gentle and mild and sweet,
What time His omnipotent, glorious will guideth the worlds at His feet;
Controlling all lesser things, this turbulent heart of mine,
He keepeth us under His folded wings in a peace serene—divine.

So shall I quiet my heart, so shall I keep it still,
So shall I hush its tremulous start at tidings of good or ill;
So shall I silence my soul with a peacefulness deep and broad,
So shall I gather Divine control in the infinite quiet of God.

—Selected.

Nothing is gained in the long run, and everything is in danger of being lost, by that amiable spirit of concession which, fearing to seem disputatious or controversial, refrains from the calm, temperate, but clear and definite statement of the Church and her position in the world, as something in a very real sense let down out of heaven, not a merely human association, but rather a divine and supernatural organism, charged with supernatural powers, the steward of those mysteries of the kingdom which, like the secret of the divine life, whether in the soul of man or in the heart of Christ, is hid with Christ in God. As such, the Church is not a creature of change, not an institution of the hour. It belongs to that realm of which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews writes, when he says: "And this word, 'yet once more,' signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain."—Bishop H. C. Potter.

Personal Notes

Mrs. R. R. Phelps, teacher of the Men's Bible Class in St. Paul's Church, Berkley, was to have been sent to the Summer School in Charlottesville by the class. She has suffered a complete breakdown and will not be able to go. Instead, she must go to a higher climate and take an entire rest in order to regain her strength.

On June 22d, Miss Virginia O. Callender, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. William E. Callender (secretary of the Seamen's Institute of America), was united in marriage to Mr. James B. Johnston, in Christ Church, Norfolk, Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker officiating, assisted by Rev. F. C. Steinmetz.

Rev. H. H. Covington, of St. Paul's, Norfolk, was seriously injured a month ago. While he was standing in front of his car in the garage, the car accidentally started and crushed him against the wall. He is about again, however.

The Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, rector of Trinity Church, Williamsport, Pa., will conduct service and preach at St. Thomas' Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-third Street, New York, on the first two Sundays in August, the 7th and 14th. His address between those two dates will be 68 Beverly Road, Kew Gardens, Long Island, N. Y. Tel., Richmond Hill 7190.

Mrs. George Willing, who for years was active in charitable and welfare work in Philadelphia, died July 16 at her home in Chestnut Hill, after a brief illness. She was the daughter of the late Dr. Edward Shippen, and was a member of St. Paul's Church, Chestnut Hill, in the work of which she was active for a long time.

The Rev. William D. Gernand has accepted the call to the rectorship of the House of Prayer, Branchtown, and will succeed the Rev. Henry G. G. Vincent, who was run down and killed by a motor car May 3. Mr. Gernand is a native of Philadelphia, and was graduated from the North East High School and from Temple University. Later he took post-graduate courses at Trinity College and the Philadelphia Divinity School. He was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Rhinelander in 1912.

Ordination.

In St. Paul's Mission Church, Eagle, Alaska, on Tuesday, June 21, 1921, Burgess Wood Gaither was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Alaska, the Rev. E. J. Randall, rector of St. Barnabas' Church, Chicago, Ill., presenting the candidate.

In St. Stephen's Church, Fort Yukon, Alaska, on Sunday, June 26, 1921, Grafton Burke, M. D., was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Alaska, the Rev. E. J. Randall presenting the candidate.

Consent to Consecration.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Alabama on the 18th, unanimous consent was given to the consecration of Dr. Herbert Shipman to be Bishop Suffragan of New York.

E. A. PENICK.

Tuscaloosa, Ala., July 22, 1921.

Imagination.

"Keep this forever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of thy people, and prepare their heart unto thee."—1 Chron. 29:18.

This is a king's prayer for his people, for their continuance in a pure religious thought and habit. It is of peculiar interest to note how much the Bible, as a book, emphasizes the heart element in religion: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he"; "Out of the heart are the issues of life"; "With the heart man believeth." Scattered through Old and New Testaments, the writers give peculiar distinction to the heart in the practice of the religious life. We commonly accept the heart as the seat of the emotions and of the affections, hence it is the inspiration of the imagination, and the imagination plays a conspicuous part in the religious thought and life of men and women the world over. It is curious, again, to note that the dominant religious systems of the world have proceeded from the Orient, the land of imagination, and then have made the greatest headway with peoples whose lives were most responsive to those things that appeal to the heart. We have repeatedly heard men say that they could not accept a religious faith unless it made its appeal to their heads; in other words, what they sought was to work out their religious faith through mental processes, very largely, as some mathematical problem is worked out.

The man who eliminates the imagination and the heart element from his religious life has closed the avenues of approach to his soul and rendered religion an impossible thing. We remember that Frederick Robertson, the greatest preacher in England for over a century, declared that no amount of argument in the Christian pulpit, in his judgment, had ever conduced to the saving of a soul. I believe profoundly that my mind has come to co-operate with my heart and my imagination in my religious life, but I am also quite clear in my conviction that my mind, apart from my heart and imagination, is utterly incapable of receiving the highest impression of religion. Jesus Christ makes His appeal; there can be no question about it, to the heart and to the imagination. I can conceive of Him as the greatest figure in human history, and my mind can accord Him the transcendant place as a religious teacher and philosopher. Among all ligion, He stands pre-eminent. No one disputes this. Even the great German philosopher, Richter, declared that with His pierced hand He lifted the gates of empire from their hinges and turned the streams of centuries from their courses. But all this conception of Him will not make Renan, the brilliant Frenchman, accept the Man of Nazareth as his own personal Master and Saviour. It is the winsome person of Christ, apart from all His teachings, the living exemplar of the highest teachings that have been brought to men, the gentle, ministering, self-effacing Christ, that makes the irresistible appeal to our inmost consciousness. I may be bewildered by His teachings and confounded and confused by the miraculous element in His life, but all the processes of reason, apart from the co-operation of the heart, are ineffective to give Him place in the inner shrine of my soul, and to make me cry out before Him, "My Lord and my God." After all, it is incomprehensible that the Divine should reduce Himself in the compass of the human mind, rather than to the limitless embrace of the human heart. You have been going on your way from year to year, saying to yourself, "Some day I will be able to understand all this teaching; some day I will be able to be a Christian disciple, like other folk"; but I venture to say to you that if that "some day" is to be determined by the mere conviction of your mind, when this Jesus of Nazareth shall lay His claim upon your purely intellectual life, it is improbable that you will ever be able to receive Him for what He claims Himself to be. You cannot reason out to your own consciousness your affections; no more can you reason out to your consciousness the full and complete meaning of this Divine life as it related to you personally. The finest interpreter of the Master-life in the New Testament is the great-hearted John—different from all other recitals of this Master-life is his gospel. He did not seek to interpret to men the physical life of the Master, nor to give a synopsis of His daily tasks; he left this to others more capable than himself. What he sought to do was to reveal to the human heart the Divine Master of men. It was this same Christ Who declared that only they who became as little children could enter the kingdom of heaven, and what did he mean? Was it not that the child was controlled by the imagination, with the heart the dominant factor in his life, loving, trusting, confident, unfailing?—Rev. Dr. Freeman.

The Consciousness of God.

I remember—for I have had the unspeakable joy of having been born and bred in a minister's family—I remember one occasion which made a very profound impression upon me when I was a lad, in a company of gentlemen where my father was present, and where I happened to be, unobserved. One of the gentlemen, in a moment of excitement, uttered an oath, and then, his eyes resting upon my father, he said with evident sincerity: "Dr. Wilson, I beg your pardon; I did not notice that you were present." "Oh," said my father, "you mistake, sir; it is not to me that you owe the apology." I doubt if any other one remark ever entered quite so straight to the quick in me as that did, the consciousness that my father, taken by surprise, was at once so conscious that he was not the person offended that he should so naturally call the attention of the man who had uttered the oath to what was the simple fact, that the offense was not to him, but to his Master. It was exactly as if a disrespectful word had been spoken of the President of the United States in the presence of an Ambassador of the United States; the apology would be due not to him, but to his government. And if ministers could always so contrive it that in their presence the presence of God was manifest, the whole problem of the ministry would be solved, and evangelization would be irresistible.—Woodrow Wilson.

The Flower's Friend.

April carries in her lap
All the flowers of spring;
Fragrant flowers that always wake
When the robins sing.

April knows just what to do;
Coaxes sun and rain.
At her bidding they prepare
Mother Earth again.

To make places where the flowers
Can their beauty show.
First a sunbeam, then a shower
Makes them bloom, you know.

—Helen M. Richardson, in Exchange.

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

O. Luetke's Art Works
Church Furnishings
IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886 328-332 7th Ave. New York

R. GEISSLER, INC.
NEW YORK
56 W. 8. STREET.
CHURCH
FURNISHINGS
WINDOWS — TABLETS
FABRICS — EMBROIDERIES
MEMORIALS

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 843

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bond

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street
Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd
Richmond, Va.

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

The Evangelical Education Society
Of the Protestant Episcopal Church

Office: The Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia

AIDS STUDENTS FOR THE MINISTRY AND DISTRIBUTES EVANGELICAL LITERATURE

President: WILLIAM S. HARVEY, ESQ.

Active Vice-President: The Rt. Rev. THOMAS J. GARLAND, D. D.

General Counsel HAROLD GOODWIN, Esq. Treasurer ALFRED LEE, Esq. General Secretary Rev. S. LORD GILBERSON, M A

FORM OF BEQUEST

I give and bequeath to "THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH," incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania, the first Monday in November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, ———— dollars, or ———— real estate, to be used for the general purpose of the Society.

To Mothers

And all Friends of Children:

What will you read to your boys and girls this summer to give them a religious message they will love?

Thousands have found the answer in

Sunny Windows

By W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D.

Author of "The Children's Year."

The first edition is already exhausted, and the second is on the press.

CLOTH, $1.25 NET

For Sale by

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 6, 1921. No. 32.

MIDSUMMER SCHOOL NUMBER

CHAPEL OF THE HOLY COMFORTER

Du Bose Memorial Training School

MONTEAGLE, TENN.

EDUCATIONAL

Church Schools in the Diocese of Virginia, Inc.

RT. REV. WM. C. BROWN, D. D., President.

FOR BOYS:

ST. CHRISTOPHER'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Boarding and Day School. Separate Lower School for smaller boys. 6 bldgs., 15 acres of grounds and athletic fields. Small classes. Staff of 10 college graduates. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $650 Eleventh session begins Sept. 21, 1921.

Catalogue from REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, Ph. D., Headmaster.

CHRIST CHURCH SCHOOL
Middlesex County, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater Virginia. 3 bldgs., 100 acre farm. Supervised boating, bathing, fishing. Home influences. Ready accessibility. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from REV. F. E. WARREN, Rector, Marl. P. O., Va.

FOR GIRLS:

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Day School (Boarding department planned for 1922). From Montessori through college preparatory courses, etc. 5 bldgs., 8 acre playground. Emphasis on healthy outdoor life. Catalogue from MISS ROSALIE HAXALL NOLAND, B. A., Principal.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL
Charlottesville, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Piedmont, Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. From primary through college preparatory courses. Also music, art and general courses. Boarding department limited to 40 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $500. Twelth session begins Sept. 21, 1921. Catalogue from MISS EMMA S. YERBY, Principal.

ST. MARGARET'S SCHOOL
Tappahannock, Essex County, Va.

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater, Virginia. Beautiful location on Rappahannock River. 6 acres, central building antebellum home remodeled, with 2 new wings. All modern conveniences. From primary, through college preparatory courses. Also music and general courses. Boarding department limited to 32 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from MISS BERTHA A. LATANE, B. A., Principal.

Gifts and bequests for equipment, enlargement, scholarships, and endowment, requested. Address communications to REV. E. L. WOODWARD, M. D., Dean, 400 O'd Dominion Trust Bldg., Richmond, Va.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

FASSIFERN SCHOOL, FOR GIRLS
Hendersonville, N. C.

Situated in the beautiful mountain country. College preparatory and general high school courses. Lower school for grades below high school. Music, Art, Athletics, Home Economics. Riding lessons under trained teacher. MISS KATE C. SHIPP, Principal.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-third session opens September 22, 1920.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean,
Petersburg, Va.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Controversy in religious matters pays no spiritual dividends.

Undertake to keep the Ten Commandments, and you will soon find out that God is their maker.

Though downward tends the slope
The twilit skies above!
Yet all before is hope,
For all behind is love.
—Bishop B. D. Tucker.

GUNSTON HALL

A Select Washington School for Girls.

Highest standards in general, college preparatory and graduate courses. Not a finishing school, but an educational institution founded on soundest principles. Its aim is to set high ideals, stimulate a desire for further knowledge and relate its students to their future life and its social contacts.

For Illustrated Catalogue address

MRS. BEVERLEY R. MASON, Principal.
1906 Florida Ave., Washington, D. C.

(U. S. Destroyer in distance)
R. O. T. C. and NAVAL UNITS

Established 1867. Prepares for college and business life. Military training by Army officers. 8 Naval cutters, high-powered launch for Naval unit. Sea trips on U. S. war vessels. $70,000 improvements last year. Mild climate permits outdoor sports the year round. Unique training in carefulness and the value of money. Broader training than public schools. Separate School for smaller boys. Catalog.

REV. WALTER MITCHELL, D. D., Rector
Box A Charleston, S. C.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLESTOWN, W. VA

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes. Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal.
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Opens Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

HOLDERNESS SCHOOL for Boys

Five buildings. 20 acres. Prepares for Colleges and Technical Schools. Ranks with highest grade schools of New England, yet by reason of endowment the tuition is moderate. Modern gymnasium. Skating. All winter sports. 41st year.

REV. LORIN WEBSTER, L. H. D., Rector, Plymouth, N. H.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Notable record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH President

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

EDUCATIONAL

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIDLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey. Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

Posse Normal School for Gymnastics

Massachusetts, Boston, 779 Beacon Street. 33d year. New building. Courses of one, two and three years. Present conditions have created great demand for our graduates. Courses in Medical Gymnastics and Playgrounds. Summer Camp. Apply to the Secretary.

POTOMAC UNIVERSITY

offers for the eighteenth year systematic instruction by correspondence.

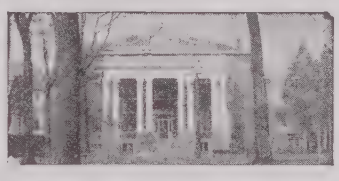
College of Liberal Arts,
School of Theology,
The Graduate School.
Degrees Granted.

For catalogue, address
1881 Third Street, N. W.,
Washington, D. C.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.
Jessie C. McDonald, M. S., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.



A Girls' School with a Religious Atmosphere

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Pres. Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

A School which offers a thorough education at a moderate cost. Its location, on main line Southern R. R., is healthful and beautiful; the modern buildings are excellently equipped and surrounded by a ten-acre campus. The School maintains a gymnasium, with provision for outdoor athletics.

The curriculum embraces College Preparatory and Business Courses, Literary, Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all Colleges. Catalogue and views may be obtained by addressing ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., Principal, Box 13, Chatham, Va.

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 25-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
Box 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

Medical College of Virginia

(State Institution)

MEDICINE DENTISTRY PHARMACY

New buildings—Well equipped laboratories under the direction of full-time competent teachers.

The Memorial Hospital, Dooley Hospital and St. Philip Hospital are owned and controlled by the Medical College of Virginia and offer every facility for thorough clinical training. Staffs composed of the faculty of the College. Additional clinical facilities are offered through the Virginia Hospital, City Home, City Jail, etc.

For full information and catalogue, address

J. R. McCAULEY, Secretary, RICHMOND, VA.

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university. Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls

1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.

Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

Sweet Briar College

SWEET BRIAR, VA. STANDARD FOUR-YEAR COLLEGE COURSES

Students received on certificate and by examination. Unexcelled climate, out-of-door sports all year.

For catalogue and views, address the Registrar, Box 19.

EMILIE WATTS McVEA, A. M., LITT. D., PRESIDENT

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY

53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre campus and 8,000 acres added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics. R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

STUART HALL

STAUNTON, VA.

1843 1920

FORMERLY VIRGINIA FEMALE INSTITUTE

Oldest girls' school in Virginia—Episcopal. Location healthful and beautiful. General and college preparatory courses. Loyal alumnae find here for their daughters the familiar atmosphere of culture and refinement, combined with modern equipment and teaching methods. Supervised outdoor sports. For catalogue, address MRS. H. N. HILLS A. B., Box P.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE

708 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.

In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

The Divinity School of the Protestan Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter i 1862.

Special students admitted. Privileg of attending course of special study a the University of Pennsylvania.

For information address the Rev George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5001 Woodland Avenue.

WHEN WRITING OUR ADVERTISERS PLEASE MENTION THIS PUBLICATION

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President — C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President — R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Tr as
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State.
Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

There Are

many lines of business that we don't attempt to do, but we do Administer Estates and act as Trustee when called upon to do so.

It is our business, and therefore we are frequently called upon to act as executor or administrator, and trustee.

Our officers can and will give helpful suggestion along these lines.
Interviews are confidential and without charge.

As to drawing your will, see your attorney or ours.

Virginia Trust Company

The Safe Executor
Richmond, Va.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 6, 1921. No. 32.

A CRUCIAL TEST OF CHRISTIAN LIBERTY

"Nothing more nearly touches the welfare and security of the average citizen than his sense that he can rely on the certain and prompt administration of justice. Law holds the community together. Law is respected and supported when it is trusted as the shield of innocence and the impartial guardian of every private civil right. Law sets for all a moral standard which helps to maintain a like standard in the breast of each individual. But if the law be dishonestly administered, the salt has lost its savour; if it be weakly or fitfully enforced, the guarantees of order fail. * * * If the lamp of justice goes out in darkness, how great is that darkness!"

Thus Viscount Bryce has written in his very notable last book, "Modern Democracies." Here and elsewhere in its pages he has expressed with grave and noble eloquence the solemn responsibility of free governments. Upon moral foundations only can democracy endure. Unless there is honor, fairness and self-control among the people, and unless these are reflected in all the administration of law, the mighty experiment of democratic government must fail; and "if the lamp of justice goes out in darkness, how great is that darkness!"

Recently there has happened in one of our States something which emphasizes in ominous fashion the warning which Viscount Bryce's words imply. It is an incident so disruptive of law and order, so flagrant in its gross offense against every ideal of liberty, that the conscience of all Christian people must be shocked to consider it, and the will of all Christian people ought to be mobilized to meet the menace which it presents. The situation can best be described in the statement which has been sent out by the Publicity Department of our Church headquarters in New York. It consists of a letter from Bishop Cameron Mann, of Southern Florida, and we print it here in full:

"In response to the request of the Executive Secretary of the department, I send a statement of the recent deplorable event so deeply affecting the work of the Church among the colored people of the city of Miami and along the whole east coast of Southern Florida.

"I shall be as brief as possible, and will endeavor to simply state the facts without comment.

"In February, 1918, I received the Rev. P. Sidney Irwin, priest, from the Diocese of Connecticut, and appointed him as Archdeacon in charge of the colored missions along the east coast of this district, with headquarters in Miami. He had seven missions at first, to which he added two or three more later. My selection of Mr. Irwin for this work was largely due to the fact that he had for many years been a missionary to the colored people in the Bahamas and consequently knew their characteristics. And by far the greater number of negroes along our east coast come from the Bahamas. In fact, many of them were personally known to Mr. Irwin.

"From its beginning to its end Mr. Irwin's work was most satisfactory to me. He was indefatigable in his ministrations, usually holding five or six services each Sunday, and very many during the week. Under him the congregations increased, buildings were improved, and three new churches were erected.

"I may state here that Mr. Irwin is a gentleman, a scholar, a man of fine personal character, a man of utmost zeal, and a man of most kindly manner. I may add that he is by birth and early education an Irishman, and served in the Irish Church as a clergyman.

"The conditions of his work along the east coast were difficult. There is much jealousy and hostility between the native American negro and the immigrants from the Bahamas. There is the frequent suspicion and criticism on the part of the other colored churches. There is of course the difficulty created by the fact that a great share of the people are very ignorant, and there is the anger provoked by necessary enforcement of Church discipline in cases of immorality.

"It therefore goes without saying that there is all along more or less of disturbance in these colored missions.

"But outside of all this is the fact that by the lower class of white people the spectacle of a white clergyman laboring among the colored folk is a displeasing one. And if he stands forth as a champion of the rights of those under his charge, he immediately provokes bitter criticism.

"Nearly two years ago I received a complaint from certain white people in Miami, charging Archdeacon Irwin with disloyalty and with teachings calculated to create disturbance amongst the colored people.

"I immediately went to Miami and made an investigation, and found not one of the charges supported by any proof. The Archdeacon was charged with being a member of a certain society which it was proved he had denounced. He was charged with opposition to the public schools, and it was shown that he had given up the parochial school in Miami in order that the colored children might attend the public school in Miami and so become better Americanized. I repeat that not one of the accusations made against him was substantiated.

"I supposed that the matter was settled forever. It now seems that notwithstanding this investigation, the same notions concerning him and his work remained in the minds of some people.

"Perhaps this is as good a place as any for me to declare that Archdeacon Irwin does not hold to what is called social or political equality for the negro in the United States. He has never taught it. On the contrary, he has incurred disfavor with some of the negroes themselves by his opposition to the societies and movements which had it as their object.

"Of course I cannot say that he has never made statements which might have been misinterpreted as teaching this doctrine. I can only say that I have never heard him make any such statement, nor have I met anybody else who has.

"On the whole, he has gone steadily along, attending to the needs of his own flock and bravely standing out for justice to them in cases where he thought they were not getting it.

"That in this latter attitude he has offended some white people is, I suppose, certain.

"Also, it is certain that some people in his congregation have been greatly offended by his actions in disciplinary matters and have undertaken to do him all the harm they could.

"Last Sunday night, when he was returning home from his evening service, he was seized by a band of ruffians, bound and gagged, carried into the woods, stripped and beaten with a leather strap, tarred and feathered, and then brought back into the city and rolled out on the street. His captors told him that this was done because he had advocated negro equality and inter-marriage of the races.

"Monday morning I received a telegram from the Rev. R. T. Phillips, rector of Trinity Church, Miami, telling me what had happened. I took the train at once and arrived in Miami early Tuesday morning. With Mr. Phillips I saw the Deputy Sheriff, the editor of the leading Miami paper, the Circuit Judge and the Mayor of the city.

"The editor of the Tampa Tribune, after hearing my statement, requested me to dictate a similar one for the press. I did so, and it appeared in the afternoon paper of that day and the morning paper of the next—too late, however, to be of much use. It was dictated in great haste, and is, of course, incomplete, but I enclose a copy.

"I also appeared before the grand jury at their summons and made a statement to them about Archdeacon Irwin's work, which was heard with utmost courtesy and attention.

"Of course, I saw the Archdeacon himself, and found him bearing up most bravely. He spoke without excitement and without rancor. He denied having ever advanced such ideas as those for which he was ostensibly assaulted.

"The Archdeacon was unable to describe any one of the ruffians who had assaulted him. The city authorities told me that as yet they had no clue. They asserted their intention of following the matter up.

"About the middle of the afternoon, while I was consulting with the Mayor and the Circuit Judge, the Commander of the Local Post for the American Legion came in and stated that he had reliable information that if Archdeacon Irwin remained in the city he would be lynched, and that in all probability the church property would be burned and numerous lives lost. He therefore asked that Archdeacon Irwin should agree to leave the city that afternoon.

"The Mayor said that he could furnish police protection for that night, and in one sense for an indefinite period, but that in his opinion this was not desirable. The consensus of himself and the other representatives of Miami present was that Archdeacon Irwin would never be safe in that city, and that much damage to life and property would result from his presence there.

"In view of this opinion, Archdeacon Irwin said he would go. I agreed with him that this was the only thing to be done.

"I asked the men present what the city of Miami would do in the way of furnishing some pecuniary aid to this man whom it was deporting thus hastily. To this there was no response. I therefore gave my note at the bank for five hundred dollars, and so furnished him with the necessary money for his journey. He and his daughter departed on the late afternoon train."

(Signed) CAMERON MANN,
Bishop of Southern Florida.

From this account it would seem that the Bishop has done all which his judgment made him feel was possible to do in Mr. Irwin's defense. By his presence and by his words he has supported him. Yet, as the final result, the Bishop concurs in the opinion of the Mayor and other representatives of the city of Miami, that "Archdeacon Irwin would never be safe in that city; that much damage to life and property would result from his presence there," and the Bishop agrees "that the only thing to be done" was for Archdeacon Irwin to leave the city, not to return. Nor was there any response to his request that the city of Miami should furnish some pecuniary aid to this resident of the city, who, contrary to every principle of law and order, was being forced from it.

These things being so, the stark fact stands out that the Bishop felt himself so hopeless of any effective power on the part of the constituted authorities of this American city to restrain the passions of anonymous mobs directed without cause or reason against an innocent citizen, that, through the ugly compulsion of these facts, he felt it necessary to urge an innocent man to withdraw from the place where he had been outraged. Dealing, as he was, with the actual situation, we can understand the Bishop's advice. He felt, in a measure, responsible for Mr. Irwin's safety. He was obliged to take that into account. Abstract considerations had to give way for the moment to the matter of his personal solicitude for the man. But it would be a dreadful thing if the matter stops at that point. It is inconceivable that in the face of the lawlessness of a mob the Church should strike its flag and surrender. It is inconceivable that the constituted authorities of the State of Florida should allow the most fundamental securities of liberty thus to be insulted and set at defiance.

Surely no American citizen who loves either the State or the Church can rest content until the city of Miami has so prosecuted and punished the mob which assaulted Mr. Irwin, that such an outrage as was committed against him should not again be possible, and that it should again be safe for such a man as he to resume his interrupted work. In this matter, the particular city of Miami represents more than its individual self. It becomes a symbol of the deepest values and the most crucial destinies of America. If we have arrived at a point in our national life when the most essential rights of a citizen can be brutally see at naught, and the community find itself powerless to correct the wrong; if we have reached a point where any man who courageously speaks out that which an ignorant mob disapproves can be driven from a city, and that city, and the State which includes it, show no effective revolt of public conscience, then the very foundations of popular government are imperiled. If this be so, it means that American ideals are capitulating to anarchy. But we do not believe that this is so. We trust that Bishop Mann, with the entire influence of our whole Church behind him, will lay the facts before the Governor of Florida, as well as local authorities, and that they, with him, will never rest until the blot upon the name of a State and of a nation is removed.

This, of course, is not a matter which concerns our particular Church alone. It is vital to the interest of all Christian people. What could be more supine upon the part of the Church than to admit that a Christian spokesman may be driven out of an American community through failure of the law to protect him in his legitimate ministry What greater violation could there be to the freedom of the truth? What more abject repudiation of any genuine belief in a Kingdom of God built among the affairs of earth?

In face of such a situation as this, the humiliating divisions of Christendom appear the more calamitous. How pitifully we bicker about the mint and anise and cummin of our ecclesiastical non-essentials, and fail thereby to be of one mind before a fact which challenges the funda-mentals of all our faith! We in our own communion have been guilty too many times of discouraging by a lukewarm allegiance the great federated agencies of Christians which would help us to mobilize our united power. Only grudgingly, for example, have we allied ourselves with the work of the Federal Council of Churches, the Social Service Department of which would be the natural agency whereby the conscience of the great body of Christians in this country might make itself heard in such a matter as this which we are discussing. But here, if ever, is a call that ought to make all churches forget small disagreements, to confront an issue which is overwhelming in importance. Upon the Presiding Bishop and Council of our Church rests the responsibility to see to it that the issue which is created by Archdeacon Irwin's case shall be laid before the Christian conscience of this nation. With full expectation of their sympathy and good will, the representatives of our Church ought to call upon the authorities of Miami and of Florida to establish the law which has been set at naught. They should not rest until the Christian mind and conscience of America are so focussed upon this case as to assure the vindication of that justice and liberty which are essential equally to Christian progress and to the security of any ordered State.

CHURCH SCHOOLS IN THE DIOCESE OF VIRGINIA

By the Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, M. D. Dean

There can be no question that the Church generally is awakening to the strategic importance of religious education in her program of advance. In the Episcopal Church, as in all other churches, a new and intensive emphasis is being placed upon schools in which definite Church training is given. Existing Church schools are being overcrowded; new ones are springing up. The attenuation of religious teaching in the home and in the secular school is stirring widely the conscience of Christian people to prepare hot-beds, as it were, of wholesome religious as well as secular training, in which the choicest seed-corn of the Church of the future may grow. And so almost every Diocese has its educational institutions—here for the wealthy, there for the well-to-do, again for the indigent, or orphan, or mountain child, or negro, or alien. These all have their due place, but the largest problem of all is the one that is in danger of greatest neglect. This is the problem of schools, not for a select few only, nor for a specialized need, but for the normal needs of our parishes and dioceses as a whole. To this problem the Diocese of Virginia is addressing herself, by the establishment of a system of Church schools, located at widely different points throughout the Diocese, co-ordinated under one diocesan administration, and aiming to give the best educational opportunity to the most promising boys and girls of all her parishes, at costs which will be within the reach of the normal family resources. Such a system of schools marks a new departure in the educational history of the Church, and the outcome will be of immeasurable influence not only within this Diocese, but far beyond its bounds.

Inception of the Plan.

The inception of the plan dates back to the early spring of 1919, shortly before the Nation-Wide Campaign became an active program of the Church. In the Bishop's annual address to the Diocesan Council of 1919 reference was made to the plan, and among the Standing Committees of that Council was one on Church schools, of which the writer was made chairman.

During the following summer the three-year budget of the Nation-Wide Campaign was formulated for the Diocese, and foremost in the diocesan quota of that budget was placed the program for acquiring or establishing five Church schools to meet the varying needs of the Diocese. The $300,000 first allocated in this three-year budget was later reduced to $200,000 in the general scaling of the budget which proved necessary. Gifts to individual schools of the system from private sources have augmented this fund by about $25,000. Upon such a slender basis of financial backing to attempt to establish a system of five Church schools of real efficiency seems almost chimerical at first thought. The sum of $225,000 is hardly adequate to equip one such school for its full-growth service, and quite as much or more will be needed for each school's endowment before it will be meeting in full measure its opportunity of service. Thus the task of the future from a financial standpoint is formidable enough. Yet those in closest touch with the movement, including many trained educators and shrewd business men of Christian faith and vision, have never been dismayed, but gain in confidence as the situation develops.

Virginia led the general Church not only in the boldness with which she formulated her budget for the first three-year period of the Nation-Wide Campaign, but also in the completeness and punctuality with which she has since met it. She means to lead the Church also in this systematized program of Church school education.

The Diocesan Council of 1920 approved the plans that had been maturing since the previous Council, and authorized the establishment of a corporation, under the laws of Virginia, to be known as "Church Schools in the Diocese of Virginia." By its charter this corporation operates under a board of twenty-five trustees—the Bishop, five clergy and nineteen laymen, representative of all parts of the Diocese. The Diocesan Council nominates for vacancies which may occur on the Board of Trustees, and thus the school corporation is organically related to the Diocese and is its servant.

Purchase Three Schools.

An early survey of the Diocese with a view to this Church school program had showed three schools of excellent location and honorable history which could be acquired by the Diocese at just about half the replacement value of their properties and equipment. The first step of the new corporation, under due authorization of the Diocesan Council, was to consummate the purchase of these three schools at a total cost of $120,000, and to authorize repairs and improvements, and the purchase of additional properties of great advantage to the school sites, which brought the total expenditure for the three schools not far below $200,000, part of the cost being carried on mortgage maturing in a term of years. The Chamberlayne and Virginia Randolph Ellett Schools at Westhampton, Richmond, were renamed, in the Church school system, St. Christopher's and St. Catherine's, respectively; and St. Anne's School, Charlottesville, Va., retained the same name, but became organically a Church school.

This provided the Church with two well-established schools of the highest standing at the diocesan centre at Richmond, and one in the western portion of the Diocese at Charlottesville. The Tidewater, or eastern section of the Diocese, still remained to be provided for. Here, where the need for schools of outstanding merit was a crying one, there were absolutely no schools of a character or location to justify the Diocese taking them over. After a careful survey of the various locations recommended for the schools, extending over months, exceptionally fine sites were purchased at Tappahannock, and near Urbanna, both sites being on the southern bank of the beautiful Rappahannock River, near the centre of the Tidewater section of the Diocese, yet accessible to the rest of the Diocese also. So eager were the good people of these communities to have the Church schools located in their midst that a very considerable portion of the cost of the properties acquired was met by local subscription. These schools are St. Margaret's at Tappahannock, and Christchurch School near Urbanna, the latter on property adjoining the historic colonial church of 1674, from which the school takes its name. Through these two schools the Episcopal Church will inaugurate her first serious effort to reclaim her position of educational prestige and leadership in this old colonial section of the Diocese. We should not forget, sad lesson though it is, that William and Mary College in Tidewater Virginia was once a flourishing Church educational institution, now lost to the Church, perhaps forever.

The limits of allotted space are reached. Data of further interest about the five schools is presented in the standard advertisement which will hereafter always appear in the Southern Churchman, and in more detail in the school catalogues which will be sent upon request.

It is important, however, to say before closing that the problem of greatest difficulty, challenging the utmost effort of consecrated service, is not the material building up of the Church school system, not the establishment therein of high standards of scholarship and culture, but the permeating of the schools through and through, teaching staff and pupils alike, with the exalted idealism of Christian devotion in life and service, which alone can make the dry bones of a largely materialized civilization live again. For a Church school to fail here means that it has no right to exist as such. For it to succeed here means that its contribution to Church and nation and to those who pass through its walls is beyond all price.

WORK OF THE CHURCH AMONG VARIOUS FOREIGN BORN AMERICANS

Report of the Department of Missions and Church Extension

Welsh: The Welsh immigrants, a goodly proportion of whom were brought up as Anglicans, have long felt that the Church has neglected them and have left the Church for either other churches or irreligion. The Rev. Hugh David Jones, who was appointed as assistant in the division, has besides his other duties held many services in the Welsh language, of which the Welsh are particularly tenacious, and has been able to influence the Welsh papers in America and has well accomplished the object of his appointment, namely, to establish a new and friendly feeling among the Welsh in America towards the Church. He is now ready to take up parish work as soon as opportunity affords. Welsh people responded well to his efforts and are turning again towards our Church in the parishes, and the whole tone of the Welsh press has been changed. All this is having a far-reaching effect.

Scandinavian: Dr. Hammarskold, as dean of the Scandinavian Association, and the Rev. Philip Broburg, as associate dean in the Mid-West, working under the division, have done a far-reaching work. The purpose and scope of the Scandinavian Association is to minister to the unchurched masses of Swedes, Norwegians, Danes and Finns; namely, at least 2,000,000 of the 4,000,000 residing in this country. An un-American antagonism and unfraternal attitude (Swedish-American Lutheran bodies) makes our work much more difficult than is generally realized. "Even the present Archbishop of Uppsala has been charged with 'conspiracy against the true doctrine,' and 'attempts to use his high office in the interest of a Romanizing Anglicanism which aims to undo the results of the Reformation.'" Dr. Hammarskold further writes: "The department has already done much to help me and my coworkers meet this situation. Our conferences have convinced many denominational ministers and their congregations that the inclusive policy of our Church is the only one that will save the great majority of Scandinavian citizens from religious disintegration. The distribution of enlightening literature and circular letters is bearing good fruit. This is shown by several requests for clergymen able to minister acceptably to both English and Scandinavian speaking congregations." We need new workers.

A large number of parishes have been visited by the two deans, at the request of the rectors, to put the unchurched Scandinavians in touch with the parishes and send their children to our Church schools. New work has been started in several places, e. g., in Cokato and Dassel, Minn., among the Scandinavians, where, before they started the work, no services had ever been held in English. One of the finest things in the work so far is that at Iron Mountain, Mich., where we will have a Swedish, self-supporting parish with two or three hundred communicants within a very short time. The people there were entirely ignorant about the Church until Mr. Broburg preached to them. Several Scandinavian Lutheran ministers are ready to come into our Church, if they can be assured of the backing of the Church. All this work is especially important for the young English-speaking element, who are lapsing from all religion.

Oriental Work: Conferences on Oriental work were held by Dr. Emhardt, in San Francisco, Tacoma and Vancouver, resulting in important proposals. There are in the United States 107 missions for the Japanese, of which we have only 3; there are also 23 Buddhist temples, which are anti-American as well as anti-Christian; there are also 177 Chinese missions, of which we have but one; also 16 Korean missions, of which we have none.

The work that is being done is all that the dioceses seem able to do. In every case the appropriation for this work bears a very large ratio to the missionary budget of the Diocese. In every case the established work should be enlarged and further developed. International politics have forced consideration of the Oriental questions into a national issue. On this basis it is necessary to urge more aggressive effort on behalf of the Oriental. The burden of expense under those conditions should be considered a national obligation.

Lapsed Roman Catholics: When we consider the lapsed members of the Roman Church, we are facing an imperative challenge to our Church. This should be grouped under four heads; namely (1) those from Latin-speaking countries of Europe who have lapsed through disillusionment or discontent with the hierarchy; (2) those from Central Europe who have lapsed through racial antagonism and national reaction against Rome, as the Czechs, Magyars and Poles; (3) Mexicans; (4) members of the Uniat churches, namely, those who have been brought over into Rome from Eastern Orthodoxy. Discontent has arisen among these either because of the removal of political necessity for conformity, or the possibility of obtaining peculiar privileges of their national churches, such as the marriage of the clergy and the Eastern Liturgy in the vernacular.

Italians: Work among the Italians has become an accepted part of the Church's program. Creditable work is being done in several dioceses. During the past year, with the co-operation of the division, the work at Gary, Ind., has been recognized, plans for extension in Philadelphia have been developed, work undertaken in Scranton, Pa., careful survey made in the Diocese of Pittsburgh and Michigan by an Italian representative of the division, and new work started in Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Spanish: In Gary, Ind., at the suggestion of the field director, work among the 7,000 Spaniards has been added to the Italian work. Also a new start of Spanish work has been made in New York.

Poles: In Philadelphia four successful missions are maintained among the Poles. Two additional Polish priests with satisfactory credentials have recently offered their services to the division. Several whole Polish congregations have seceded from Rome and are requesting our Bishops to take them over. This is a difficult matter to deal with.

Czechs: A remarkable work among Czechs, under the Rev. Robert Keating Smith, in Westfield, Mass., in remembrance to the wonderful Sunday school conducted by Dr. Stires while in Chicago, shows what can be done among the Czechs. Mr. Smith went abroad with credentials from the Presiding Bishop and Council to investigate religious conditions in Czecho-Slovakis. Since he has kept in close touch with the special committee appointed by the Presiding Bishop and Council, and will be ready, when the opportunity affords, as the result of the movement in Czecho-Slovakis to have great influence over the Czechs in this country. At the request of the Bishop of Chicago, he made a careful survey of Czech conditions among the 180,000 Czechs in Chicago, which resulted in the appointment in April of the Rev. Adam Y. Hannunian to take charge of this work. In Omaha $12,000 has been offered to the field director if the division can direct the work and find a leader among the Czechs.

Hungarians: Last winter the field director at one of the embassies at Washington, was introduced to a well-known Hungarian, Monsignor John W. Torok, D. D., Professor of Canon Law in the Uniat College in Rome, and explained to him the catholicity of the Episcopal Church. He had been sent with the permission of the Propaganda Fidei Congregacio to carry on anti-Bolshevic propaganda in America among the Hungarians. After several months of careful testing the secretary recommended Dr. Torok to the Bishop of Maryland, who received him as a priest into the ministry of our Church June 9, and he has become an assistant to the secretary of the division, without salary. His services are already proving invaluable. A number of ministers of the Reformed Hungarian Church in America have been for some time in communication with the secretary in regard to their being received into the Church. Their congregations number over 20,000. There are probably 400,000 unchurched Hungarians in America kept from all touch and sympathy with American life by bad leaders and anti-American newspapers. Here lies a great opportunity for the Church when we have the leaders who will be able to guide this work.

Mexicans: The division has been able to bring about a good beginning of the all-important Mexican work along the border. In El Paso, Tex., the field director, with Bishop Howden and Dr. Swift, worked out a plan which is partly under the direction of the division for a community centre to begin a great work, religious and social and educational, among the 52,000 Mexicans of El Paso. Well-equipped workers have been found, important property acquired, and the work begun. $2,500 towards this has been given by the department and a like sum guaranteed by the Diocese. At the advice of the field director and the Bishop Coadjutor of Los Angeles, the appointment of a priest who should live in the Settlement House in that city, has been undertaken. Much work in other cities is needed, and also rural missions, where Mexicans predom nate along the border, with proper equipment provided. Important as all this may be, the supreme means of approach to the Mexixcans is through the healing of the body. There is no hospital for Mexicans along the border. Something should be done. If the hospital cannot be established, wards should be, with Mexican doctors, nurses, and, above all, Mexican dieticians. Without exception, the religious and secular organizations along the border tell us that there is work for the Episcopal Church, and with this concession is often combined an expression of wonder at our aloofness and apparent unwillingness to share what is a national responsibility. More than any other religious body, we are in a position to reap the generous harvest both in membership and substantial support.

Eastern Orthodox: Greeks, Russians, Serbians, etc.

Work among members of the Orthodox Church is being forced into prominence. Everywhere throughout the country Bishops and their clergy are asking for advice.

This question is involved because the motives of interest differ.

In the first place, there is a group who seem to view the whole problem externally from an opportunist, or, at the best, from an academic point of view. These either hold aloof and criticize or else join the movement and muddle. Their vision is limited to dramatic groupings or of diplomatic expressions of brotherly interest and desire for closer relations, which in reality mean nothing.

Others there are who are drawn towards the Orthodox through their desire for union (or reunion). They are blind to the fact that the Orthodox have now become a factor in the unity of the Church. There was a time when a conference of reunion was the most that we could hope for. Our attitude in such conferences was self-conscious and introspective. We were trying to justify our historical position and heritage. Its aim and purpose was purely ecclesiastical. The self-revelation of Orthodox prelates, such a Meletios of Athens, Platon of Odessa, and Nicholai of Serbia, who have been unfolding the message of the East, has shown our mistake. Their contribution is not ecclesiastical, but evangelical. Eyes are now turning to the East as the possible centre of unity. This was unmistakably so at Geneva. In recognizing this fact and accepting its implication, we are taking a stand by no means unique among Christian bodies in America. The relation of the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in New York to Orthodox prelates, while not so effectively staged, has been as close and as significant as that of any prelate in our Church.

The third and most important motive of approach to the Orthodox is linked up with the purpose of this department, viz., practical service, religious and social. With the exception of the Oriental, the position of the Orthodox is most appealing. Most other immigrants have more or less natural and ecclesiastical lines of affiliation. In many parts of the country the Orthodox can find no church home. Even where the Church is established, its introduction to the country is so recent that it must be considered exotic, if not foreign. It is just beginning to be recognized as an institution in America. It will be long before it is popularly accredited and accepted. This condition is realized more clearly in the homeland than here. To the mind of the trusting priest of the villages of Russia, Greece or Servia, there is one happy solution. The Episcopal Church is a sister organization and a sympathetic body. To that Church the immigrant is directed if he cannot find an Orthodox congregation. He is assured that he is to find a welcome. The result has depended on us. The stranded immigrant is not welcomed by the Sister Church. The restraining power of religion no longer controls his life. Hence liberty in the land of the free easily develops into license and licentiousness. The converse of this condition is equally true. Where our Church has endeavored to reveal herself as a Sister Church, disorganized communities have been stabilized. In a number of cases Bolshevistic control of communities has been effectively counteracted through acts of fellowship by our clergy. In others discord resulting from Old World politics has been removed.

Acts of fellowship and united services, based upon a desire to serve God and nation, are becoming frequent. In San Francisco a service for Greeks, Russians and Armenians was held in Grace Cathedral during the field director's visit. This was followed by a united service at the same place on the Orthodox Easter. In Albuquerque the services of our priest, as well as the use of the Church, was accepted by the Greeks. The presence of the field director in Salt Lake was the occasion of the healing of a breach growing out of political difficulties which has already reached the courts. The field director preached to over two thousand at the Easter service. A thank-offering of more than two thousand dollars was given. Bishop Moulton and Dean Fleetwood attended that afternoon the Orthodox Easter vespers. In Portland, Ore., Bishop Summer pontificated at the Easter service. At the same festival the Greeks and Russians in San Francisco, who had developed a consciousness of their strength through the large service mentioned above, found their own churches too small, and used Grace Cathedral for a joint service. In Alburquerque the Greeks of the city accepted both the Cathedral and the services of the Dean for their Easter celebration.

In Fresno the Armenians who had been persecuted have been defended by the Church. While the field director was at Fresno he was visited by a leading representative who begged further co-operation, both locally and in Armenia. In Galveston, Tex., the rector and his laity have undertaken to establish a friendly contact with the Greeks and Serbians. During the field director's visit arrangements were made with the Serbian priest whereby he should use Trinity Church for his services. During the visit of the assistant secretary in Birmingham, Ala., close contact was established with the Greeks and Syrians. A luncheon was held for our clergy, representative laymen and the Greek priest and his layman. The result of this was that the leaders of the Gowanus Club began discussing Americanization lunches, to which should be invited representatives of different nationalities in order to establish a mutual respect. In New York City the Greeks desire to form a new congregation uptown, and are using Synod Hall until they can buy a church of their own. Last summer the Dean of the Russian Seminary at Tenafly, N. J., requested the secretary to nominate one of our priests to take the place of Irvine at the Russian Seminary. The secretary nominated the Rev. Ed. J. Burlingham, and both he and the Rev. Elwyn H. Spear, rector of the Church of the Atonement, Tenafly, have been teaching with great success weekly in the Russian Seminary, pastoral theology, ecclesiastical history, ethics and American history. When Metropolitan Platon, who has been given charge by the patriarch of all Russian churches outside of Russia, recently came to America, he at once sent word to the field director and secretary asking them to come to see him. The secretary furnished on request books of sermons by our clergy to the Greek Bishop, and copies of our Constitution and Canons and the organization of the Presiding Bishop and Council to Metropolitan Meletios, of Athens, and Bishop Nicholai, of Serbia. Telegrams and letters are occasionally received from our clergy, requesting information on the standing of Orthodox priests with whom they desire to co-operate. Such communications are referred at once to the proper Orthodox priests and their replies transmitted. In some cases Orthodox priests are sending their children to our Church schools, and everywhere they desire our help in keeping the second generation from lapsing from all religion.

In pursuance of his duties, the field director spent the summer of 1920 in Europe. He attended by invitations the meetings of the Committee of the English Church with the representatives of the Greek Church. In Geneva, in addition to attending all the sessions of the Conference on Faith and Order, he acted as secretary to the conference called by Bishop Gore to consider the reunion of the Orthodox and Anglican churches. He also attended all the sessions of the Commission for the Promotion of the World Peace through the Churches held at Bratenburg.

Bishop Nicholai, during his visit, kept in touch with the secretary and left instructions as to how best our Churches could co-operate in reaching his people in America. The Rev. Lloyd B. Hosapple, at Bishop Nicholai's invitation, with letters of commendation from the Presiding Bishop, furnished, at the request of the secretary, who also obtained a laisser passer from the embassies concerned, and a letter of introduction from the Secretary of State for Mr. Hosapple, has gone to Serbia to carry a spiritual message to the people. Mr. Hosapple will be of great help when he returns in solving the Serbian situation.

Other Work: In addition to the definite work accomplished, some of which is detailed above, the division has had a great indirect influence. The very fact that the Church has undertaken this work nationally has aroused parishes all over the country to reach out to make friends with and minister to the people of various races within the parish bounds. Examples of these are the Diocese of Newark, where a special Americanization director was appointed in 1920.

In Rochester the City Missionary, through the schools, gathered together 150 Italian boys in one of the parishes for a gymnasium class. Ten of these boys were for a time selected and given religious instruction Sunday afternoons, but the important point is, ten of the best young men of the parish became big brothers to these boys. Both the cities of Buffalo and Rochester, with which the division has been in close contact, are doing splendid work among the foreign-born.

Another example of what can be done anywhere: In Pottsville, Pa., two Greeks were discovered. Because somebody in the parish had the vision, these two Greeks became regular members and subscribers in the parish, leading members in the Men's Club, etc.

In Iron Mountain, Mich., a large number of nationalities are reached by our parish in ordinary ways.

These are but instances of what is being done in many places and what can be done far and wide when the whole Church shall be aroused to work for God and country with ordinary Christian brotherliness and love for souls.

THE NEW TRAINING SCHOOL

There is felt today, more than at any recent time, a call to a life of service, and for those hearing the call to the mission fields of the Church and for all desiring to do rural work, a school has now been founded.

A nation is as good as its country population, and can be no better. Through the ages, cities of sordid wickedness have failed to drag down a nation; but, eventually, the rural communities became infected with the spirit of unrest and unfaith, and then the nation crumbles. We hear much these days about the cities. The increases of population that make the cities larger each year come from the country; therefore, if we hope to have our cities what they should be, we should attend to the rural work, so as to prevent infection being brought back from the urban communities to the country.

It is easier, for some reason, to find good men to work among the poor and abandoned in the cities than to find men to work with and educate the people not yet bad in the country. The wretched must be helped and saved, but the very best—the only—way to put an end to the wretchedness is to cut off the source of supply. This means that we must educate the rural people and their children in the Christian faith, giving at the same time as good a practical education as possible. Christianity is the rock on which all other and further education must be based.

Men from the rural sections, in sympathy with and loving the country people, are best suited to minister to them; so it behooves us to train men of moderate or exceptional capabilities and implicit faith, that they may work according to the best that is in them. This will release and develop leaders who are now trying to go on with their large outside work and at the same time attend to all the routine of a scattered parish. There is a limit to the time and strength of any man, even the best and most faithful.

A group of men who know these needs have organized and are planning to open the DuBose Memorial Church Training School, for the purpose of providing well-trained teachers, lay workers and clergy, for the districts most in need of them, as indicated by the survey of the Nation-Wide Campaign. Men will be prepared for work in Religious Education, Christian Missions and Social Service, and for the Localized Ministry provided for by Canon passed at the last General Convention.

For twenty-five years the minds of clergymen engaged in work among the mountain people, mill communities, small towns and rural settlements, have been occupied with the problem of providing enough clergymen for this work, which, by reason of the parishioners being scattered in pursuit of their natural vocations, makes the work involve an excess of time and physical labor. No matter how devoted the man is to his work, or how great his influence, he cannot do three men's work; and churches and missions are closed, and are being closed continually, for lack of clergy and lay workers.

The DuBose Memorial School will seek to assist in solving this problem, while giving training which will include a great deal of practical experience in the mountain communities surrounding Sewanee, and the man who takes this training will be returned to his own Diocese thoroughly fitted for constructive work.

The new institution is in no sense a rival of the university, or of the regular theological seminaries. The Board of Trustees makes this statement covering its relation with the higher academic and professional institutions: "The DuBose Memorial Church Training School, while attempting to make its work as thorough and practical as possible, will not offer courses of a strictly collegiate grade. Hence this school, while preparing students to do work at higher academic and professional institutions, will advise all applicants who can satisfy the entrance requirements of a college or theological seminary, to enter such higher institutions, provided the latter offer courses that meet the needs of such students."

The school is not a short cut to the ministry. It aims to give picked men intensive training in the fundamentals of religion, with special emphasis on the devotional life. The period of study need not be so long as the regular seminary course, for the seminary, at the time it trains men for the ministry, also prepares younger men for life. Most of the men who enter this school will be settled, well taught and disciplined by the world, for whom the seminary course would be unduly technical and long drawn out.

The Site and Location.

The site purchased by the trustees is the one-time Fairmount School for Girls, long the home of Dr. DuBose, at Monteagle, Tenn., situated within twenty minutes by train or motor car of the University of the South at Sewanee. It is located in the heart of the mountains, on the Cumberland plateau, a spur of the Southern Appalachians, within easy reach of any Diocese and of all sections of the country, possessing numerous unique advantages. There is a beautiful little farm, of some sixty acres, connected with the school property, which will provide the living for the school, to a great extent, giving the students, already dedicated to the work, much of the rural life they are to live. The trend of the usual seminary is away from the country, and great effort is being made to produce the opposite atmosphere in this institution, which is primarily designed for those who want to work in the mission fields of the Church.

History of Fairmount.

The late owner of "Fairmount," for whom the school is named, was connected with the University of the South for more than forty-six years; for thirty-six years he was resident at Sewanee and actively engaged in teaching. He was, first, chaplain and Professor of Ethics; then he organized the Theological Department of the University of the South, and held the chair of Old Testament Language and Interpretation. Later he was made Dean, and relinquished to his son, the Rev. W. H. DuBose, the chair of the Old Testament, retaining the teaching of the New Testament. Through all these years he remained Professor of Ethics at the University. In 1882 he was succeeded as chaplain of the University by Dr. Thomas F. Gailor, now Bishop of Tennessee and president of the Church's central body, the Presiding Bishop and Council.

From the foundation of Fairmount in 1873 until its close in 1917, Dr. DuBose was its chaplain and moving spirit; and he had, during the whole period of its existence, a wonderful influence over its students and associates. He made the institution a Church school, and built the beautiful little chapel, of which the architect was Dr. Silas McBee. In the chapel and in the lecture-room at Sewanee was wrought out that philosophy which found expression in his books and won the recognition of scholars at home and abroad.

It is doubtful if there has ever been a man in this country who had a more vital influence upon young men and young women than did this distinguished scholar and author. For ten years he made his home at Fairmount, and was the very life of the school. One may say he was the builder of Fairmount, for he so remodeled and rebuilt the establishment that it is really his work. He planted all the flowers and shrubbery and ornamental trees, so that his touch is visible in all one sees there. To those who knew and loved him, Fairmount is holy ground, and nothing could be more appropriate and gratifying to them than to have his name perpetuated by the new foundation which is to arise, to continue the work which he had most at heart. His spirit still lives at Sewanee and Fairmount. The trustees have sought to perpetuate his name and memory in the work they have undertaken.

Instruction.

The curriculum is laid down with particular regard to the canonical requirements for Localized Clergy. The courses of instruction lead to examination by the chaplains in the following subjects:

(a) The Contents and Interpretation of the Books of Holy Scripture.

(b) The Doctrines of This Church.

(c) The Contents and Use of the Book of Common Prayer.

(d) Church History, a general outline, together with the History of Church Missions.

These are the subjects that the Examining Chaplains require before admission into the deaconate. After serving in that grade for two years, the candidate may then be advanced to the priesthood in his Diocese without further examination.

The following description of the courses is given in the prospectus:

"(1) The Bible in English; the Contents and Interpretation of the Books of Holy Scripture. This course aims to give a working knowledge of the Bible, such as will be useful for the postulants, Church school teachers, lay workers and the localized ministry; and will include a study of the History of Israel, of New Testament times, and the progressive unfolding of the divine truth. A primary object is 'to know the Bible itself better,' rather than to know about the Bible; to familiarize the student by much reading and even memorizing of the text, with the words and messages of the inspired writers. The method is devotional, practical cultural and homiletical; synthetic rather than critical. The lecturers are conversational and atchetical, so that teaher and pupil may patiently discover and systematically follow to the end the golden thread which binds together the manifold messages of many writers into a living and life-giving whole. The effort is made to present and consider the Bible in its completeness, and each book as a complete whole, yet together presenting a certain unity, 'as episodes in the great poem which all the poets, like co-operating thoughts of one great mind, have built up since the beginning of the world.'

"(2) The Doctrines of this Church, as expressed in the historic Creeds and the Church Catechism, with special reference to present needs and application to the life of today, with a comparative study of the doctrines and polity of other forms of Christianity.

"(3) The Contents and use of the Book of Common Prayer as the Church's basis for public worship and guide for the development and expression of personal devotion. Special attention is paid to parish ministration and religious education. The conduct of public worship, pastoral care and the preaching of the Word. In addition to the instruction of the class-room, members of the school receive practical training under direction in social and missionary work in the villages and mining camps of the neighborhood, and in the rural churches of the Tennessee mountains and valleys. A weekly conference is to be ehld for personal expression in prayer, experience and aspiration.

"(4) Church History, a general outline, together with the History of this Church in the United States of America, and the history, extent and methods of Christian Missions. An attempt is made to present a vital view of the spread of Christian truth, with a special study of the life and experience of the great heroes of the faith.

"(5) A practical course in Applied Sociology for Social Workers, dealing with such subjects as the Christian aspects of Social Service; the problem of the rural Church and the rural community; the mill work; mountain work; the small town, and the race problem in the S uth.

"(6) A practical course for Church School Workers, including methods of administration and conduct ot the Church school. Scpeial instruction is given in the Christian Nurture Series.

"(7) A practical course of instruction in public reading of the Scriptures, and the services of the Church; in the preparation and delivery of sermons, and in the organization and administration of the affairs o missions and parishes, including the keeping of accounts and the organization of guilds. Special attention is given to the consideration of the survey made in the Nation-Wide Campaign, for its better understanding and its practical use in the upbuilding and extension of the Church."

Becoming a Roman Catholic

W. H. Morse, M. D.

When a Protestant becomes a Roman Catholic it is required that he should make a "declaration of faith." The idea prevails that this amounts to little more than declaring that he "believes in the Holy Catholic Church," but there is much more than that in the declaration. It may be of interest to give it entire. It is as follows:

"I (the name is here given), having before my eyes the Holy Gospels, which I can touch with my hand, and knowing that no one can be saved without that faith which the Holy Catholic Apostolic Roman Church holds, believes and teaches, against which I grieve that I have greatly erred, inasmuch as I have held and believed doctrines opposed to her teaching:

I now, with grief and contrition for my past errors, profess that I believe the Holy Catholic Roman Apostolic Church the only and true Church established by Jesus Christ, to which I submit myself with my whole heart. I believe all the articles she proposes to my belief, and I reject and condemn all that she rejects and condemns, and I am ready to observe all that she commands me. And especially, I profess that I believe:

One only God, in three divine Persons, distinct from and equal to each other—that is to say, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost.

The Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation, Passion, Death and Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the personal union of the two natures, the divine and the human; the divine Maternity of the most holy Mary, together with her most spotless Virginity;

The true, real and substantial presence of the Body and Blood, together with the Soul and Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ in the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist;

The seven Sacraments instituted by Jesus Christ for the salvation of mankind; that is to say, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Order, Matrimony;

Purgatory, Resurrection of the Dead, Everlasting Life;

The Primacy, not only of honor, but also of jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff, successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, Vicar of Jesus Christ;

The veneration of the Saints and their images;

The authority of the Apostolic and Ecclesiastical Traditions, and of the Holy Scriptures, which we must interpret and understand only in the sense which our holy mother, the Catholic Church, has held and does hold;

And everything else that has been defined, and declared by the sacred Canons, and by the general Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent, and delivered, defined and declared by the general Council of the Vatican, especially concerning the Primacy of the Roman Pontiff and his infallible teaching authority.

With a sincere heart, therefore, and with unfeigned faith I detest and abjure every error, heresy and sect opposed to the said Holy Catholic and the Apostolic Roman Church. So help me God, and these His holy Gospels, which I touch with my hand."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

DISARMAMENT.

Mr. Editor: It is plain there is but one way to lessen the great burden of taxation now on us. Nine-tenths of this burden is due to wars, past and to come. Only about one-tenth of revenue goes for current expenses. No economy therefore in these can lessen materially this burden. The cost of past wars is fixed, and must be paid. So the only hope is to stop spending for future wars, by gradual disarmament. Some think that by so doing we shall not lessen our taxes; for the money thus saved would probably go, in our extravagant government, to pensions, bonus and such; yet even so, disarming would at least save us from such tragedy as the late great war and its massacres and cripples, widows and orphans, and our care of them. Let us all, then, who believe in prayer, pray as we never prayed before that the approaching peace conference may earnestly "seek peace and ensue it," by a gradual disarming, the only way that seems practicable to prevent such madness as possessed the nations in the great war. Universal, world-wide peace is a utopian dream, never to be realized "until He comes"; but a peace conference such as soon will meet is a new thing in the world, and might be the means (under God) of saving us from the political chaos that now seems imminent, and inevitable, if the nations go on as now, rivaling each other in armies and fleets. Oh that all Christians would daily, at noon, unite in spirit in some brief but earnest prayer for God-guiding of the conference.

If even two agree together as touching anything that they shall ask, we know what He promises. How much more, then, if tens, or hundreds, or thousands, nay millions, assail the throne of grace! The kingdom of heaven may suffer violence, and the violent may take it by force.

"Let those now pray who never prayed before;
Let those who ever pray now pray the more."

BERKELEY MINOR.

University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va.

A PILGRIMAGE OF PRAYER.

Mr. Editor: An interesting experiment has been made recently in connection with the Order of the Thousandfold.

A deeply interested member of the Order, in a Western State, started out through the country districts to interest the people in praying for increased usefulness. The little leaflets about the Order easily opened the way to intimate heart-to-heart talks about prayer, with all sorts and conditions of people. He found them ready to talk to him about their difficulties, and many were glad to join the ranks of those who are praying to be more greatly used of God. He found a great deal of depression in the minds of the people, with regards to the results of the war, but the Order seemed to fit in very well with such a state of mind, as it opened a door of Hope—a possibility of making Christian people more of a power for good in the world. Moreover, the prayer seemed to suit people of all kinds of religious belief, because it is, or ought to be, the desire of all to become more useful.

Two weeks were spent in this pilgrimage of prayer, and it only came to an end because the money available from the fund was exhausted.

This kindling of the holy fire in human hearts suggests an opportunity to many, who have been stirred by the Nation-Wide Campaign, to seek for wider fields of service.

FREDERICK W. NEVE.

Archdeacon and President Mountain Missions, Diocese of Virginia.

The Great Commission.

THE ALASKA FIELD.

There has come to us today an appeal from Bishop Rowe for help which should be of more than passing interest to many of our readers. It is not always that a call as definite as this one is circulated, and in order that it may reach a wide circle in as authentic form as possible, we add Dr. Wood's letter:

To the Editor, Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.:

Dear Sir: Bishop Rowe telegraphs from Tanana, Alaska, that he must have this summer, if possible, a "young, capable and resourceful man" for that mission. For the last three years Deaconess Mabel H. Pick has courageously stayed at her post at Tanana all alone. From my personal knowledge of Tanana, it is easy to understand the correctness of Bishop Rowe's telegraphed statement: "This is no place for a lone woman."

Tanana is in the very center of Alaska, at the junction of the Tanana River with the Yukon. The white town, with a population of perhaps 200, retains considerable importance as the meeting point of the steamers from the upper and the lower Yukon and the Tanana. The Indian village three miles away was formerly one of our Indian strongholds. A good many of the people have moved, and our failure to replace the Rev. P. H. Williams, who came out in 1918 to enlist in the army, has set the work back considerably. Still there is an Indian population of about 100.

It will be a pleasure on behalf of Bishop Rowe to supply further particulars concerning Tanana to any young man, preferably in orders, and preferably married, but without children, who may be willing to consider difficult work in a small outpost.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WOOD.

Executive Secretary, Department of Missions, July 27, 1921.

WORK AMONG LEPERS OF THE BAHAMAS FINISHED.

Recently the Department of Missions received two special gifts from Eastern Sunday schools for the relief of leper children in the Bahama Islands. These gifts were forwarded to the Bishop of Nassau. The following letter has just been received from him:

"I enclose receipts. They would have been sent sooner if I had not been away at sea. I asked my chaplain last year to notify you that our work among the lepers had ceased.

"Leprosy has decreased very much in the islands. On my recent cruise I visited what had been a colony of lepers at Snagua and found only one leper woman. There are, however, a few lepers (no children) in the Bahamas General Hospital; so I have given the money to the matron to buy them a few additional comforts.

"I should be grateful if you would inform the two churches which have sent the offerings of these facts."

CHRISTIANS RELIEVED.

The following letter received from the office of the Presiding Bishop and Council, will probably be gratifying to readers of this column:

To the Editor, the Southern Churchman, Richmond, Va.:

Dear Sir: Bishop Graves, in confirming his cabled instructions to the Department of Missions to cease its appeal on behalf of the China famine sufferers, writes a letter dated June 6, from which a passage is subjoined:

"We are deeply grateful here for the liberal way in which the Church people have responded to the appeal of the Department of Missions for help in this famine, and, with what we have done here in the way of sending workers from the American Dioceses to the North and raising funds locally, I feel that we have really accomplished a good deal. Indeed, I hardly see how we could have been more. The help we have given in famine workers has been much appreciated in the North, and our people have in every case acquitted themselves well in the work which has been assigned to them. The last worker to return is Mr. E. Harrison King, of St. John's University, who will be back on the 8th.

"The International Famine Committees are moving to induce the government to appoint a permanent Commission on Famine Prevention, which will be international in character. Until something of the sort is done, there will be no proper dealing with the situation, for the Chinese simply let the causes of famine go unchecked, and when a famine comes, as it does regularly, they throw themselves on the help of foreigners, for without such help sufficient funds could not be collected either in foreign countries or here in China. It is the guarantee of foreign oversight, and that means in 90 per cent. missionary oversight, which provides for the honest administration of funds and enables famine relief to be carried on.

"May I ask you to express through the Church press the thanks of the bishops and missionaries of the American Church for the help which our Church people have given? It has been forwarded immediately on receipt and has gone to the agencies which have been entirely trustworthy and efficient in its administration. I feel sure that contributors will be glad to be certified that the money they have given has been applied quickly, directly and efficiently."

May I add to what the Bishop says our most grateful thanks for the widespread and generous response made by our people in behalf of the famine sufferers and for the effective work done by the Southern Churchman in keeping the facts of the situation before the people in this country? Without your co-operation, it would have been impossible to secure the approximately $140,000 which it was our privilege to send out to China.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WOOD.

Secretary for Foreign Work, Department of Missions, July 23, 1921.

TRAINING FOR WORK IN CHINA.

For a thorough testing of the missionary spirit and courage there is nothing better than the experiences of the first year the new missionary to China spends at the language school. Dr. Charles Dwight Reid, who in the autumn of 1920 joins the staff of St. James' Hospital, Anking, writes of his experiences:

"The language school year has at last been closed. Mrs. Reid and I have enjoyed the months in Peking very much, and I think we have succeeded in assimilating as much of his queer language as the average student at least. I remember when we first arrived in Peking and went about among the shops with one or two of the "third term" students, we thought they were marvels at the language and must know all there was to be known. Alas, for setting folks on pedestals! We have just finished that same third term, and I must admit there are many and many untouched spots. I felt about as I should imagine a farmer out on one of the vast wheat fields of North Dakota would feel after trying to plow such a field with an old-fashioned plow and one horse—he might possibly scratch the surface of one or two furrows across his field in one season. However, there's a Chinese proverb or two which we have learned which apply pretty well. One of them is, roughly translated, our knowledge is 'as one hair in the hide of nine cows.'

"We hear occasionally about the man who comes to China and in six months preaches his first sermon. I haven't met any of him yet, but when I do I'm going to take my hat off.

"Outside of the school we have had a very enjoyable winter and spring, in weather that has never been unbearable either from cold or heat—as yet—and meeting a lot of interesting folks among the various organizations here. The getting acquainted with a lot of people I really think is about as valuable as any part of the language school session.

"I am about to take a six weeks' course at the China Medical Board's Hospital, in X-ray work, to recall what I have forgotten about it in the past couple of years since I did any of that work, and to learn the new things that have come out in that time. We have about half—well, perhaps not quite half—but over a third of the necessary apparatus for an X-ray plant for Anking ordered, to be ready about the first of September, and are hoping for the necessary moneys for the rest to be forthcoming before long from some source. I hope you can stir up some of it—fifteen hundred dollars gold would just about do the trick—two thousand would fit us right up to date, but the former amount would enable us to do almost anything; at least, the most essential work."

RECRUITING THE MINISTRY.

In the course of discussion of the many problems before the Church at the recent meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council, they also brought up the question of recruiting the ministry of our Church. So important did the Council feel this matter to be that it requested that a statement be drawn up and presented to the next meeting of the Presiding Bishop and Council setting forth the situation in this respect.

A report from the various seminaries of the country showed the following enrollment in our various theological schools:

Number of Students November 1, 1921.

General, 70; Cambridge, 11; Berkeley, 14; Philadelphia, 20; Virginia, 40; Sewanee, 12; Bexley Hall, 5; Nashotah, 11 and 3 Greeks; Western, 15; Seabury, 22; Pacific, 11; Bishop Payne's Divinity School, 11; Greeley, Col., 4.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

LET US TAKE COURAGE.

Of course, it is the business of the preacher and the Church worker to call attention to conditions that are wrong so that they may be righted, but it is important that we should not spend all our time looking at the blue side of things.

In these latter days we hear so much of improper dressing and dancing, and generally going to the devil, especially on Sunday afternoons, that it is well for us to pause and see if things really are getting worse instead of better.

One always puts forth one's best efforts in the face of stiff opposition, but it is just as much of a mistake to over-estimate the opposition as it is to minimize it.

If we feel that the powers of evil have it all their own way, we are apt to lose our aggressiveness, and undertake nothing but defensive tactics, and consequently lose power by not availing ourselves of opportunities for occupying new fields, and developing occasions of usefulness for fear of failure.

In order to encourage optimism and cheer us on to the fray, we devote this department to an article copied from a recent issue of the Literary Digest under the heading, "America the Most Religious Country on Earth."

This article is encouraging not only by comparison with other countries, but also for the light it sheds upon conditions as they are developing in our own land.

We quote as follows:

"The United States is the greatest church-going country in the world," says a writer who has been burrowing into the United States census figures, and he gives us the further comforting assurance that the whole world is growing better, a vastly different conclusion from that reached by some other contemporary observers. Statistics show, however, that out of a population of more than 105,000,000 in the United States there is a church population of nearly 45,000,000, and a Sunday school attendance of more than 20,000,000. More than 2,000,000 persons devote a whole or part of their time to teaching in Sunday school, and, in addition, there are 200,000 ministers, speakers, rabbis, priests and others described by different ratings according to the denominations, but authorized to solemnize marriages and to preach and perform other work regarded as that of the church head. Assisting the ministers are several million lay workers, secretaries and volunteer helpers, who devote their time to "laboring in the vineyard" because of interest and enthusiasm, with little or no reward other than that which the service brings. Taking all these facts into consideration, says the writer of a special article in the New York Herald, 'it is argued that every family must have at least one member connected in some way with a religious organization, church or religious society.' In further evidence of the upward trend of religion, it is stated that 'militant membership in churches has practically doubled in the United States in the last twenty-five years, although during the same time the nation's population has increased only 69 per cent.' Church property is valued at $2,000,000,000, with $500,000,000 for endowment.

"Such news as this will come as an agreeable surprise to those of our religious leaders who had regarded the signs of the times as indicative of a failing religious morale and who had seen in the shortage in the ministerial supply a manifestation of the Church's weakening hold on humanity. Not only will the fears of these be allayed, to some extent at least, but, as the Herald remarks in an editorial foreword to the article, 'critics of present-day morals, professional pessimists, those of Bolshevik trend of mind, will be confused and abashed' when they analyze the contents of the article. 'That the United States is easily the most religious country in the world; that the number of those interested in the several denominations is increasing far faster than the population; that the value of church property and the money spent annually for church work runs into the billions, is a revelation of the American public's morals.'

"Church membership is climbing at the rate of a million a year, says the Herald writer. 'Nearly 7,000,000 persons became members of religious bodies in the ten-year period ended December 31, 1916, according to the Census Bureau, which period included two years when the great war was spreading its influence over the world.' So then—

" 'The steady growth of religious training, the rapidly growing army of converts who openly avow their purpose to live according to the teachings they elect, say Church officials, gradually is making the United States and the entire world better instead of worse. Manifestations of evil and wickedness, small and large, are seeming only, it is argued.

" 'The foibles of fashion, scanty dressing, divorce coming in what seems like a wave in the wake of war, extravagance, law-breaking and violence, are only petty outbursts in the view of thoughtful churchmen. Such manifestations will pass, they promise, thrust into the background by the weight of sober, decent public opinion, built up through the national and world educational campaigns.

" 'Bridging the world with a background of religious training, the churches of the United States and other nations will eventually bring about an era of fair dealing and international righteousness which shall make war unreasonable. This is the argument of church workers, ministers, elders and officials, who back it with their references to the government investigations of church activity in the United States.'

"The first religious census taken in 1890, says the writer, found a total church membership of approximately 21,000,000 out of a total population of nearly 63,000,000. This showed that 35 per cent. of the population was enrolled in churches. Sixteen years later the total church population had increased to 35,000,000, or 42 per cent. of the national population of 84,000,000. Now the percentage is nearly 43. Modern methods of church recruiting, disapproved by some ministers, are credited with part of the large increase in church membership. One of these is the recreational church plant, with gymnasium, bowling alley and gamerooms, where young women and men meet, organize clubs and engage in special study. The membership and work of organizations like the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., the Young Men's Hebrew Association and similar societies are not included in studies of the Census Bureau. Adoption of advertising methods by churches and campaigns for converts are also credited, says the writer, with a share in increasing church membership.

"Alongside this growth has been the Church's increase in property ownership, which, including only buildings in which services are held, is now valued at $2,000,000,000. Mortgages on this total only about 10 per cent. The churches have also at their disposal $500,000,000 in endowments and other properties for Home Missions, hospitals, colleges, etc., and a sum more than one-tenth as large is invested for the benefit of missionary work in foreign fields. Further:

" 'The annual expenditure of more than $50,000,000 a year for special extension work in the United States long ago became a common thing for churches. Reaching the churches in contributions, this represents more than $1 a year for every enrolled member. It does not include the collection and expenditure of nearly $16,000,000 additional on account of Foreign Mission work or the annual overhead expenses of maintaining meeting halls, paying ministers and other workers in the United States. The last item alone absorbs more than $400,000,000 a year.'

"The war did emphasize spiritual values, says the Detroit News, and the orgy of materialism which followed it—'not overlooking the materialism which expressed itself in the treaty of peace'—is probably today as great a force for the essentials of religion as any that could be devised:

" 'And this materialism, exhibited in eating, drinking, spending, competing in display with one's neighbors, and in a general emphasis on the exterior rather than on the interior values, was the culmination of long years of just such false ideals of life—ideals that found their nature and inevitable outlet in a clash of arms involving the whole world. But every poison has its antidote and the antidote for this was being formed even while the effects of the poison seemed at its height. The antidote is the vision of a life which recognizes not with lip service only, but with a conviction flowering in daily common life, that spirit is eternally above matter, and the things of the spirit eternally above all that matter in its several guises as wealth and power and position can offer.' "

Church Intelligence

Summer School at Geneva.

The sixth annual meeting of the Summer School Workers of the Province of New York and New Jersey terminated on Thursday. This year's session was the most successful that has ever been held and the attendance was the largest. The Board of Governors decided to limit the registered attendance to 250, and that this number must come with a definite purpose and must be present during the entire ten days. The campus was crowded at all times this year.

Four bishops participated in the Summer School session. The Rt. Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, Bishop Coadjutor of Newark, was president and pastor of the school. A leading feature of the school was the daily Bible Hour talks by Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of Western New York and Chancellor of Hobart College. Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris, Suffragan Bishop of Western New York, gave a very interesting course on Christian Fundamentals for Juniors. The Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, Bishop Coadjutor of Central New York, gave a very instructive address on "How to Become an Educated Christian."

The Rev. Paul Micou, of the Department of Religious Education of the Presiding Bishop and Council, gave a class in Church Life and Government.

The mystery play, "The Angels of Magdalena," was given on Wednesday evening on the William Smith campus and was very pleasing.

Field Day was held on Thursday afternoon and was very amusing. Games of all kinds were enjoyed, not only by those who participated, but by the spectators.

It has been announced that an active general campaign will be commenced in October to raise the remaining $600,000 needed to complete Hobart College's Million Dollar Centennial Fund, $400,000 of which has now been subscribed without general solicitation. Three hundred thousand will be raised in the Diocese of Western New York, in which Hobart is situated. The Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, Bishop of Western New York and Chancellor of Hobart College, will co-operate with the committee in charge. The Hobart Campaign has been unanimously endorsed by the Diocesan Council of Western New York.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Life Work Conference Held in Tappahannock.

Another of the Life Work Conferences arranged by the Committee of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education in various parts of the Diocese was held on Wednesday, July 27, in St. John's Church, Tappahannock, Rev. William N. Meade, rector.

When the speakers arrived they found awaiting them a fine congregation of representative men and women and a number of young men, some of whom had come for long distances to attend the conference.

The conference was opened with a brief devotional service, after which the Rev. F. D. Goodwin, of Warsaw, in well-chosen words, called attention to the shortage of clergy and the responsibility resting upon each clergyman and each parish of bringing to our young men the call to the Church's ministry.

Mr. Goodwin then introduced the Rev. Douglas W. Neff, of Gloucester. In his address Mr. Neff stressed particularly the work of the ministry, calling attention to the fact that the need of today is for virile men who are not afraid to work in a field which calls for every power of one's life. He referred to some of the calls upon a clergyman's time and interest, and showed very clearly that no one, who took the trouble to find out, would find that the real minister's life is an easy one. And yet, while this is true, there are joys of service that more than compensated for all the hard work and all the burdens carried.

Mr. Neff was followed by the Rev. Noble C. Powell, rector of St. Paul's Memorial Church, at the University of Virginia. Mr. Powell prefaced his address with the statement that the prime work of the Church today is to fit men, not for death, but for life, and the clergy, as her official representatives, are commissioned to go out and seek to teach men the meaning and purpose of this their life. He stressed the two questions which a young man must ask himself as he faces his life, "What can I get out of life?" and "What can I put into life?" answering these with especial reference to the Christian ministry, showing the need of men with vision who are willing to give their lives to make their visions real.

The meeting then adjourned for lunch, which was served on the lawn of the church by the ladies of the parish. Surely those who were present saw again the real old Virginia bounty and hospitality.

The conference was called to order again at 2 P. M., and after the singing of a hymn and prayer, Rev. Mr. Powell spoke briefly of the financial provisions which have been made by which a young man is enabled to prepare himself in college, university and seminary.

Bishop Temple, of North Texas, who is spending his vacation in this section of the State, urged that the young men should not seek to put the thought of the ministry out of mind by saying, "I am not good enough," for there is no life that God cannot use if it is given to Him.

A striking feature of the afternoon session were addresses by prominent laymen of the parish, who spoke very earnestly and feelingly of the need today for more and better trained men in the ministry, and expressed a lively interest and co-operation in what the Diocese is seeking to do along this line.

The conference was then thrown open for discussion, in which a number of those present took part.

The sessions were closed with prayer and blessing by Bishop Temple, and those who had been privileged to attend left with the conviction that this Tidewater region, which has given so many of its sons to the ministry, will not be found lacking in this hour of need.

Lamb's Creek Church.

Before the Revolutionary War the vast British Colony of Virginia became the home of a large number of the good old English families, who felt that it would be impossible for them to be true to the long-established religion of their forefathers if they were to neglect to build worshipful houses of God. Up and down the land of Virginia these houses of God stood as a testimony to the faith that was in our first English settlers. Records show that as many as one hundred and thirty-five churches existed, of which now there are only twenty in the present Diocese of Virginia which have survived destruction or alienation to other denominations. Lamb's Creek, built in A. D. 1770, is in the upper portion of King George County, about fourteen miles southeast of Fredericksburg. After the British were driven out of this country the British clergy ceased to be sent hither from the old country, and many of those who had been at work here were "frozen out." Through this cause there was a general disuse of the old Colonial churches. In some few instances the county authorities were able to turn them to educational uses (as was the case for a time of St. Paul's in King George County); in many others, other denominations turned the buildings to account. The majority went into decay. Lamb's Creek decayed as far as it was able; but—to quote Nancy Byrd Turner—

. . . . unshaken of all storms,
The old church stands . . . .
Safe hath she come through stress of shame and shock,
Of time and tumult, and the wrack
of wars.
Her corner-stone is founded on a Rock!

The splendid condition of the walls and the possibility of teaching a number of children unprovided with religious teaching, turned the attention of the Rev. Byrd T. Turner to the reconstruction of the church. In 1907 the Restoration Association was formed and has continued its work until now. General substantial repairs to the building, restoration of the original Bible (—"VINEGAR" Bible) and Prayer Book; gift of a silver communion service, and gift of a fire-proof iron safe—these are some of the things that have been accomplished up to the present.

The Nation-Wide Campaign of the Episcopal Church is endeavoring to restore to the perfect original form as many of these old churches as form in their opinion strategic spiritual centres. Old Farnham and Christ Church (Middlesex) have already been taken in hand, and now we understand it is the turn of old Lamb's Creek. The Executive Committee will take over this church on August 8 and begin by exciting the spiritual interest of all concerned by a readjustment of its services.

If it were possible to obtain some of the old monuments which were removed, and the four date bricks, marked 1770, the date of the foundation, and the original communion plate, which must certainly exist somewhere in private ownership, the work would be greatly set forward.
be greatlyset forward. The bricks, according to report, were carried North by a Union soldier during the war.

A thriving Sunday school is being conducted at present by a few of the local women, and it is hoped that this sketch will reach the eyes and hearts of willing and able sympathizers who will appreciate the work of restoration (both material and spiritual) and assist with the help that is needed.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

The Summer.

Many of the cleregy have left the city for their vacation periods. While the work of the churches is being carried on by assistants or special clerical supplies for the purpose. Rev. Christopher P. Sparling has been visiting at Blue Ridge Summit, and Rev. J. H. W. Blake has been visiting his son in Akron, O., and friends in his old parish at Tiffn, O. Mr. Blake will be at Blue Ridge Summit also a little later. Their parishes of Christ Church and St. John's Church, Georgetown, are holding joint services, alternating each Sunday between the two churches. Rev. Thomas McKlintock is in charge of these services. Rev. Robert Talbot, D. D., of St. Paul's Parish, is also spending his vacation at Blue Ridge Summit, while his work is being cared for by Rev. T. A. Johnstone. The Washington clergy at Blue Ridge Summit will probably take part in some of the services at the Church of the Transfiguration, while there, helping in this way the rector, Rev. F. A. Cook. Dr. Freeman, of Epiphany, is spendind the summer in Maine, while the Rev. Robert Browning, his assistant, is in charge of the services and work of Epiphany. The services at Epiphany Chapel are being conducted by the Rev. Mr. Haupt, while the vicar, Rev. Arthur Torrey, is away for a rest and change. Dr. C. Ernest Smith is out of the city and his services at St. Thomas' are being held by the Rev. A. S. Hawksworth, his assistant. The clergy in charge at St. Mark's Church during July and August are Rev. Thomas Shoesmith and Rev. Horace W. Stowell. Rev. C. T. Warren, of St. Alban's Parish, expects to leave the city for a short while in August, when he will visit the Rev. Giles Buckner Palmer, at White Post, Va.

At the people's open-air service the preacher on Sunday, July 31, was Rev. James Kirkpatrick, rector of Norwood Parish.

Rev. J. Henning Nelms has begun his work regularly as rector of Silver Spring Parish, having held services on Sunday, July 31, at Grace Church, Woodside, in the morning, and St. Mary's Chapel, Aspen, in the afternoon.

Bishop Harding's sister-in-law, Mrs. Josephine Douglas Creyke, died at the Bishop's House, Cathedral Close, on July 29. Mrs. Creyke was the widow of Rolf Creyke, Gloucestershire, Eng. She is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Edward G. Love, of New York, and Miss Harriet Douglas, who makes her home with her brother-in-law, the Bishop of Washington.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Training for Lay Readers.

At St. Paul's Parish House, New York, there was held last year a dinner conference to consider enlisting and training men to serve as lay readers. Laymen were present from the Dioceses of New York, Long Island, New Jersey, Connecticut and Newark. The need for trained laymen was recognized, and appeals from Church authorities were read, asking that such be furnished. A letter was read from the late Bishop Burch, commending work that had been done under his direction, and appealing for more help.

An offer was made by the Seabury Society to do what it can to put a service leader in the field, free to give his whole time and to go into all parts of the Diocese of New York, and into other Dioceses if invited to do so, and assist Church laymen in development of plans, and in personal training, to labor for increased numbers in the ministry of the Church, for greater success for the Nation-Wide Campaign, for wider publicity of Church affairs and needs, always co-operating with the Church publicity leaders, and for the founding of a Summer Conference on Greenwood Lake, that shall be unlike present conferences in that it is an exchange of methods for work by all Christian people. All work proposed is in the direction of scientific management, as based on Christ's methods in dealing with material things.

The Seabury Society has been merged since the St. Paul's Parish House conference into an American Board of Applied Christianity. The change was made in part upon the advice of the late Bishop Burch, in which advice many Christian leaders concurred. Efforts to place a service leader in the field for full time have been successful, and from August 1 the Rev. Roland C. Ormsbee serves as such leader. A second edition of the text-book, "Christ's Economy," is to be ready this fall, the first edition having been sold out Bishop Burch had promised to write an introduction to this second edition, as he had written that to the first edition, but died with the request of the Board on his desk. Forty-two churches of the New York Metropolitan District, some of them the largest in the district, and including Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian, have asked assistance in the training of their laymen for service.

The plan contemplates training for volunteer workers only—clerks, lawyers, business men, who give spare time. No salaries are ever to be paid. The plans are not official, but are loyal in all things to all of the churches. Major General Leonard Wood is honorary president of the Board, and the chairman of the Council, the Hon. Frederick Irving Cox, has just been named by President Harding a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Rev. Dr. Randall C. Hall, professor-emeritus in the General Seminary, but for thirty years active in teaching there, is dead at the age of seventy-eight. His death occurred in the house in Wallingford, Conn., in which he was born. For some years he has served as assistant at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, and his funeral took place from that church on July 30. He had been associated with the General Seminary since 1869.

GEORGIA

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese. D. D., Bishop.

Vacation Occupations.

The Bishop, with Mrs. Reese, left for his vacation on July 29, and will spend two months at East Gloucester, Mass. The Rev. John Durham Wing, D. D., rector of Christ Church, Savannah, with his family, is spending the month of August in Habersham County, Diocese of Atlanta. Dr. Wing has been asked by the Rev. Thomas Duck, of Cornelia, in charge of the missions in that section, to hold a service at historic Grace Church, Clarkesville. It was at this church that the convention met in May, 1840, and elected the Rev. Stephen Elliott, Jr., the first Bishop of the Diocese of Georgia. The Rev. H. Hobart Barber, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, with his family, has a cottage at Brevard, N. C. Mr. Barber, who is vice-chairman of the Department of Christian Social Service of the Bishop and Executive Council, will attend the provincial summer school at Sewanee, especially to study Social Service under Dean Lathrop. The Rev. William T. Dakin, rector of St. John's Church, Savannah, with Mrs. Dakin, is in New England for six weeks, and the Rev. J. D. Miller, rector of St. Michael and All Angels' Church, Savannah, is at Little Switzerland, N. C., where he spends his vacation every summer.

Personal Notes

The Rev. George Woodward Lamb, secretary of the convention, Diocese of Pittsburgh, is in charge of St. Michael's Parish, Germantown, Philadelphia, during the summer, in the absence of the rector, the Rev. Gilbert E. Pember. Mr. Lamb's address is St. Michael's Parish House, Germantown, Philadelphia.

The Rev. William M. Walton read at a recent service in St. Matthias' Church, Summerton, S. C., a note of resignation just mailed to the Bishop. He referred to the fact that the period he had specified was long passed that objectives (including the beautiful new church at Summerton) had been reached and that on September 1 he proposed to close his engagement at St. Matthias Church. The Bishop responded:

"Now, with regard to your determination to resign at Summerton within the next three months, let me say that I have just received a communication from Mr. Lucien Brailsford, signed by practically every member of the congregation, asking me to induce you to remain at Summerton a little longer.

"This memorial will be highly gratifying to you, and reveals more clearly than anything I have yet heard how much the people at Summerton love and appreciate you. I am enclosing the testimonial, as you may like to keep it among your archives."

During his month-of-August vacation from Marietta, the Rev. Alan Pressley Wilson will be in charge of Emmanuel Church, Anacostia, D. C. He will live at 1653 Edmondson Avenue, Baltimore, where he should be addressed.

Mr. Thomas A. Scott, a communicant of St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va., has accepted the position of Executive Secretary extended him by the Bishop and Executive Board of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia. Mr. Scott has announced his purpose to enter upon his duties the first of September.

The Rev. Walter R. Noe, of Wilmington, N. C., will take charge of St. Peter's Church, Roanoke, Va., for the coming month.

The Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, rector of Trinity Church, Williamsport, Pa., will again preach at St. Thomas' Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-third Street, New York City, Sunday, August 14. Until that date his address will be 63 Beverly Road, Kew Gardens, L. I., telephone Richmond Hill 7190. After that date he will spend two weeks at Dahoga, Pa.

Rev. Edmund Pendleton Dandridge, of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Petersburg, after making a careful investigation of the new field, has decided to decline the call to Trinity Church, Columbia, S. C.

Family Department

AUGUST.

1. Monday.
6. Saturday. Transfiguration.
7. Eleventh Sunday after Trinity.
14. Twelfth Sunday after Trinity.
21. Thirteenth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Wednesday. St. Bartholomew.
28. Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity.
31. Wednesday.

Collect for the Transfiguration of Christ.

O God, Who on the mount didst reveal to chosen witnesses Thine only begotten Son wonderfully transfigured, in raiment white and glistening: Mercifully grant that we, being delivered from the disquietude of this world, may be permitted to behold the King in His beauty, Who with Thee, O Father, and Thee, O Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for Eleventh Sunday After Trinity.

O God, Who declares Thy almighty power chiefly in showing mercy and pity; Mercifully grant unto us such a measure of Thy grace, that we, running the way of Thy commandments, may obtain Thy gracious promises, and be made partakers of Thy heavenly treasure; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Memory.

"The memory of Thy great goodness."—Psalm 145:7.

It meets me at the break of day
And makes me every morning glad;
It travels with me all the way,
And comforts me when I am sad;
This memory of love and grace
Abides with me in every place.

I will extol Thee, O my King,
And I will always bless Thy name:
Though I am weak, Thy praise to sing,
I would abundantly proclaim
How tender is Thy gentleness,
How wnderful Thy righteousness!

The Lord is gracious unto all,
Full of compassion is Thy heart;
Thou listeneth when Thy children call,
Thou wilt not from Thy poor depart.
The eyes of all wait upon Thee,
And all shall Thy salvation see.

Thou raisest those that he bowed down,
And Thou upholdest all who fall,
For humble souls Thou hast a crown
And liberty for those in thrall;
And all who in Thy Kingdom are
Are guided by Thy sun and star.

Unto all generations good
Thou hast been, as Thu art to me;
O Father, Who hast by me stood,
I thank Thee for my memory:
Hope bids me fear no change of ill,
Thy goodness great will bless me still.

—Marianne Farningham.

By Whom We Pray.

A picture used to hang in my mother's chamber during the latter years of her life. It had little artistic merit, but the sentiment which produced it seemed genuine and sincere. The picture portrayed a simple bedroom in an old-fashioned farm-house, with bare floor and sloping ceiling. The darkness was already gathering in the corners of the room, but the wide bedstead was still in the light. Curled on the bed was a black kitten asleep, or purring softly. And kneeling at the foot of the bed, her arms folded on the worn quilt and her face hidden on her arms, was a little girl, in a long white gown, saying her night prayers.

Such a scene brings different suggestions to different minds. Among them is the sense of contrast—the contrast between the "two worlds." One of these is the world of outward things, of things that can be seen and heard and handled. The other is the spiritual world of personal thought and will and action.

As an event in this material world. in the unfolding of the earth's physical history, the little child saying her prayers, alone in the quiet room, is of utter insignificance, scarcely more important than the chirp of cricket in the grass outside or the twinkle of the evening star shining clearer as the sunset fades.

But as we open our minds to the spiritual world, what tremendous personal forces meet in the utterance of that little heart. For, to render possible that child's prayer, the infinite and eternal God—Father, Son and Holy Ghost—must be acting in the fulness of His love and power at this very point of time and space, at this evening hour and in this darkening room.

That Christian child could not say one word of true and acceptable prayer unless God the Father had willed that she should so speak to Him; unless God the Son had become man and died and risen that through His mediation she might come unto the Father in Him; and unless God the Holy Ghost were giving her words to speak and taking His place in her heart to say the words with her. "And when that cry goes up before the throne, it will be heard and remembered, because the Holy Ghost prepared and sent it, the Son perfected it, the Father received it. Therefore, every child's lispings of prayer enfold the mysteries of the Eternal Trinity."

This is only what St. Paul tells all Christians, old or young, that God has "sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying 'Abba,' 'Father,'" and that we all, through Jesus Christ, who "reconciled us unto God by His cross," have "access by one Spirit unto the Father."

The prayers that I say, if they are true Christian prayers, do not begin with myself. I do not originate them, though they express my deepest longing, my truest self. These prayers come to me from God the Holy Ghost. He breathes into me, by the inspiration of His love, the "holy desires" which then, by His help, I breathe out in aspiration to God. And by that same Spirit these desires are carried up to the Father's loving heart and accepted through the mediation of His well-beloved Son.—Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, in "The Work of Prayer."

Power of a Sweet Voice.

There is no power of love so hard to get and keep as a kind voice. A kind hand is deaf and dumb. It may be rough in flesh and blood, yet do the work of a soft heart, and do it with a soft touch. But there is no one thing that love so much needs as a sweet voice to tell what it means and feels; and it is hard to get and keep it in the right tone. One must start in youth, and be on the watch night and day, at work and play, to get and keep a voice that shall speak at all times the thoughts of a kind heart. But this is the time when a sharp voice is most apt to be got. You often hear boys and girls say words at play with a quick, sharp tone, as if it were the snap of a whip. When one of them gets vexed you will hear a voice that sounds as if it were made up of a snarl, a whine and a bark. Such a voice often speaks worse than the heart feels. It shows more ill-will in the tone than in the words. It is often in mirth that one gets a voice or a tone that is sharp, which sticks to him through life, and stirs up ill-will and grief, but falls like a drop of gall on the sweet joys at home. Such as these get a sharp home-voice for use, and keep their best voices for those they meet elsewhere, just as they would save their best cakes and pies for guests and all their sour food for their own board. I would say to all boys and girls: "Use your guest voice at home. Watch it day by day, as a pearl of great price, for it will be worth more to you in days to come than the best pearl hid in the sea. A kind voice is a joy like a lark's song to a hearth and home. It is to the heart what light is to the eye. It is a light that sings as well as shines. Train it to sweet tones now, and it will keep in tune through life."

Sunrise.

The somber skies a sudden brightness show,
The clouds and mist reflect a golden glow,
And far and near what tender glories flow
As sunrise comes!

The spreading hills upraise themselves in song,
The streams soft murmur as they move along;
What hopes and yearnings rise in rapid throng
When sunrise calls!

The slumb'ring city wakens from its sleep,
The streets and homes no longer silence keep;
O faithful heart, forget thy sorrows deep
With sunrise near!

The night will pass, God's dawn will come again.
Your doubts and fears will vanish like the rain,
And you will smile away the haunting pain—
'Tis sunrise now!

—Abram S. Isaacs, in S. S. Times.

John Manderson's Questions.

"Where have I failed?" asked John Manderson of himself, as he settled down in the Morris chair after he returned from Sunday school. His thoughts ran back over the five years he had been superintendent of the Sunday school.

Had he failed? How the incidents of these years stood out before him! Girls and boys who were twelve years old when he became superintendent had come to the border-land of manhood and womanhood. Were they five years nearer the Christian's estate? Some were; yes, he could remember many of them by name. But others—well, what could be said about the others? Some were still in contact with the church and school influence, but the ties that bound them were all so slight. And some—and some—! The hot tears filled John Manderson's eyes as he thought of some whose childish faces had once smiled back at him as he stood at the desk, but now were seen no more in Sunday school. Dead? No; that would be sad enough. But some were already started on the certain downward path to moral wreckage. Yes, he saw one of the boys only yesterday. His face, young as it was, was coarsened by the beginning of a wild life.

Had he failed as a superintendent? Of course, he wasn't the teacher of these young folks. Surely the main responsibility rested on the teachers. But—did it? How persistent that question was! After all, was it anybody's responsibility, or was it just the law of average? Some can be held and some can't be held. That seemed plausible at first, but somehow it didn't comfort John Manderson much.

How far was he, the superintendent, responsible for the work of the teachers? It wasn't a pleasant question, and he wished it hadn't come up. But there it was. Really, he had always felt that the questions of the teacher's work and influence were matters for her to settle, and not for him. But was that true, after all?

Some of his teachers were choice ones, indeed; they were careful students of the Book they taught, and equally careful students of the pupils to whom they taught the Book. But some others were only fair, and some were very poor teachers indeed. It was very hard to get teachers in St. John's Sunday school, and sometimes he had to take any he could get. And so it happened that in a part of his school very indifferent teaching work had been done; and he knew it, and had known it these five long years.

Was he responsible for this condition? Almost angrily he tried to put the question from him, but back it came every time. If he wasn't responsible, who was? He thought the pastor equally culpable, but that didn't relieve him of his own share of the responsibility, which got heavier all the time.

After all, what had he really done to improve the teaching work of the school? Teachers had come, and had stayed on or had gone out of the work. He had talked to them often about their class work, but there he had stopped. Oh, yes, he had prayed for them, too; he was a man of prayer. But never once had he offered a single teacher a helpful hour of Bible study; never a chance to learn better the laws of teaching; never an opportunity to study carefully the mental and physical characteristics of the boys and girls under her care.

Never had he seen to it that the teachers were provided with helpful and stimulating books on their work. True, some had bought and read books of this character, but the majority of his teachers scarcely knew there were such books. Was that his fault? As he thought about it, it looked so.

How about himself? Had he enriched his own mind with helpful reading better to prepare him for his task? Why, he didn't recall reading a book on Sunday school work in all the five years; and yet he was spoken of as occupying the place in church next in importance to that of the pastor. Had he mingled with other Sunday school workers, each to share with the other his problems and his successes? No, truly, he hadn't: he'd been too busy.

Too busy* John Manderson didn't like the sound of that phrase, as he sat in the quiet of his home that Sunday. Is it possible to be too busy to do the Lord's work well? That is, does the Lord give us work to do and then deny us the time in which to do it faithfully?

The superintendent of St. John's Sunday school was quiet for a long time. The plans of his life were shifted in that quiet hour, and relationships were readjusted. His duty to his teachers and to his work became very plain, though simple, and a new purpose was conceived and carried out.—S. S. Times.

The Kingdom Within.

All the words of our Lord bespeak His divineness; Himself as God manifest in the flesh. And He honors man most in naming Himself as the Son of Man. The fulness of His love and honor for man appeared as He laid down His life for his redemption and restoration. And great, indeed, is His love and honor, when He assures us that the kingdom of heaven is within us. It was because of man's divine nature and possibilities that God so loved the world. And divine manhood is the Way, the Truth and the Life for our exaltation to our original high estate and sonship.

The wisdom and purpose of the coming of Jesus was to assure us of our high birth and possibilities, and to make everlasting righteousness familiar and practicable. His sacrifice established the sinfulness of sin and the fearful consequence of broken law. And His blessed Spirit has given assurance of the possibilities of righteousness and happiness: the high privilege of human life. Its operation realizes the kingdom of heaven within us; its fruits are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, meekness, faith.

The kingdom of heaven exixsts in faith: which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things unseen.

Our Lord came to bring in everlasting righteousness: to realize and make familiar all truth. The devil deprived our parents of the first Eden, by magnifying intellect; and he works now after his old way in making the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man an abstraction; and our holy religion a high science, a matter of logic and reason, an entertainment and a learned profession for the wise and prudent; its practice a thing for the poor and despised—for fishermen and working men and women; unlearned and ignorant. And yet the mist of human pride and diabolic intellect are fleeing before the rising light of the living Saviour; and men

"In crowding ranks on every side arise, Demanding life, impatient for the skies."

The kingdom of heaven within us is becoming more and more a familiar truth and fact.

To the outer world mankind are showing their divine sonship in the direction of omniscience, omnipresence and omnipotence, and in their souls are enjoying a peace and happiness that bespeaks the kingdom of heaven within.

According to the prophet, the man of the latter day is to be "as a hiding place from the wind, a covert from the tempest, as rivers of water in a dry place, and the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." A man is to be "more precious than gold, even than the golden wedge of Ophir."

The promises of our Lord are to those to whom His mind is the kingdom of heaven within us. They regard this present world as well as that to come, and life worth living. They are: To the poor in spirit; their's is the kingdom of heaven. To those that mourn, comfort. To the meek, the blessing of earth. To those that hunger and thirst for righteousness, fullness. To the merciful, mercy. To the peace-makers, to be children of God.

And the kingdom of heaven within makes His little ones the light and salt of the earth. Its realities are the people who, as unambitious, honorable and good citizens, lead quiet and godly lives, letting their soft and modest light shine to the glory of God.

In our day Mammon, that stands for the world, the flesh and the devil, the kingdom of this world, is made up as of old. The fruits of the flesh are: Adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings and such like. Against these are the quiet and happy lives of pious people; and they make what we know as our civilization.

But the kingdom of heaven within is the grand idea—ideal and possibility of the day in which we live. And all the pictures and visions of the kingdom of heaven: the new Jerusalem, with its gates of pearl and walls of jasper, and foundations of precious stones; the Garden with its springs and fountains and fruits and flowers; the present light and glory of God and the Lamb. All these tell of the loyal and well-kept soul, hungering and thirsting for truth and righteousness, and enjoying the fulness of the present God.

The soul secured in such existence lives its life, utterly regardless of surroundings and conditions. And such lives compared with the fearful follies and vices and burlesques of the world are as heaven to hell. The great successes of Vanity Fair are vexatious and monstrous absurdities. The logic of latter day life is the reductio ad absurdum. Its grandest glories are sacrifices for truth and righteousness' sake.

Two proverbs of King Solomon ought to be made familiar in all schools and colleges: So are the ways of him that is greedy of gain; that taketh away the life of the owners thereof.

"Through wisdom is a house builded: By understanding it is established; and by knowledge shall the chambers thereof be filled with all precious and pleasant riches.

Greed and ambition destroy life; Godly wisdom makes heaven of it.

W.

Cemetery Huts in France to Open.

With the beginning of the tourist season the American Y. W. C. A. in France is to reopen its hostess huts at the American cemeteries in which our boys lie at rest. Through these shelters visiting relatives are given hospitality and assistance. Many bereaved relatives alone in France during previous summers have already expressed their heartfelt appreciation of the helpful and sympathetic services of these Y. W. C. A. representatives. Many mothers unable to make the journey have received much comfort from the location of their sons' graves and personal services in their name.

This summer the cemetery huts are to be located at Romagne, Bony, Belleau Wood and Ferre-en-Tardenois.

A thousand Ingersolls in every country under the sun would not do so much to create disbelief of the truth among men, as the spectacle of a church inheriting promises, which she seems unable to believe, and receiving commandments which she seems unwilling to execute.—Thoburn.

For the Young Folks

Remember—The Little Member.

You may keep your feet from slipping
And your hands from evil deeds
But to guard your tongue from tripping,
What unceasing care it needs!
Be you old or be you young,
Oh, beware,
Take good care
Of the tittle-tattle, tell-tale tongue!

You may feel inclined to quarrel
With the doctrine that I preach,
But the soundness of the moral
Sad experiences will teach:
Be it said or be it sung
Everywhere,
Oh, beware,
Of the tittle-tattle, tell-tale tongue!
—Henry Johnstone, in St. Nicholas.

A Rainy Sunday at Home.

By Mary Callum Wiley.

"Oh, dear!" said Annebel, "I wish it would stop raining!"

"What would you do?" said Fred. "You couldn't go anywhere, 'cause it's Sunday."

"Or do anything," said Joe.

"Auntie says if you want to see something," said Tom, suddenly appearing at the door, "come out to the kitchen."

The children needed no second bidding. All day they had been housed in, and now, as the afternoon dragged by, they were restless and cross, and ready for anything.

"Why! What in the world!" they cried as they ran into the kitchen. Their aunt was standing by the table with her sleeves rolled up and a big apron on, spreading wet sand over a map she had sketched with chalk on the top of the table.

"It's a map of Palestine," said Tom. "See, we are going to make it out of sand and put in the mountains and the valleys and the rivers and everything."

"Oh!" said the children. They had never seen anything like it, for they had never studied geography with a sand map. They lived in the country and went to an old-fashioned "district school." But their aunt explained how the map was to be made, and in a little while they were busy at work, piling up the sand in places for mountains, smoothing it out for plains, and making rivers and lakes out of bits of looking-glass.

"As our map is a representation of the home of the children of Israel," said auntie, "don't you think it would be nice to mark in some way the different places where Bible events happened?"

"Yes," said the children. "But how can we do it?"

"Take Bethlehem, for instance," said auntie. "What has happened there?"

"Jesus was born there," said the children quickly.

"Yes," said auntie, "but I mean in Old Testament times."

"David lived there," said Tom.

"And Ruth," added Annebel.

"Then, why not mark Bethlehem with a sheep," and auntie drew a tiny animal out of the Noah's ark she had brought down for the purpose, and placed it on the map. "This will show," she said, "that David lived a shepherd boy here."

"Put down a lion, then," said Joe, "and a bear, too."

"All right," laughed auntie; "and I drop a grain of corn, too, to remind us of Ruth."

"Where's the place where David fought Goliath?" asked Tom.

"Here," said auntie, pointing to a narrow valley southwest of Bethlehem. "Here's where the Philistines came up to fight the children of Israel."

"Well, I've got a splendid picture of a giant," said Tom ;"that'll do for that spot."

"Didn't Samson go down here to Gaza once?" asked Henry, studying the map in the back of auntie's Bible.

"Look it up in the sixteenth chapter of Judges," said auntie.

While Henry was reading up on Samson, the others were eagerly asking questions and looking up references. For they soon found that they had to keep their Bibles open in order to mark their map correctly. Each child was given a certain part of the map to work up, and whenever he was in doubt about anything or couldn't find a story in the Bible, auntie helped him out.

When, at length, the map was done, father and mother were called in to view it. Each place on the map was eagerly pointed out. There was a tiny temple to mark Jerusalem, a ladder Bethel, a boat loaded with logs (matches broken in two) Tyre; bits of rock piled up showed Mt. Carmel, where Elijah called down fire from heaven. A grave marked Mt. Nebo; twelve pebbles the Jordan, where the children of Israel crossed. At Shiloh, where little Samuel lived with Eli, was a tiny lighted candle; at Jericho, a tiny section of wall. In the valley before Mt. Sinai, a paper tabernacle was erected; on Mt. Sinai two flat stones were placed. The cave on the side of the Dead Sea, where David found Saul, was marked by two pasteboard swords crossed; the cave where the witch of Endor lived, by fumes of sulphur rising and a flickering light. A tiny bottle of oil stood for Zarephath, a measure of flour for Samaria, a bunch of grapes for Jezreel, a lock of hair for the country where Samson did his exploits, a doll's pitcher with a burning match in it the place were Gideon overcame the Midianites.

"Well, well," said father, when he had had everything explained to him and when he had asked all the questions he could think of, "you've learned more Bible history this afternoon than you had learned before in a month of Sundays."

"The Wait-a-Minute Business."

"Marguerite, will you be kind enough to bring papa's slippers downstairs?"

"Wait a minute, papa; I'm just putting my dolly to sleep."

"Marguerite, will you put your playthings in their place; they are in my way," as kindly asked mamma from the dining-room a few minutes later.

"Wait a minute, mamma; I must run up-stairs for papa's slippers."

"Marguerite, will you help hunt my ball among these weeds?" called brother Thomas from the back yard.

"Wait a minute, Thomas, I must put my playthings out of the way; mamma said so."

"Supper, children!" called papa.

"Wait a minute," called Marguerite, "until we find the ball."

Marguerite was the sweetest, daintiest little lady imaginable. An erect, well-poised, supple, active little body surmounted by a haughty little head, with a dimpled kindly face framed in a mass of golden fluffy curls were her physical charms.

Her mental charms, too, were equal to those of the little body. Her cards came home from school each month with good marks, and were signed by both devoted parents with as much pride as they took in keeping the little body in good health.

During the last two months a little fault had begun to grow upon the the happy little lady which threatened to interfere with the good marks on the cards, as well as the happiness of the family and of Marguerite herself, if not interfered with. A triumvirate was formed that evening in the home composed of father, mother and Thomas. Their object was to make the beloved little daughter and sister see the evil of this constant putting off of disagreeable tasks.

"Mamma, I tore a snag in my dress while on my way from school; will you please darn it, at once, so that I can go to follow the organ-grinder with the girls?"

"Wait a minute, dear," calmly responded mamma, as she quietly stitched away at her mending.

"But, mamma, I can't wait; if I do the organ-grinder and the monkey will be gone."

When the mending was finished mamma folded it quietly and carefully, and then as deliberately and carefully mended the "barn door" in the red cashmere dress of the impatient Marguerite.

In a few minutes the little maid returned with tears of disappointment streaming from her eyes. "I was too late; the little monkey with the crimson cap, the organ-grinder and the children had gone when I got out, and all because I had to wait until my dress was mended."

"I fell over some playthings last evening, too, my dear, because some one was not ready to put them away when I requested it."

"Thomas! Thomas!" called Marguerite half an hour later, from the woodpile, "come and help lift this board over the fence, so we can make a see-saw."

"Just wait a minute, sister; I'm mending my football," called Thomas, as he quietly pasted the patches on the weak places in his football. Ten minutes later, Thomas gallantly obeying the summons from the wood-pile, dragged the heavy board over the fence, and was as gallantly teetering on the short end of the see-saw when mother called, "Supper, children." Thomas, promptly alighting, obeyed the summons from within, but Marguerite followed afar, reluctant to go at the first call.

"There, Thomas Holt, you spoiled the whole thing just because you fixed that old football before you made the see-saw."

"And I," replied Thomas, "had to leave my best baseball out in the rain last night because you were not ready to help hunt it when I asked you."

"Papa, will you hear me read my lesson for tomorrow, now?" asked Marguerite, after supper.

"Wait a minute, daughter, until I finish my paper." When at last the paper was finished, the little head rested quietly on the snowy pillow of her cot, and the little mind was free from the cares of the day.

Next evening Marguerite came home in a flood of tears. "I was kept in, and all because papa would not hear me read when I asked him."

"And papa was compelled to walk up-stairs last evening for his slippers after his long walk home, because his little daughter was not ready to go for them when he asked her," replied mamma.

Marguerite threw herself for a minute on the couch, and then, brushing away the tears, walked sturdily to the sitting-room to her mother.

"Say, mamma, let's give up this 'wait-a-minute business.' I don't like it; do you?"

"No, indeed, I do not, dear; and I am glad to give it up; when shall we begin?"

"Now," said Marguerite.

Papa and Thomas also were willing to abandon the "wait-a-minute business," and from that day to this, "wait a minute" has never been said by the members of the Holt household; and were the humblest stranger to request a glass of water at the wayside home, the little golden-haired daughter would be the first and most gracious in serving it.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Bird Language.

When I go out to study birds with glasses and a book,
Sometimes its rather trying when I have to look and look,
In order to identify some little feathered thing,
By just a touch of color on its head or breast or wing.

'Twould help so much if all the birds could be as nice as some
Who are so kind and civil that whene'er they see us come
A-peeping through the leafy boughs and seeking them afar,
To learn their names, are good enough to tell us who they are.

Our brave "Bob White" seems very glad to call that name of his,
And "Chickadee" is willing, quite, to tell us who he is;
And likewise, too, the "Whip-Poor-Will" and Mr. "Bob-o'-Link,"
The "Cuckoo" and the "Phoebe" bird, the "Peewee" and "Chewink."

Yet, while those birds are very kind, they might do something more
To help us learn their Latin names: the task is such a bore!
How fine, if one of them should call through twilights calm and still,
"An-tros-to-mus vo-cif-erus" instead of "Whip-Poor-Will!"

Should Robin Redbreast gaily shout, instead of his old tune,
"Me-ru-la mi-gra-to-ri-a" we'd know his name full soon;
There's much in nature-study birds could pleasantly beguile
If all of them would sing their names in Latin for awhile.

—St. Nicholas.

The South's Best Book St re
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Ladies Let Cuticura Keep Your Skin Fresh and Young
Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V, Malden, Mass.

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond
1104 East Main Street

MIDNIGHT A STEALTHY SOUND IS HEARD!
The burglar is making a call.
While honest men sleep, the prowling thief is after the valuables lying carelessly around the house.
Protect your treasures the best way. All-steel boxes for rent here as low as $3.00 per year.
See Mr. Andrews.
PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK
Main and Twelfth Streets
RICHMOND, - - - - - VIRGINIA

Do You Know

How many Episcopalians there are in the United States?
The population of the various countries of the world?
The chief auto pleasure routes in the United States, and their distances?
The yearly production of the various crops for the last ten years?
The laws governing marriage and divorce?
The military and navy data of all countries?

All these questions, and thousands of others, are answered in the "World Almanac and Encyclopedia," which we are giving away to our customers and to all those starting new accounts.

National State and City Bank
1111 EAST MAIN STREET, -:- RICHMOND, VA.

CHURCH PEWS
PULPIT FURNITURE
SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAIRS, BLACKBOARDS, ETC.
Virginia School Supply Company
2010-12 West Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and By

Richmond, Va.

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either

138 Fulton Street, New York City

or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseless, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.

Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage

Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds.

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE

Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.

Flowers of Quality

R. L. Christian & Co.

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocers

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES.

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Nick Bull's Market

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME.

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

Trust.

In the bitter waves of woe,
Beaten and tossed about,
By the sullen winds that blow
From the desolate shores of doubt—

When the anchors that faith had cast
Are dragging in the gale,
I am quietly holding fast
To the things that cannot fail:

I know that right is right;
That it is not good to lie;
That love is better than spite,
And a neighbor than a spy;

I know that passion needs
The leash of a sober mind;
I know that generous deeds
Some sure reward will find;

That the rulers must obey;
That the givers shall increase;
That Duty lights the way
For the beautiful feet of Peace—

In the darkest night of the year,
When the stars have all gone out,
That courage is better that fear,
That faith is truer than doubt;

And fierce though the fiends may fight,
And long though the angels hide,
I know that Truth and Right
Have the universe on their side;

And that somewhere, beyond the stars
Is a Love that is better than fate;
When the night unlocks her bars
I shall see Him, and I will wait.
—Washington Gladden.

The Use of Prayer.

We go to God imploring Him to save us from the coming sorrow, and because He does not save us and the sorrow comes, we wonder. But He gives us a better thing than that we ask for; not deliverance from trouble, but power to bear it, and grace to profit by it, and a heart to thank Him for it. And this shows us the chief value and use of prayer. It is not so much to alter God's purposes as to reconcile us to those purposes. We expect it to regulate God's providence; but, instead of this, it unlocks the treasures of God's grace.—C. Bradley.

J. & R. Lamb

23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC MARBLE STONE GRANITE
CARVED WOOD METAL ETC.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.
Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

R. GEISSLER, INC.
NEW YORK
56 W. 8. STREET.
CHURCH
FURNISHINGS
WINDOWS — TABLETS
FABRICS — EMBROIDERIES
MEMORIALS

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

HOT WATER HEAT

For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

SERVICE

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

IT PAYS

In a five weeks' canvass among the church members in one city, a subscription representative of the Southern Churchman earned in commissions and bonuses $186.25.

A young woman in a small community, by putting in an hour or two a day taking subscriptions for this paper, realized in a week $11.25.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER.

All summer hats reduced. $15.00 hats to $7.50; $10.00 hats to $5.00. Avail yourself of this opportunity and wear a pretty summer hat.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

BOARDING.

GREER HOUSE, FOR STUDENTS AND Church women during the summer months. Reduced rates. Apply to Director, Greer House, 123 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.

ROOM, BREAKFAST AND 6 O'CLOCK dinner for a small number of students, in a pretty home near the University of Virginia. Law students preferred. Address "L.," Progress Office, Charlottesville, Va.

Cathedral Studio.—English Church embroideries and materials. Stoles with crosses, $7; plain, $5.50; handsome gift stoles, $12 up; Burse and veil, $15, $20. Surplices and exquisite altar linens. L. V. Mackrille, Washington, D. C. Tel. Chev. 1915.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A TEACHER FOR THREE children. Usual English branches and music. Address Mrs. J. C. Saunders, Premier, W. Va.

WANTED—A REFINED, EDUCATED lady, with bright disposition, not over forty-five years of age, as companion. Must understand knitting and fancy work, and must be a good reader. Address Mrs. Haw, 816 Park Avenue, Richmond, Va.

WANTED—HOUSEKEEPER FOR FAMily of adults. Conveniently arranged home, modern improvements. No laundering. References required. Address Mrs. J. P. H. Mason, Accotink, Va.

WANTED—A COMPANION-HOUSEKEEPer in Washington, D. C. References exchanged. Address "C. M.," care of Southern Churchman.

SITUATION WANTED.

WANTED—A POSITION AS PRINCIPAL, assistant or matron in a school, or as chaperon in a private family. Address Mrs. J. B. Chew, Fredericksburg, Va.

A LADY WITH EXPERIENCE IN teaching and the care of a home desires position as matron in school or college, or as governess in private family. Branches taught: Mathematics, English, French, Latin and Music. References given. Address Mrs. W. M. Cunningham, 860 Paxton Street, Danville, Va.

REFINED, CAPABLE WOMAN DESIRES engagement as managing housekeeper, house mother in school, or care or gentleman's home and children. References. Address "L. S.," care of Southern Churchman.

NEEDY CHURCHWOMAN DESIRES POsition as housemother in a school, or as companion or housekeeper. Address R. W. B., care of Southern Churchman.

CULTURED LADY DESIRES POSITION as companion to elderly lady. References exchanged. Address "X.," care of Southern Churchman.

A LADY DESIRES POSITION TO TEACH English, French and Music. Have had several years' experience. References given and required. Address Miss J. Randolph, Arrington, Va.

WANTED—BY ELDERLY LADY, POSItion to teach small children, or be companion, or do Church work. References exchanged. Asks $25 and board per month. Address "Y.," care of Southern Churchman.

HIGH SCHOOL PUPIL SEEKS TO WORK through his course. Fourteen-year-old son of Episcopal missionary desires to do light work in a good home where there is a high school of good repute. Missionary's home is nineteen miles away from nearest school, and unless this boy finds the right home he will have to go out to work. Strong healthy, ambitious. Drives a Ford car. All he asks is reasonable opportunity for accurate work in his classes. Write to "A. X. M.," care Southern Churchman.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to call home April 29, 1921, our beloved fellow-worker, NANNIE L. SCOTT, we, the members of the Auxiliary of Manakin Church, Powhatan County, wish to record our sorrow in our loss and to express our high esteem of a life so full of generosity, unselfishness and service to all. Surely she will hear the answer, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." She left earth in love and charity with all.

Resolved, that as tribute to her memory we will most earnestly strive to carry forward the work of our Auxiliary, of which she was a devoted and loyal member.

BESSIE M. ARCHER, Sec.

MRS. MATILDA PAGE LAIRD.

Died in Wilmington, Del., in the thirty-second year of her age, on the afternoon of the 10th instant, after a brief illness, MATILDA PAGE LAIRD, wife of Dr. Joseph Packard Laird, of Miami, Fla., and eldest daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Frank Page, of Oakland, Hanover County, Va., and Letty Morris, his wife.

The passing away of this lovely young Christian woman in her early prime has not only stricken her devoted husband and deprived her little son of the unequaled blessing of a mother's tender care, but has grieved deeply a large family connection to whom her gentle and affectionate nature, her loyalty and her wide and deep sympathies had ever endeared her.

Born in Fairfax, Va., where her father was rector of Truro Parish, and named for her maternal grandmother, one of the saints, she was a member of a family of devoted churchmen, and by her marriage she entered another connection, not less widely known for their Christian piety. Personally devoted to the principles in which she had been reared, she illustrated by her life the traditions and the teachings of those whom she knew and loved best.

To one who remembers her from her earliest childhood with her sweet and unselfish nature and firm principles, her development into a devoted and spiritual churchwoman was a natural and, indeed, a necessary transition.

She ever, even from childhood, did her part earnestly in the work of her father's parish, and whether in Texas, in Brooklyn or in Virginia, she impressed on all about her the conviction of what was, indeed, the keynote of her life—a desire to help and to give happiness to others. Her radiant cheerfulness shed sunshine around her and her kindness was a benediction to all about her. A working woman paid her the tribute, "She cared whether her servants were tired." It was the epitome of her life, "She cared," and those who knew her best will ever retain the sweet memory of her fragrant personality, now crowned with perpetual youth.

Her husband will, in his great bereavement, have the sympathy of many more than he knows.

HER UNCLE, T. N. P.

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thous. and churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER

Hagerstown, Maryland.

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING

72 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Gold, Silver and Brass

Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.

108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South

We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)

264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL FOR WOMEN

FARMVILLE, VIRGINIA

ESTABLISHED 1884. J. L. JARMAN, President

Thirty-eighth session opens September 14th, 1921. Two-year Professional courses, four-year College course. Moderate Expense.

For Catalogue, address The Registrar,

State Normal School for Women, Farmville, Virginia.

STAMMERING CAN BE CURED

A letter addressed to the principal of our school from Rev. Quincy Ewing, Rector of Christ Episcopal Church, Napoleonville, La., whose son, Quincy Jr., was cured in less than 30 days. Other letters as convincing as this in our files.

Napoleonville, La., July 16, 1921.

Mr. J. L. Booty,
Tyler, Texas.

Dear Mr. Booty: Quincy, Jr., reached home yesterday morning. I am not only satisfied, I am delighted: and not only delighted, but profoundly grateful to you for what you have done for him. Yesterday down town he talked to a number of my friends and his and later they all met me with smiles and congratulations, and the wonder was: How did he do it? I want to say to you very feelingly, my dear Mr. Booty, that you have lifted a painful worry from my heart and mind and that in your debt I shall always be. I know something of stammering schools and I think what you have found in regard to the cause of stammering is hidden from them, and the results you get acclaim the wisdom of your method. I devoutly hope that thousands of boys and girls who stammer, with the prospect of a terrible handicap through life, may get the benefit of your wonderful discovery and personal guidance.

Sincerely,
QUINCY EWING.

YOUR MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED
SCHOOL FOR STAMMERERS TYLER, TEXAS

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President — E. B. Addison, Vice-President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary — J. C. Watson, Treasurer
J. M. Leake, General Agent — Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

"An Unqualified Success"

CHRIST CHURCH, SPRINGFIELD MASS.

"Christ Church, Springfield, Mass., has used the New Hymnal for a couple of years. We all consider it an unqualified success."

(Signed) John M. McGann.
Rector.

THE NEW HYMNAL

Single copies	$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more	1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more	1.00 cash

Carriage charges extra

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND

14 Wall Street, New York

The Richmond Mica Co.

Oldest Ground Mica Factory in the World

Manufacturers of

GROUND MICA OF UNSURPASSED PURITY AND LUSTRE

BY EXCLUSIVE PROCESS.

Factory, 321-323 S. Ninth St.

Office, Cor. Eighth and Main Sts.

RICHMOND, VA.

To Mothers

And all Friends of Children:

What will you read to your boys and girls this summer to give them a religious message they will love?

Thousands have found the answer in

Sunny Windows

By W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

Author of "The Children's Year."

The first edition is already exhausted, and the second is on the press.

CLOTH, $1.25 NET

For Sale by
SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN
Richmond, Virginia

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE

JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW
Church House, 202 South 19th Street
Philadelphia, Pa.

PERSONNEL WORK

UNDER AUSPICES OF PRESIDING BISHOP AND COUNCIL

The last General Convention referred to the Presiding Bishop and Council the urgent need of a Department of Vacancy and Supply, created and controlled by the General Church, having as its principal function the establishment and operation of a bureau or bureaus from which bishops and parishes may secure full, prompt and accurate information about clergy seeking cures or temporary work.

In pursuance of the above, the Council has organized a Commission on Registration and Reference of Church Workers, with office at the Church Missions House.

This commission began its work April 12, 1920, and to date there have been registered with it 443 persons, both clerical and lay.

It has made a total of 526 references, 201 of which were clergy. It now has on the active list, 260 names as follows:

Clergy	74
Teachers, grade, languages, English History, Mathematics, Physical Education, Domestic Science, Religious Education, etc.	7
Social Service Workers, including Deaconesses	40
Parish Visitors	38
Organists	5
Work among Foreign Born Americans	70
Office Workers	26
Total	260

Of the above there are now out 93 references of Clergy and 166 of lay workers.

The commission is ready to register vacancies of all kinds in the Church and make reference of suitable workers for such vacancies.

No charge is made for the service.

The Commission has also been able to make arrangements for Clergy seeking temporary or summer supply work.

All communications should be addressed to the Commission on Registration and Reference of Church Workers, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City. Telephone Gramercy 3012.

PRESIDING BISHOP AND COUNCIL OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH
Publicity Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City

Southern Churchman

DOMINUS FRUSTRA ISIN 1835

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 20, 1921. No. 34.

Christian Service

Give me a faithful heart—
Likeness to Thee,
That each departing day
Henceforth may see
Some work of love begun,
Some deed of kindness done,
Some wanderer sought and won,
Something for Thee.

S. D. Phelps

EDUCATIONAL

Church Schools in the Diocese of Virginia, Inc.

RT. REV. WM. C. BROWN, D. D., President.

FOR BOYS:

ST. CHRISTOPHER'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Boarding and Day School. Separate Lower School for smaller boys. 6 bldgs., 15 acres of grounds and athletic fields. Small classes. Staff of 10 college graduates. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $650. Eleventh session begins Sept. 21, 1921.

Catalogue from REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, Ph. D., Headmaster.

CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL
Middlesex County, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater Virginia. 3 bldgs., 100 acre farm. Safe boating, bathing, fishing, Home influences. Ready accessibilty. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from REV. F. E. WARREN, Rector, P. O., Marl, Va.

FOR GIRLS:

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Day School (Boarding department planned for 1922). From Montessori through college preparatory courses, etc. 5 bldgs., 8 acre playground. Emphasis on healthy outdoor life. Catalogue from MISS ROSALIE HAXALL NOLAND, B. A., Principal.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL
Charlottesville, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Piedmont Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. From primary through college preparatory courses. Also music, art and general courses. Boarding department limited to 40 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $500. Twelfth session begins Sept. 21, 1921. Catalogue from MISS EMMA S. YERBY, Principal.

ST. MARGARET'S SCHOOL
Tappahannock, Essex County, Va.

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater Virginia. Beautiful location on Rappahannock River. 6 acres, central building antebellum home remodeled, with 2 new wings. All modern conveniences. From primary, through college preparatory courses. Also music and general courses. Boarding department limited to 32 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from MISS BERTHA A. LATANE, M. A., Principal.

Gifts and bequests for equipment, enlargement, scholarships, and endowment, requested. Address communications to REV. E. L. WOODWARD, M. D. Dean, 400 Old Dominion Trust Bldg., Richmond, Va.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

FASSIFERN SCHOOL, FOR GIRLS
Hendersonville, N. C.

Situated in the beautiful mountain country. College preparatory and general high school courses. Lower school for grades below high school. Music, Art, Athletics, Home Economics. Riding lessons under trained teacher. MISS KATE C. SHIPP, Principal.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-fourth session opens September 21, 1921.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean,
Petersburg, Va.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

What hope can there be for a creature like man, intellectual, spiritual, responsible, if he will not think? You can do nothing with a man who is not earnest—but you may do much with an earnest man, though a doubter.—A. Raleigh.

Mercifulness manifests itself in two ways: first, in patience and forbearance toward those who do wrong, leniency toward those who fail; and, secondly, in ministrations of kindness and love to those who are in need. The first of these manifestations is negative. The other phase of the quality is active and positive.—Rev. J. R. Miller, D. D.

Do not look forward to what might happen tomorrow; the same everlasting Father who cares for you today will take care of you tomorrow and every day. Either He will shield you from suffering or He will give unfailing strength to bear it. Be at peace, then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginations.—Francis de Sales.

(U. S. Destroyer in distance)
R. O. T. C. and NAVAL UNITS
A CHURCH SCHOOL FOR CHURCH BOYS.

Established 1867. Prepares for college and business life. Military training by Army officers. 8 Naval cutters, high-powered launch for Naval unit. Sea trips on U. S. war vessels. $70,000 improvements last year. Mild climate permits outdoor sports the year round. Unique training in carefulness and the value of money. Broader training than public schools. Separate School for smaller boys. Catalog.

REV. WALTER MITCHELL, D. D., Rector
Box A Charleston, S. C.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt.

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art, Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Noble record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH President.

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other partriculars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

EDUCATIONAL

GUNSTON HALL

1906 Florida Avenue, Washington, D. C.
A School for Girls.
Established 1892.

Preparatory and Academic Courses. Two years' post-graduate and college work. Music, Art and Expression; Domestic Science; Business and Secretarial Courses. Required athletics under trained supervision. Mrs. Beverley R. Mason, Principal.

National Cathedral School

A Boarding and Day School for Girls. Fireproof buildings in Cathedral Close of 40 acres. College Preparatory. Advanced and Special Courses. Music and Art.

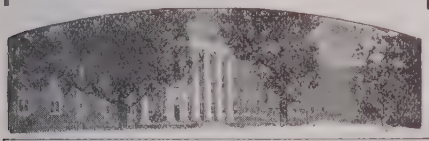
The Bishop of Washington,
President of the Board of Trustees.

Jessie C. McDonald, M. A., Principal.
Mount St. Alban, Washington, D. C.

The Divinity School of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia.

Founded by Bishop Alonzo Potter in 1862.

Special students admitted. Privilege of attending course of special study at the University of Pennsylvania.



For information address the Rev George G. Bartlett, S. T. D., Dean, 5001 Woodland Avenue.

CHATHAM Episcopal Institute

FOR GIRLS CHATHAM, VA.
RT. REV. B. D. TUCKER, D. D., PRESIDENT
Rev. C. Orlando Pruden, D. D., Rector

Beautiful and healthful location. 10-acre campus. Modern equipment. Athletics, Gym. College Preparatory. Music, Art, Domestic Science Expression. Certificate admits to leading colleges. Catalog

ANNIE MARION POWELL, M. A., PRINCIPAL, BOX 13

ST. MARY'S

AN EPISCOPAL SOUTHERN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS

Founded 1842. Four-year preparatory and two-year collegiate courses. Music, Art, Elocution, Domestic Science, Business. Gymnasium. Mild climate makes outdoor life possible the year round. 75-acre campus of old oaks. Fourteen electrically lighted, steam-heated buildings. Moderate rates. Catalog.

REV. WARREN W. WAY, RECTOR
BOX 19, ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, RALEIGH, N. C.

The Church Training and Deaconess House

OF PENNSYLVANIA

provides for resident students a two years' course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to

THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street. Philadelphia, Pa.

"Christ is the Life, and, therefore, Christ is the Resurrection. And the thing that we call death is but a film which spreads above, but has no power to penetrate into the depths of the relationship between us and Him."

A cobbler at Leyden, who used to attend the public disputations held at the Academy, was once asked if he understood Latin. "No," replied the mechanic, "but I know who is wrong in the argument." "How?" replied his friend. "Why, by seeing who is angry first."

The Christ sees in His people more than do others. They see their faults; Christ sees their virtues. And He sees far more in them than they see in themselves. Abraham, standing before God, said of himself, "I am but dust and ashes." But God said, He is My friend. Christ makes every allowance for His people; He speaks to them and of them apologetically.—D. F. Sprigg.

When we read the words of David Brainerd's consecration we do not wonder at the result of his life: "Here am I, Lord, send me; send me to the ends of the earth; send me to the rough, savage pagans of the wilderness; send me from all that is called comfort on earth; send me even to death itself, if it be but in Thy service, and to promote Thy kingdom.

Life passes, riches fly away, popularity is fickle, the senses decay, the world changes, friends die. One alone is constant; One alone is true to us; One alone can be true; One alone can be all things to us; One alone can supply our needs; One alone can give a meaning to our complex and intricate nature; One alone can give us tune and harmony; One alone can form and possess us. Are we allowed to put ourselves under His guidance? This surely is the only question.—John Henry Newman.

Every thunder-cloud has a rainbow lying in its depths when the sun smiles upon it. And our purest and noblest joys are transformed sorrows. The sorrow of contrite hearts becomes the gladness of pardoned children; the sorrow of bereaved, empty hearts may become the gladness of hearts filled with God. Every stroke of the ploughshare, and every dark winter's day, are represented in the broad acres waving with the golden grain.—A. Maclaren.

"What strange condescension, that He who hath the key of David should knock at the Father's gate and receive His own heaven by gift and entreaty. These are Manton's words of surprise at the first sentences of our Lord's prayer in St. John 17: "Father, glorify Thy Son." Even to Jesus it is said, "Ask of Me." God had one Son without sin, but never a son who did not pray. The cry of "Abba, Father!" is the mark of sonship. True prayer is the sign of a true-born child of God. "Behold, he prayeth," is the token by which each heir of glory is known.—C. H. Spurgeon.

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE

(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)

All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.

Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

PEABODY

BALTIMORE, MD.
The Leading Endowed Musical Conservatory in the Country.
Scholarships, Operatic training.
Tuition in all grades & Branches. Circulars mailed.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

Collegiate School for Girls

Incorporated.
In the city of Richmond, Va.

A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.

MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Stuyvesant School

WARRENTON, VA.

Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue

EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE

FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES WARRENTON, VA.

The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.

MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, PRINCIPAL, BOX 17

ST. FAITH'S

A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIDLS

Saratoga Springs - - - New York

Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate

Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address

The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL

Opposite William Byrd Park.

A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.
Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.

JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Sacramental Wine

Absolutely Pure Grape Wine

Made expressly for use at the Communion Table

Established 1857

Phone, Write or Call
Tel. Cortlandt 3001

H.T. Dewey & Sons Co.

Address Either
138 Fulton Street, New York City
or Cellars, Egg Harbor, New Jersey

Church Furnishings, Memorials, etc.

MOLLER PIPE ORGANS

Highest grade instruments. In use in three thousand churches. Every organ specially designed for the church and service in which it is to be used and fully guaranteed. Specifications and estimates on request. Correspondence solicited.

M. P. MÖLLER
Hagerstown, Maryland

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Cassocks, Surplices, Stoles

EMBROIDERIES

Silks, Cloths, Fringes

CLERICAL SUITS

Rabats, Collars, Shirts

COX SONS & VINING
72 Madison Avenue New York

CHURCH VESTMENTS

Gold, Silver and Brass
Church and Chancel Furniture

Write for Catalogue
for Episcopal Churches

W. & E. SCHMIDT CO.
108 Third Street, Milwaukee, Wis

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State.
Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

THE PRAYER BOOK

of the Protestant Episcopal Church is not only a compendium of Religion, but also of sound common sense.

x x x

It gives this advice (page 285)—

x x x

"Men should often be put in remembrance to take order for the settling of their temporal estates whilst they are in health."

x x x

Remember: "Whilst YOU are in health."

x x x

VIRGINIA TRUST CO.

The SAFE EXECUTOR,
821 E. Main St.

x x x

P. S.—Many times in the past we have been able to give helpful suggestions to men and women who were making their wills, and we cordially invite interviews on the subject, which, of course, are confidential.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 20, 1921. No. 34.

MEDITATION

In the first psalm, which strikes its beautiful keynote for the psalms that follow, there is a blessing promised to the man "whose delight is in the law of the Lord."

Sometimes it seems as though the capacity for spiritual meditation were in danger in this hurried and driven age of ours. Life is speeded up with the swift demands of so many things to do that we appear to have no time to think deeply of what we do or of the final purpose in the doing. It must be by a conscious and deliberate effort that we win for ourselves the habit of that meditation which brings us into understanding sympathy with God.

In the ripened spiritual experience, this habit of meditation on the will of God is instinctive and spontaneous. But before we reach that point, it may be necessary that we adopt definite—and as it may seem at first, almost mechanical—ways of accustoming ourselves to meditate thus. We may well examine our days to see how much time we are wasting which we might turn to direct use for spiritual thought. Out of the reading which we do, there is in the case of most of us much that is utterly trivial. Many Church people spend on the worse than trashy supplements of some of the Sunday newspapers hours on God's day which, if earnestly given to studying God's word and thinking His thoughts, would put a new complexion on the whole of life; and if, during the week, we kept habitually in our pocket a copy of the New Testament or some small book of spiritual suggestion, and would read it in the minutes when we are riding in the street cars or waiting for appointments, we should doubtless be astonished at the total amount of time redeemed from mental idleness and made to minister to spiritual growth. We can arrange also at the beginning and ending of the day to set apart at least a little while which shall be devoted to the thought of God, and when we do so, as many Christian men and women already know, the morning vision of the things to be attempted and the evening remembrance of the things which have been done, move upon a plane of sweetness and nobility which we had not known before.

Surely we can hardly stress too much this need of the deliberate will to accustom ourselves to spiritual meditation. The need of it is so pathetically evident sometimes! There are some things which the necessities of our daily living compel us to think of consecutively and intently, and upon these things our opinions are clear and our judgments alert. We know what answer to make when some one asks us about some matter in the province of our familiar business, and can point out the ways by which some suggested purpose may best be carried out. But often when men and women, intelligent and informed on other matters, are gathered in a church meeting to express their opinion on the way to carry out some endeavor that deals directly with the invisible forces of the spirit which create the Church's life, they sit abashed and silent, or else are frankly skeptical of results. They are afraid of experiments, whether it be in new programs of missionary endeavor or new services of an evangelical kind, because they do not recognize the power which is to carry them through. They know that the ordinary customs and habits of the Church furnish no specific help; and they are not in thought and spirit so vitally in touch with the energies of God that they can turn to Him in eager and instant confidence.

But when, on the other hand, we do begin to learn the power that lies in spiritual meditation, how the whole character of religious life is transfigured! It becomes no longer a mere duty then. It ceases to lie upon us with the suggestion of a burden. The religion that was a load becomes a lift. Prayer, worship, service, are no longer commands which we obey because we think we ought to; they become the thrilling forces of the glad, enlarging life.

Glorious is the climax to which the psalmist leads his description of the godly life. It is like the tree planted by the water. Whoever has been over the desert knows the significance of those words—by the water. For miles and miles the white sands stretch, fiercely heated, savagely bare. No trees nor any other vegetation can grow in that arid waste; and yet, out of it, with a contrast so exquisitely beautiful that it seems like a magic thing, the green oasis rises. Water is there—water from the stream fed by the mountains, or from the wells, too deep for even the desert heat to hurt. And by that water's edge the tree which would have withered in the sand grows up a thing of beauty and protection unutterably sweet to those who come with burning feet to seek its shade.

Like the tree planted by the water's edge—that is what we can be if we will let our lives be set where the roots of all our thoughts and will can go down to the deep wells of the thoughts of God. When this life of grace and strength can be ours for the sincere desiring, shall we be content with less?

AVOIDING DETACHMENT

In that live and well-edited diocesan journal, the Southwestern Episcopalian, we find the quotation and comment which we print herewith.

We quote it partly because it is interesting and amusing, and partly because it inspires us to some further remarks:

"Duluth, Minn.—The Swedish Tabernacle Mission Church has adopted resolutions making as sufficient grounds for dismissal from membership in the church the following offenses:

Fishing, hunting or berry-picking on Sunday.

Doing work around home, joy-riding, or saying anything against the pastor on Sunday.

The Rev. John J. Daniels, pastor, introduced the resolutions.

We could well wish that the closed season for parsons might be extended to other Christian bodies and to include the six days not covered by the regulations of Mr. Daniels' congregation.

To a large degree the laity of our churches seem to have misconstrued the object and purposes of preaching. All of us are painfully familiar with that trite and often meaningless remark heard at our church doors, "I enjoyed your sermon so much this morning," as though the sermon were on a par with a Chautauqua lecture or a theatrical performance. An even worse manifestation of this idea of preaching is the criticism which begins immediately after the blessing (if that has not been discarded) at the Sunday dinner at many of our Church homes, and continues until the subject or the critics have become exhausted.

Is it strange that with this critical faculty perfected to such a high degree in so many of our families, the Church and its ministry should be looked upon as a mild and somewhat harmless sort of joke by the younger members of the household? Is it strange that we are finding it more and more difficult to secure young men for the ministry or that the best of those who should hear the call to service hesitate to expose themselves and their human frailties to the criticism to which they know they will be subjected from their recollection of their own homes?

"Beware when all men speak well of you." Yes, but beware of the churchman whose sense of loyalty, whose sense of reverence for the office of the ministry, whose appreciation of the services of his devoted clergy, is so weak that he permits them to become the victims of captious and ignorant criticism on the part of members of his household.

A sermon may not always be a paragon either of wisdom or literary elegance, but if the preacher is a consecrated servant of the Living God it becomes an utterance of divine truth spoken by the Holy Spirit through the stammering lips of His earthy prophet."

We heartily agree with our brother editor in feeling that criticism of ministers and sermons that is purely of a grumbling nature is unfortunate, and should be checked if possible.

We doubt the wisdom, however, of a clergyman allowing himself to feel that his sermons are "the utterance of divine truth spoken by the Holy Spirit through the stammering lips of His earthly prophet" to an extent which places such utterances beyond the pale of intelligent discussion and helpful criticism by his hearers.

The barriers that are thrown around the clergy by laymen are already great, and it is questionable if it is wise to increase them by trying to discourage a frank discussion of the topics dealt with in the sermon.

In his article on the "Art of Preaching," published in our last week's issue, the late Dean Hodges says, "The purpose of preaching is to persuade the people."

Lawyers, too, are engaged in trying "to persuade the people," and they learn a great deal about it from the advice and criticism of their fellow-attorneys.

Might not some of our preachers be able to make their discourses more interesting and effective by availing themselves of the candid opinions of lawyers in their congregations? Such a plan, too, would have the advantage of making laymen more attentive if they knew that the preacher was going to ask them for sermon suggestions. It is a plan worth trying. One thing would certainly be discovered, and that is that no lawyer attempts to "persuade the people" by reading a manuscript to them.

M.

Book Notices

The Spirit of Peace. A. F. Winnington Ingram, D. D. Morehouse Publishing Co. $1.25.

This book contains sermons preached by the Bishop of London from Advent, 1919, to Christmas, 1920.

They are arranged in five sections—Advent and Christmas, 1919; Septuagesima, Lent and Easter, Ascensiontide, Trinity and after, Advent, 1920. They are timely in their application to passing events in England during that period, many of them having been prepared for special occasions.

Like everything from Dr. Ingram's pen, they are interesting both for the laity and the clergy, and will be found particularly helpful and useful to the latter, being well arranged by topics and paragraphs.

The author's use of beautiful and appropriate, but brief poetical quotations in almost every sermon, adds greatly to the attractiveness of the volume, and may be found convenient for reference by clergymen in sermonizing, for there is no way that a beautiful thought can be so impressively expressed as by clothing it in a few lines of metrical or lyric verse.

Dr. Ingram's chapter on "Life After Death" is especially interesting, and needful for the present times. He brings out the rich New Testament teaching on this subject most interestingly.

Also, his chapter on "The Church of England" is one that should be read by all our people, that they may have a full appreciation of the rich heritage we derive from our dear old mother across the water.

Altogether, this little volume will be found to be a valuable addition to any collection of books, and especially so to a clerical library.

M.

The Flaming Forest. By James Curwood. Cosmopolitan Book Co., New York. $2.

The one regret when reading "The Flaming Forest," by James Oliver Curwood (published by Cosmopolitan) is that it cannot be read at one sitting—so absorbingly interesting it is from cover to cover.

It is refreshing, indeed, to find our hero, St. Pierre, a clean-minded, honorable man, and while passionately in love with Maria Aune, he remembered always that she was the wife of another and the sacredness of the marriage vow.

The plot is unique and the development of the story dramatic, thrilling and surprising.

While St. Pierre, a detective, is hunting a fugitive from justice, Black Roger Andemard, he is deliberately shot by a beautiful woman in the last outpost of civilization in Canada. Maria Aune rescues and nurses him back to life. The refined atmosphere of her home on the bateau, the beauty of scenery, the cultured, superb woman with her strange watch-dog, the half-bleed, Bateese, made a queer setting and a strange home for the noted murderer, Black Roger Andemard.

"The Flaming Forest" is a wonderful chapter, splendid though heart-rending, and the characters stand forth vividly, love the dominating characteristic as it is in all life, sacrificing and sacrificed.

M.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

LESS ARMAMENT OR ECONOMIC COLLAPSE.

Mr. Editor: The distinguished editor of the New York World, Mr. Frank I. Cobb, in the August number of the Atlantic Monthly, repeats some facts and expresses some thoughts which ought to be known and taken to heart by all of us. Of course, the startling facts as to the staggering amounts which are being spent for armament have been told before. Mr. Cobb throws some new light on these. Moreover, he brings forward certain arguments which I think have not been anywhere else so cogently stated. He shows, for example, that a nation crippling itself economically for the purposes of defense is defeating the object for which it imposes the crippling burden, for the experience of wars has shown that economic strength is the prime element of national defense. "Economic energy," says Mr. Cobb, "can be speedily converted into military energy, but military energy is not reconvertible into economic energy."

What we should be brought to face is the fact, not only that we are now spending, or are about to spend, outrageous amounts even for future wars, but that this expenditure is wasteful and tragic. One is tempted to say that it is silly. Apparently it can be accounted for only by the supposition that governments are being driven on by a sort of blind insanity. Will the coming conference bring some cure? It must. For if the so-called civilized world keeps on at the present rate, it would seem that economic collapse is inevitable.

Even ten years ago statesmen declared that the nations could not endure the strain. If this was said at a time when expenditures for armament were much less than at present, and before the occurrence of a war which cost more than three hundred billions of dollars, what is to be said now? Even those who profess to believe in war, and those who are even now predicting another war, might well pause to give a thought to the economic prospects. Well does Mr. Cobb suggest that it will make little difference who will be victor and who vanquished.

J. H. DILLARD.

August 8, 1921.

EQUAL RIGHTS.

Mr. Editor: Slowly but surely the day approaches when women will be given the vote in all conventions and councils throughout the American Church.

As Church members we should all try to keep clearly before the minds of those interested the issue as it presents itself today. Some have tried, in their eagerness to defeat Woman Suffrage in the Church, to becloud the issue and to confuse the question of the "ministry of women" with the right to "vote on legislative matters." The sole question now before the Church relative to women is, Shall they be discriminated against in matters of legislation?

Diocese after diocese is having to meet this question; some to their credit have met it frankly and given the women the chance to exercise their right as members of the Church. Others have evaded the same in true ecclesiastical fashion and have put off the inevitable. In the United States today women are now the equals of men as to their status in matters pertaining to the vote. So it should be in the Church; there should be no privileged male members; all should be looked upon as members who have equal rights. From the canons of the Church the word male should be dropped. Some of the obvious reasons for so doing are, viz.:

First. Women do as much work in the Church as men.

Second. They pay toward the maintenance of the Church as much as men.

Third. They are taxed directly for Church funds, and taxation without representation is wrong in the Church as well as in the democracy.

Fourth. They support the schools of the Church by teaching and sending their children.

Fifth. They visit the sick and endeavor to bring as many as possible within the influence of the Church.

They are now allowed in some dioceses to vote in parish elections (a gracious act on the part of the male membership).

It must be remembered that up to the present time no objections of a really serious nature have been advanced by any one opposed to giving women the right to vote in Diocesan Councils. Men who would prefer not to have women present at meetings of a legislative nature claim men would abandon the work of the Church legislation if women took an interest. In one convention the writer of this article was present just recently, and a worthy presby ter said he "cared much for the ladies, but hy igve them the chance to exercise their rights unless they asked for the opportunity"? The answer came back to this particular convention that the omen should not be put in the position of asking to be allowed to exercise their rights. It is safe to say that rank prejudice, dislike and absurd fears, have been and are the controlling motives of those striving to prevent women from voting in all Church affairs.

In many dioceses the Church is awakening to the need of trying to legislate for the people. Annual diocesan conventions, and, in fact, all Church gatherings, have in the past been stereotyped affairs and notorious for their undemocratic methods. Ridicule, intolerance, impatience and a tendency to railroad special legislation has knocked out the interest of a great many earnest people. It is a pity, because the annual gatherings of the Church members should be a time of good-fellowship and a renewing of the bonds of good-will, in helping one another to see and understand how best to do for the enlarging of the kingdom. Votes of women would aid in making the Church more democratic and in touch with the people in their own time and generation.

FRANCIS H. RICHEY.

August, 1921.

(To avoid confusion in the discussion of this subject, it should always be borne in mind that neither membership in the Church nor zeal in good works confers any "rights" on either men or women in the matter of voting, legislating or holding office in the Church.—Ed. S. C.)

LET ALL HELP.

Mr. Editor: Having read Mr. Berkeley Minor's excellent letter in your issue of the 6th on disarmament, I am taking the liberty of sending you the following letter of mine, which has recently been printed in a local paper. Mr. Minor's viewpoint is Christo-centric; it is, therefore, the one to which nations must inevitably assent. My own letter follows:

"Every loyal American citizen must be cognizant of the great responsibility resting upon his country in connection with the proposed Washington Conference called by his President. Each citizen, too, will recognize the awful burden resting upon the shoulders of the appointed delegates, by whom it is hoped future wars will be prevented and the day of disarmament and world peace ushered in. The ideal is tremendous, and because it is so, anything like failure to achieve will mean a commensurate calamity.

"I should like to appeal to all Christians who will read this. Being such, they believe in prayer. They believe that since it links the inadequate mind of man with the Divine Mind Which created and orders the universe that it is the greatest agency for good placed in our possession. Since then it is a greater factor than even the discussions of statesmen, a responsibility rests upon the Christians of America quite as heavy as that to be borne by the conference delegates. If American Christians leave the intricate problems to be solved by the minds of these delegates alone, we must expect a result human in its characteristics. If American Christians will see that they have a signal duty to perform in enlisting the guidance and blessing of God upon the conference, they, since they are Christians, must expect a result in which can be seen the unmistakable direction of the Prince of Peace. President Harding's solemn words over the bodies of returned soldier dead, 'It must not be again,' are something more than a sentimental exclamation; they are a challenge to those who have it within their power to prevent future wars. Not least among these are the Christians of America, some of whom will read this appeal.

October 12, the anniversary of Columbus' first prayer for the new world, might well be kept as a national day of intercession.

HARRISON F. ROCKWELL.

St. Andrew's Church, Buffalo, N. Y., 528 Delaware Avenue, August 10, 1921.

One of the hardest lessons we have to learn in this life, and one that many persons never learn, is to see the divine, the celestial, the pure in the common, the near at hand—to see that heaven lies about us here in this world.—John Burroughs.

BUT ONE THING IS NEEDFUL

By Rev. Henry S. Coffin, D. D.

Few characters in the Bible are more widely known or more often named in general conversation than Martha and Mary, and among Western peoples Martha is undoubtedly much the more popular sister. An evangelist who consigns to the lower regions all scholars who do not consider the entire Bible from cover to cover inerrant does not hesitate, in the face of Jesus' express commendation of Mary, to declare his preference for Martha, and the crowd whom he is addressing agree with him. She and her numerous sons have been made the theme of a eulogy by Rudyard Kipling:

The sons of Mary seldom bother, for they have inherited that good part;
But the sons of Martha favor their mother of the careful soul and the troubled heart.
It is their care in all the ages to take the buffet and cushion the shock.
It is their care that the gear engages; it is their care that the switches lock.
It is their care that the wheels run truly; it is their care to embark and entrain,
Tally, transport and deliver duly the sons of Mary by land and main.
They say to the mountains, "Be ye removed." They say to the lesser floods, "Be dry."
Under their rods are the rocks reproved—they are not afraid of that which is high.
Then do the hilltops shake to the summit—then is the bed of the deep laid bare,
That the sons of Mary may overcome it, pleasantly sleeping and unaware.
Raise ye the stone, or cleave the wood to make a path
more fair or flat:
Lo, it is black already with blood some son of Martha spilled for that!
And the sons of Mary smile and are blessed—they know
the angels are on their side.
They know in them is the grace confessed, and for them are the mercies multiplied.
They sit at the feet—they hear the word—they see how truly the promise runs;
They cast their burden upon the Lord, and—the Lord,
He lays it on Martha's sons!

But is this cult of the hour which glorifies Martha as the symbol of efficiency justified by a study of this incident as Luke has recorded it? Is a woman who bustles about and makes a fuss over the preparation of food and drink, who loses her temper, and comes complaining to her Guest that He is inconsiderately allowing her sister to forget her duty, so very practical? Dare we set aside the opinion of a penetrating judge of character, like Jesus, and declare that it is Martha who has chosen the good part?

Both sisters may have been equally fond of Jesus. Both were delighted to entertain Him in their home, and wished to give Him the utmost pleasure. Martha insisted on doing for Him what she thought, and what she believed everybody else would think, should be done for an honored Friend. Mary gave Him what she thought He most wished to receive. Martha took endless pains to set before Him the many things which her sense of fitness and the conventions of her circle required; Mary instinctively felt what this wistful, lonely Thinker most wanted, and set that before Him. Martha had no lack of affection, but love can be very uncomprehending, and can hurt where it lacks sympathy. She was ready to work herself to the bone to lavish on her Friend what she was interested in doing for Him. She never stopped to think whether it was what He wanted.

Are there not fathers and mothers warmly affectionate towards their children, prepared to make any sacrifices to give them the advantages they wish them to possess, ready to make any sacrifice save one—the sacrifice of giving up their own point of view and trying to look at life through a son's or a daughter's eyes, and consider what their natures crave? Are there not sons and daughters devotedly attached to their parents, prepared to do for them everything that is expected of dutiful children—everything except trying to understand their parents' point of view. Employees and employers—every one of us has friends who would gladly serve us with anything in their power, but who would do it without for a moment considering the way in which we should like it done. At weddings or similar occasions presents are given by generous acquaintances or kindred who buy what they think they ought to give, or what they think they would like to give, with no attempt to get at the recipient's probable tastes and desires. Even between husbands and wives there is often sincere love and little sympathy; and love which does not take the trouble to understand can be fiendishly cruel. You remember the voice out of Reading Gaol:

Yet each man kills the thing he loves,
By each let this be heard,
Some do it with a bitter look,
Some with a flattering word;
The coward does it with a kiss,
The brave man with a sword!

Some kill their love when they are young,
And some when they are old;
Some strangle with the hands of lust,
Some with the hands of gold;
The kindest use a knife, because
The dead so soon grow cold.

Martha, bestirring herself to provide for Jesus what she thought He ought to have, was a sore trial to Him. Mary, feeling what He longed for, and giving Him that, was an unspeakable comfort. The simplest sort of meal with the least time-consuming preparation was all He wished; He longed for a full feast of sympathy from friends who understood, or tried to understand, that which absorbed Him. The one thing needful was an interest in that which interested Him, a supreme interest in His purpose.

A supreme interest in that which interests Christ—why is it the one thing needful?

Without it there can be no intelligent comradeship. One may be with Christ in intention and miles away from Him in fact. Can you fancy Martha describing her Friend to some neighbor: "I just wish you knew Him. He's the most wonderful Teacher you ever heard. He is fascinating to listen to, and makes an overwhelming impression; you are simply carried away. You are ready to do anything in the wide world for Him, and you feel that He can do everything for you." "Indeed," we hear her neighbor replying, "a remarkable Man. But just what does He teach? What does He want you to do? And what will He do for you?" And Martha is all at sea. She has the vaguest ideas as to Jesus' teachings. She is genuinely devoted and cannot do enough for Him; but she is quite as likely to do what He wishes she would leave undone as what He desires. Mary sat at the Lord's feet. Sitting is not an often commended attitude today. "Let us, then, be up and doing," is the popular line. General Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army, declared: "You can only keep company with God by running at full speed." But breathlessness is not helpful to thoughtfulness. Up and doing what? It is generally assumed that we all know what is wanted of us by our Lord. Everything commonly approved as right in the community is labeled "Christian" and supposed to be endorsed by Jesus Himself. But is it likely to be? * * *

When we are doing our duty by our homes and families, are we sure that we are fulfilling Christ's desires? Is not a great deal of family affection narrowly selfish? When we are loyally supporting our church, are we confident that we are in entire accord with the purpose of Christ? Have we ever sat down and tried to think out what is His will for a church in our city and what part in it He wants us to take? When we are serving our country, are we certain that we are aligned with His mind? How much that passes as patriotism has been brought up to the level of the conscience of the Son of man? How much that is called "public spirit" is His Holy Spirit?

We all grant that it is extremely difficult to be genuine Christians; but we assume that it is relatively easy to know what Christ wants of us—indeed, that we know it already. But Mary was probably working harder with her head, as she sat and listened and thought, than bustling Martha walking her feet off. More of us are lazy with our heads than with our hands and feet. In every church there are a fair number of active members prepared to do briskly what is commonly considered a church's work: there are only a few who sit down and listen to the Spirit of Jesus from the pages of the New Testament, and think what that Spirit calls for in the circumstances of our time. It requires painstaking effort to sit and listen and think—think until with intelligent grasp we possess the contemporary mind of Christ. One thing is needful—

"More careful not to serve Thee much
But please Thee perfectly."

Again, a supreme interest in that which interests Christ is the one thing needful because without it a life lacks unity. To Jesus Martha was a dissipated woman. She was here and there and all over the place in her attention and her efforts. Mary was concentrated. She had what He called "the single eye."

When one spends a few months in missionary homes in non-Christian lands, one feels a subtle difference between most of them and most of our homes. It is not that heroic sacrifice is written large all over their outward circumstances, although their surroundings are frequently depressing and they are isolated from kindred and friends, and cut off from many of our enrichments and comforts. But one is aware that they are living for one thing only—they are where they are for the spread of the kingdom of Christ. That is ever present in their minds and determines the details of their lives—the sort of house they live in, their relation with those with whom they trade, their social intercourse with one another and the community about them, their vacations, their reading, their outlays of time and money, the upbringing of their children. They have deliberately said to themselves, "One thing I do." They are not narrower in their outlooks than most of us. One discovers among them the same wide variety of tastes, temperaments, culture, hobbies. But a single purpose has the right of way in their arrangements, and their supreme concern is that they and theirs keep as fit as possible to further it. One thing unifies them. * * *

Again, the one thing needful supplied a sense of proportion. Martha was ill-balanced. She was paying far too much attention to arrangements, and missing the point of Christ's visit—failing to receive Him. His figure was under her roof, but His mind was not touching hers. Mary knew what to omit. Knowing what to leave out is an essential of good writing. It is the superfluous adjective and the redundant phrase which ruin most styles. Knowing what not to care about, or waste thought on, or take notice of, is a large element in the skill which writes well the volume of life. There is so much in which Christ is not interested that one can leave out. It is not necessarily bad; but it is unrelated to the one thing—His purpose. Many of us are not so much atrociously wicked as not well balanced—weighted with a lot of needless things that use up thought. time, strength. * * *

In dealing with any situation, how necessary to know what to brush aside as of no consequence. The Marthas attempt to include everything, and all seems equally important. The Marys, with the emphasis of Christ, says: "This is big; that doesn't matter. This advances the cause; that, however desirable, we can get on without." Bishop Burnet said of King Charles the First: "He minded little things too much, and was more concerned in drawing a paper than in fighting a battle." Like the hapless Charles, you and I are in the thick of a fight, a life-and-death struggle for the throne of the world. Can we make Christ master of our business life, or is the clash of interests to end in a violent and unspeakably destructive revolution? Can we render His Spirit Lord over a commonwealth of free nations, or are we to witness another and far more awful earth-wide war? Can we place Him in control of this and that man or woman or little child, now aimless or ugly-tempered or habit-gripped or hard as nails? Can we let Him have His way with ourselves, or must we go on making a mess of our lives and letting them mess the lives about us?- "One thing is needful"—all else relatively trifling.

Even in getting on with God, how indispensable to know what to omit, what not to be troubled by! Canon Ainger once wrote to a friend: "In religious knowledge, as in all other things, dare to be ignorant of many things that you may have time and brain and heart for a few things." Of how much in God's ways with men and with Himself Jesus dared to be ignorant? Why were there lame and halt and lepers in Israel?—the mystery of suffering; why were there some men with five talents, some with two, and some with one?—the mystery of inequalities; why were some born blind, physically and spiritually, and some who did not possess ears to hear?—the mystery of handicaps; why was this and that assigned to Him?—the mystery of personal experiences. Only once do we hear Him asking why, and even He went unanswered. But daring to remain ignorant, with nothing to say about dozens of questions concerning God, which men have raised since time began, He was engrossed in His Father's interests, and He had time and brain and heart to receive and body forth more of God than all the rest of the universe together contains.

It amazingly simplifies life when One who knows puts His finger on just one thing and tells us "that is the essential." A second-century Christian uses the very phrase we have employed this morning when he writes to his correspondent, Diognetus, concerning Christianity, and calls it "this new interest which has entered into life." It is, says Christ, "the one thing," and it is "needful." Do we possess it?

Interests are caught by contagion. One man cares intensely, and others become infected. Here is the purpose for which Jesus thought, toiled, poured out His blood, and ever liveth—the world of men linked in friendship with the living God. Does it interest you and me? Does it interest us supremely?

THE CHURCH TOMORROW

II.

S. S. Drury

Shall we not use this title, "The Church Tomorrow." which marked my first communication on the ministry. for this and further bulletins? It seems to condense the whole hope and theme—viz., nourishing the Church ten years from now by raising up young men for the ministry now.

We propose a conference—not hankering to promote one, but because something must be done. No special method or theory about it besets me. But this one fact must obsesss any thoughtful mind: the ministry is dwindling; the Church grows weak. If, to be sure, every parish from its vital unity produced one good candidate for Holy Orders every two years, scant need would there be for a convention, or for talk about drumming up recruits for the merciful calling of the ministry. But, you must confess, your parish doesn't do that, and the next parish doesn't. We are not producing our own leaders. The clergy themselves, often sceptical of outlook about the ministry and timid of utterance, fail to make their career attractive to the young men about them. There are plenty of reasons, all of them as regrettable as forcible, why we have got to make a centralized and radical effort. Let us try to look at the problem in wide, long-range fashion. The Church is the body of Christ, the life of God in the world. It exists for and is served by a multitude of human members, including you and me. It is led by ordained officers. These officers are getting so notably fewer that the progress of the Church is noticeably impaired. We have got to have more ministers. We have got to raise them up. We must have them.

The plan was, it may be remembered, to have next summer a fine breezy week's meeting of at least two hundred boys of high school age to consider the ministry as a career. We pictured this group of selected boys coming from all over the country to spend a week with a few of the best men of the Church—laymen, priests and bishops—to consider at the beginning of life the ministry as their calling. We asked for criticisms. Let us consider a few.

(1) "You will have a group of goody-goodies." Thus spoke a college professor, himself a devout senior warden. "No," he continued, "the plan is dangerous. You won't get the best boys. You will collect a group of inferior, pale pietists. The time of vocation comes later. Why, in college, frequently in their Junior and Senior years there, men don't know what they are going to do." That's true, but plenty of men in college know what they're not going to do! Foggy as is the outlook, there has been a little click in many a mind which registers: I won't do this, and I won't be that. If, indeed, it has been at all contemplated, the ministry has received this negative click. It is good psychology and sound leadership to place the ministry in the noblest light before our boys or ever the world's coarse thumb has smoothed them, or sub-conscious dictates have solidified into active decisions. As to goody-goodies, the selection of candidates for our conference must rest upon the good sense of the clergy and vestries. Only the best should be allowed to qualify. You have got to rely on the co-operative common sense of people, if anything is ever to be started. And unless things are started, things stop.

(2) Next speaks a practical parson. "What kind of boys do you want?" We reply, "All kinds of boys of high school age." It is objected, "They will be working in mid-summer." "Very well," I reply, "let's have it at the end of the summer. But let's have it." The beginning of summer, when school is just over, seems a poor time for a conference, and surely the very last week of vacation is poorer still, for every boy and man considers his vacation just as long as what remains of it! He won't give up his last week to confer about anything! If it is true that these boys are working all through the summer, and that August 1 won't do, how about August 28 to September 5? The where and the when are important non-essentials.

(3) Consider next a bishop's views—the wisest and widest of bishops. "How would it be," he notes, "to limit your area. Do not forget the great expense of traveling. To go from Wyoming to New Hampshire costs a lot. Why not make it a New England or Middle States effort, and then if you fail, the failure will be restricted." To this on reflection I countered, quoting the language of Lady Macbeth: "We fail! But screw your courage to the sticking place, and we'll not fail." I doubt if New England and the Middle States will furnish two hundred boys to consider the ministry. Our Church is weak, and we must draw widely if we would have the valuable pressure of numbers. Think, too, of the socializing effect of country-wide contacts. When we had the military camp at Plum Island a boy from a green hillside in Vermont bunked next a boy from the East Side of New York. This was useful. It blessed both. For a boy from Wyoming to live with a New Hampshire lad for a week would open two pairs of eyes, always provided the former can pay his fare! The hard fact of figures won't evaporate with a line of poetry. How can these boys pay their way? My objection to its being paid for them, expressed in the first letter, was wrong. It was based on a dread of giving youths an education, if only they will enter the Church. The Bishop went on to say, and he is right, that there is no reason why a parish or a group of well disposed laymen should not pay the way of a young representative to attend a conference on the ministry. Then the parish would feel a quickened interest. It is a well-recognized and valid method of procedure.

I only hope that many more objections, coming in, can thus be formulated into a positive program. Kindly criticism makes good building material. On one point we all agree—we need more ministers. Today the supply is inadequate; figures from theological seminaries show an ominous tomorrow. There are not enough ministers. (Does this repetition begin to fret you? It is meant to.) The statement, that there are not enough ministers, repeated fifty times, with certain explanations, would make the most useful sermon a congregation could listen to. When we fervently respond to the petition, "That it may please Thee to send forth laborers into Thy harvest," we enter on a contract. The increase of the ministry becomes the personal responsibility of everybody who believes that God allows us the privilege of sharing in the answering of our prayers. From the looks of the congregations in our churches, I know there are plenty of young men who would make splendid ministers. The Church of all our devout families with high-minded boys is undermanned—that's the fact. Why don't more of them want to enter the ministry?—that's the question. How can we encourage their devout attention?—that's the problem.

Law Enforcement

(Extract from Bishop Reese's Address to the Annual Convention of the Diocese of Georgia.)

All of us will agree without question that our civilization rests upon the foundation of law, constitutionally enacted; that respect for and obedience to the law by all citizens is an essential duty of every man; that under the law every man, however humble, is entitled to receive justice in his person and property; that violation of the law by criminal acts must be proven by due process of law and that punishment for crime must be inflicted only by those who are legally charged with that duty. Secondly, it is as undeniably true that all acts of individuals, as of groups of individuals, who presume to determine the guilt and inflict punishment upon persons charged with crime, are contrary to the law and destructive of civilized order. Mob violence is a denial of the fundamental principles of the social order, it is open and armed defiance of the authority of the State. It is rebellion against the State and treason to civilization.

These statements are so true that they sound like platitudes. They are supposed to be recognized as such by every intelligent citizen. But we cannot be indifferent to the fact that they are not so recognized by all of our people, as is evident by numerous acts which in fact contradict and defy them. We are compelled to acknowledge with deep regret and shame that these lawless acts are disgracefully common in our State. We possess an unenviable notoriety for the number of them which occur in Georgia. We are, it is true, not alone in being thus afflicted, but it never cures any evil to prove that other people or communities are also guilty.

The two classes of lawlessness in our midst, which are most notorious, are violations of the prohibition law and lynchings and other acts of injustice, especially against the negroes.

I am not presuming to discuss the expediency or wisdom of the prohibition law or the methods used to secure its enactment. I do not class its violation with crimes of individual or mob violence. But it is the law of the State and of the country. The fact, which I believe is undeniable, of its constant violation in one way or another by all classes of people and by many people who are otherwise law-abiding and entirely respectable, is certainly a most disquieting fact. The habit of violating it creates in the individual and in the community a habit of law-breaking. This cannot but bring the State and the law into disrepute and some degree of contempt. If we do not respect, by obedience, the working of our own political institutions, we are destroying the foundation of our own social order. We insult ourselves as a collective body. I therefor, as the personal representative to the Church in the Diocese and its chief pastor, appeal to you and through you to all of its faithful members to discourage by word and deed all and every violation of the law and to set the example of scrupulously obeying it because it has been enacted by the authority of your own State and country. If it be in your judgment an unwise law or a bad law, have the courabe to say so and use your constitutional privilege to secure its amendment or repeal. But it cannot be the law for one class and not for all classes without disaster.

But I am just now more concerned to speak about the danger and injury by mob and other forms of violence. These work grave injustice frequently to innocent people and always do grave injury to the dignity and security of our State. I speak of this more immediately in connection with such acts against our colored people. All decent people are horrified at the charges of unspeakable crime against some of these people, which are now the subject of legal investigation. I trust that they may be disproven, but knowing what we do of crimes of violence against the negro, we cannot say that they are impossible. We are humiliated in making that confession. As a Southerner and a white man I know very well the difficulties of our situation and the irritation that the situation is calculated to excite in us. But no irritations or criminal outrages can justify mob violence or other similar grave injustice. Many of these people are industrious, respectable and law-abiding. They are entitled to justice. All of them are our brethren in Christ. They are also entitled to justice. They are entitled to every opportunity possible to live in peace and security and to work out without unnecessary restrictions their individual and racial destiny as far as they are capable of doing so.

The race question is too complicated and too serious to be disposed of by any off-hand judgment of ignorance or prejudice. It is not only the future of the negro which is at stake, but the future of our own peace and security. For violence and the domination of force of one race over another cannot produce anything but loss and disaster to both races. It is not a question of white control. Of the loss of that I have no fears. It is a question of how we shall maintain it—whether we do it by force or by just administration of law and by the inevitable working out of natural law. Every exhibition or threat breeds violence after its kind, and the end is destruction and a scarcely concealed anarchy.

I here protest most solemnly and earnestly against such methods. I protest against the misguided, if not criminal folly, of those who have disturbed the situation and created distrust and apprehension among the better negroes by organizing a secret society under a name which can only recall the lawless violence of those who perverted a generation ago the purpose of the original society so named. No patriotic or sensible man could for one moment consider it anything but folly to organize a Klu Klux Klan at this day. The name condemns it. It is not necessary. It can only be at the least a serious error. It cannot fail to be perverted even if in its origin not unlawful, to unlawful and dangerous purposes.

I think that Christian people and good citizens should utter their minds and express their convictions about matters of grave significance to social well being. I think the Church should bear its witness in such matters. It should condemn evil and evil customs. It should stand for law and order against secret or open violence. It should take its stand to protect society and to protect the weak. And I believe that at this time of serious issues it should proclaim its moral judgment against wrong and injustice. I therefore ask this convention to adopt and to publish its condemnation of all mob violence, of all acts of injustice against the negro, and to declare its opinion that the organization of this secret society is more than a mistake. It is an unwarranted and dangerous folly.

It is not work that divides masses from classes, and sets worker against employer, nor is it money; it is lack of understanding.—Dallas Lore Sharp.

Sunday Meditations

By Rev. Thomas F. Opie.

Are Our Morals Growing Worse?

Morality, however much may be said for or against it, is largely a negative principle. It may be passive and static. It need not be active and positive to be moral. It seldom, if ever, is dynamic. When it becomes dynamic it is very near the borderland of religion, if indeed it be not within that zone.

So long as I refrain from stealing, lying, drinking, gambling, cheating, impurity, etc., etc., I may claim to be moral. Not much of a claim in the realm of spiritual dynamics, but quite an achievement in that of moral statics! If thou refrain from these thou doest well, negatively. But life is positive. Avoiding these may not only "add life to years, but years to life." But we need a dynamic within.

While even sound morality may be said to be wanting in spiritual positiveness, morality of itself cannot remain static. It grows worse and degenerates into immorality—largely because it leaves God out! It leaves out of man's life the power and help of God. If and when it takes God into its confidence, relying more on His dynamic power to save than on man's own inherent nature, morality takes on the reverent, the spiritual guise of religion.

When we ask, "Are our morals worse than in previous generations?" we are liable to say they are—and let man stand or fall accordingly. I cannot concede that we are more immoral, say, than the ancient Romans, nor more immoral than the Greeks in their decadence. If we are, two great agencies are contributing to our lack of morals—the press and the motion picture. The former has of late let into its pages cuts that formerly were confined to the Police Gazette, and into its columns sordid stuff that gets into the minds of all its readers. The latter has seemed to cater to the salacious, the suggestive and the obscene, with entire abandon.

Until men and women become religious, or rather Christian, in a real and vital sense, and until the wholesome leaven of the Christian dynamic has worked its cleansing way into our morals and made them glow and gleam and glisten with something positive, aggressive and achieving in a high spiritual sense, public morality will continue to be a thing to be reckoned with. God speed the day when it may be said that this nation is in the true sense Christian!

Does Religion Pay?

Few persons get what they might from religion and the Church. Few realize the practical results of religion or get any real and vital benefit from the Church, comparatively speaking.

There are in round numbers six hundred million nominal Christians in the world. Of these, it would be safe to say that two-thirds would aver that religion is the worship of God, merely. The same would say that the Church simply offers a fitting place for this worship.

It is with religion and the Church as it is with business and the office and the store. The man whose business succeeds and yields profits is the man who enlists his whole heart and personality in his business. Did the commercial world receive no more attention at the hands of business men than does the Church, it would spell bankruptcy in less than a year!

The Church can mean nothing to the man who means nothing to the Church! Religion can mean nothing to the man who, like a certain big automobile manufacturer, never works at it! Had the maker of this well-known automobile worked as hard at religion as in the manufacturing and perfecting of cars, things would be "humming" for him (and others) spiritually as they are industrially now.

What we need today is men who will "work at" religion and make it pay. It will never pay otherwise. To the man who enlists his heart, his services, his time, his thinking, his ambition, his influence, his genius and his talents and means in the Church, religion pays. It pays the best dividends in the world—at the same time placing on deposit in the treasury of eternity payments that will never depreciate nor diminish.

We do not need a new "brand" of religion, but we do need a new enthusiasm for religion. If one-tenth of the hard and constructive thinking, and one-tenth of the hard and industrious working, and one-tenth of the hard and much-needed financing were devoted to the Church that is used up in business, the Church would soon become what it ought to be—the biggest business in all the world, and the best-paying business! Think for your Church. Sacrifice for your Church. Invest in the religion of your Church. It will begin to pay you at once and will never cease to yield returns and to pay you royally here and hereafter.

THE TOUCH.

By Martha Elvira Pettus.

She said, If I may but touch the hem of his garment.—Mark 5:20.

"If I may touch but the hem"—and her soul
Breathed the whisper of faith—"then I—I—shall be whole!
O wonder of wonders! is healing for me?
If I may touch Him—how blest I shall be!

"If but His garment I touch—help so near!"
And she softly stole closer, with glad hope and fear.
One touch—O one touch met the grasp of His power;
She felt she was healed in that wonderful hour!

Sweet story of Faith! our omnipotent Lord
Still heals by a touch—by a thought—by a word.
I may reach Him in faith, too—and healing is mine.
I have caught—I am holding His vesture divine!

What a wonderful place the Bible has in evangelism! Throughout the length and breadth of America there are enthusiasts for the work of the American Bible Society because they believe, with it, that the Scriptures themselves form the most effective missionary ever known. The vitality of this belief is constantly strengthened by such testimonies as the following, related at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by a pioneer missionary and translator of the New Testament, who says:

"Let me tell you of Giovanni Papini, a poet, a philosopher, the most brilliant writer of Italian that is living today. His story is very significant; you have this most brilliant of living Italian writers confessing to the world that he has found Jesus Christ, and found Him through reading the pages of the New Testament. He tells us that from his earliest youth he had a feeling of repulsion from all religion, from all churches. He grew up absolutely devoid of faith. Then came the war, and for Papini, as for thousands of others, it meant a spiritual crisis. What was the meaning of it all? He was dismayed by the horrible tragedy. He ceased to write, and plunged into a re-examination of the histories and philosophies, the wars and migrations of peoples, the rise and fall of civilizations, the laws and customs and religions of mankind. He studied them all to find a clue to the meaning of things. He found that all the endeavors made by men to instal an ephemeral happiness on earth had resulted only in deluging the earth with blood and tears. Then it occurred to him that perhaps after all there might be something that would throw light upon his problem in the neglected New Testament, and he came to the New Testament with a heart full of desire, full of hope, and he tells us that he has found there certainty and peace. With all the fervor of an apostle, Giovanni Papini today is preaching, through his pen, the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ."

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

Lilla Vass Shepherd.

Light of the world! Once only
Death compassed Thee—
Yet sightless eyes find God amid the shadows
Of Calvary.

Light of the cross! Self's idol
Dimmeth Thy reign—
Yet martyrs' lives and sacrifice proclaim Thee
Victor through pain.

Light of the soul! Life's shadows
Like mists depart,
When dawneth Love's reflection of Thy beauty
In human heart.

I rest on Thy undearied mind;
Thy planning and Thy love go on,
Nor dost Thou leave me far behind;
I'm carried to another dawn.

The new day breaks. From earth's old mould
Fresh flowers grow along my way.
New life is flashed on problems old;
On ancient life new forces play.

O wondrous, wakeful Warden! When
The last great nightfall comes to me,
From that deep slumber rouse me then,
That I Thy tireless child may be.

—A. Haddon.

The Great Commission.

ST. JOHN'S UNIVERSITY, SHANGHAI, HAS FORTY-SECOND COMMENCEMENT.

Late in June, accompanied by the usual picturesque and dignified academic ceremonies, St. John's University, Shanghai, held its forty-second annual commencement.

About forty degrees were awarded, including three honorary doctorates, to Dr. Yui, general secretary of the Chinese Y. M. C. A.; Dr. Wang, of the Ministry of Communications, and, in absentia, Professor Robert McNutt McElroy, first exchange professor to China, sent by the United States Government in 1916-17.

Rev. A. Rowland, pastor of the Union Church, delivered an address, and Dr. Yui made an eloquent plea for the development of education in China. He said: "While educational opportunities should be equally given to the people, leadership must be developed. I am the last man on earth to oppose foreign leadership in China, yet it is a strong belief that it behooves us to develop our own leadership. It is time for us to help ourselves."

Dr. Pott, in his address as president, said that the past year had been one of the best in the University's history. He announced the gift of $17,500 from Mrs. J. F. Seaman, which has previously been recorded in the Church papers; also the continuation of the alumni gift of $3,000 annually for a course in business. The class of 1920 has offered an annual prize of $20 to the best senior student in science. For the course in civil engineering, new apparatus has been purchased, costing about $10,000, of which amount 1,000 pounds was contributed by an alumnus, Dr. Sze, now Minister to Washington. A course in journalism is to be given next year. Dr. Pott announced that work would soon begin on the new buildings for St. Mary's School, which will permit St. John's to use the present buildings.

The Shanghai newspapers devoted from one to four columns of space to the occasion.

CLERGY SHORTAGE HELPED BY LAY READERS SUMMER TRAINING IN TIOCESE OF LOS ANGELES.

While the recruiting and making of clergy are under way, the Diocese of Los Angeles has put in practice the next best plan, a school for training lay readers.

The new characteristic of the usual summer conference in Santa Monica, Cal., in July, was five days of careful, thorough work with a group of men already on the Bishop's list as lay readers, but lacking up to that time specific training for their duties. Twenty such men were registered at the conference.

Some of the work had, of course, to be done in outline fashion. The Rev. Philip A. Easley gave a masterly sketch of Old Testament literature and another of the New Testament. The Rev. R. B. Gooden gave two hours of work on Chturch History, first general, then English. The Rev. P. H. Hickman presented vital points in theology under the topic, "The Faith by Which We Live." Meantime, for three days the lay readers shared with the general public the addresses by Bishop Moulton, of Utah, on "A Social Interpretation of the Apostle5s Creed," by Bishop Sanford, of San Joaquin, on "The Teaching Church," and by Dr. Bradner on "The Church's Program of Religious Education," as well as sundry other useful addresses by various leaders covering Church music and Christian Nurture work.

The most practical, and perhaps most helpful, exercises were the daily addresses on "The Prayer Book and Its Use," by Bishop Stevens, with round-table criticism of actual reading and preaching by the lay readers themselves during the conference. Every day one man gave an address and two others conducted Evening Prayer. The ability and poise revealed in these addresses and the excellent criticisms made by the rest of the group showed the service which may be rendered by the laity at any time, and especially in these days of clerical shortage.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

From the report of the committee appointed to consider founding the Missionary Society in 1820:

"While Christians of every name are already marshaled for the conflict under their respective leaders, and prepared to engage with the powers of darkness, we cannot see the American Episcopal Church indifferent in this great enterprise, without painful and boding regret."

The fact that millions are ignorant of the gospel "conveys a powerful summons, addressed to all who call themselves Christians, to be up and doing, to devote their time, their talents and the means with which God has prospered them, in making known His ways unto men."

To Every Member of the Society.

Article XII of the Constitution of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society:

"It is recommended to every member of this society to pray to Almighty God for His blessing upon its designs, under the full conviction that unless He direct us in all our doings with His most gracious favour, and further us with His continual help, we cannot reasonably hope, either to procure suitable persons to act as missionaries, or expect that their endeavours will be successful."

Second Generation in Hankow District.

Through an old choir school boy a gift of more than three thousand dollars was received by the Hankow Mission last year, for the erection of a building for the Hanyang English School. The boy was the pupil of the Rev. Y. K. Lieo, who is now the rector of the church in Hanyang. Mr. Lieo was one of the three first pupils to enter Boone. His daughter has been studying at St. Faith's School, New York City.

Second National Chinese University.

The National University of Peking is so far away from the southern provinces of China that a second university is planned, to be established in Nanking. Leading men of the southern provinces are interested, and hope to open the university next fall. With the already existing Nanking Teachers' College as a foundation, there will be included a college of liberal arts and sciences, and schools of agriculture, engineering, commerce and education.

Without the Bible in South America.

On any less authority than the South American Missionary Society, an English Church organization, the following statement would be hard to believe—that in South America there are still about three hundred languages into which no portion of the Bible has been translated.

Hawaii Regulates Japanese Language Schools.

The fact that the Japanese in Hawaii continue to send their children to Japanese language schools, even when they also attend American schools, has caused much unfavorable comment as a fact not wholly compatible with American citizenship. Since July 1 all such schools are to be under the control of the Territorial Department of Public Instruction, and their sessions are to be limited to one hour a day after public school hours.

Under the auspices of the "Citizenship Education Committee," classes are now being provided in the history, ideals and institutions of the United States, to prepare the teachers of the Japanese language schools to qualify as teachers under the new law. Sixty teachers and thirty other Japanese are enrolled.

To Mothers and Fathers.

A campaign must be made not only to educate the child in its responsibilities, but what is equally, if not more important, to educate the parents in responsibilities to their child. I know several instances where young children come to school Sunday mornings, arising to dress themselves and coming without breakfast, while their parents loll in bed. When there is the slightest excuse the children are whirled away on automobile trips, which, if delayed generally one hour, would keep the child in the habit of church-going—by allowing them to go to their Church school.

Upon my word it seems in about half the instances that I meet parents on this subject, they take the attitude they are doing the Church some favor to allow their children to come under its teaching and influence! The reason we do not have as many children in the Church schools as we should will be found in the selfish indifference of the parent and not in the lack of inclination on the part of the child.—Bishop Sumner, in The Oregon Churchman.

SMYRNA Y. W. C. A. CENTER A SOCIAL LEVELER.

The pasha's wife and her self-supporting sisters meet with equal welcome and equal consideration for their particular needs at the Y. W. C. A. in Smyrna, according to Miss Jean Christie, one of the Y. W. C. A. representatives for Asia Minor, who has just arrived in New York on the Aquitania. For the first time in the history of Smyrna a rendezvous used alike by government officials, foreign representatives, naval officers and home-sick "navvies," tourists and residents, representing the whole gamut of social classes, has been achieved in the active center of the Y. W. C. A., a co-operation said to be unequaled in the Near East. The Blue Triangle has become the symbol for unlimited service, so that cabbies, when in doubt, invariably rush their quarry to this open house for all. The Y. W. C. A. there now reaches a thousand girls representing sixteen religions and nationalities.

With Miss Christie on the Aquitania came Mrs. George Huntington, daughter of Cleveland H. Dodge, of New York, who is the president of the Y. W. C. A. board in Turkey. Miss Christie will visit her home in Massachusetts.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

OPEN THE GATE.

A short time ago a small advertisement was inserted in our columns as follows:

"WANTED—TWO SECOND-HAND WHEEL CHAIRS; one for a crippled man, the other for a little girl twelve years old, who has permanent spinal trouble. Both live back in the mountains and are quite out of reach of any help except that supplied by the Church Mission. Persons having wheel chairs to dispose of can communicate with Miss Margaretta James, Deaconess in Charge, Holy Cross Mission, Batesville, Albemarle County, Va."

The result was that within a week or ten days Deaconess James was advised by a subscriber in Lexington, Va., that she had a wheel chair she would be glad to send for the use of the crippled man. A little later came a letter from another subscriber in Middleburg, Va., containing a check for the purchase of a chair for the little girl.

We do not refer to this here for the purpose of lauding our advertising department, but to bring to our readers' attention something that is too often overlooked in life, namely, seeking opportunities for service.

A good many people do good as it comes to them to do; a few make an effort to find the good to do.

This was forcibly brought home to the writer once many years ago, when he was driving alone in a buggy, through the West Virginia mountains. He overtook an old man trudging along, with a stick, stuck through the handle of a grip, on his shoulder. Stopping his buggy, the old man was invited to drive. He put his grip in the back of the buggy without a word, then climbed into the conveyance, still without saying anything.

When he was seated, he turned and said: "What made you ask me to get in?" "Oh," was the reply, "I wanted somebody to talk to, and thought probably you would rather drive than walk anyway. Wouldn't you"?

"Yes," he replied, "I certainly would. But," he added almost to himself, "the most of them drives on."

It was a brief commentary on human nature (the most of them drives on), but it evidently came from a heart full of experience. It is a short text, but contained a great sermon. Are we "driving on," past the little deeds of kindness that we might render to others? It is so easy to do so. That is the reason that our Saviour emphasized the fact that the way is straight and the gate narrow that leads into the way of the life of service.

He brought this out, too, in His teaching of the servants with talents. The man who came with the one talent had all that was delivered unto him. He had not lost any of that talent, or squandered or thrown it away, but he had failed to add to it. He had been "driving on" past the tramps in the road. He had not been looking out for advertisements, for those who needed wheel-chairs, and so that talent was taken from him, not because he had done any harm, but for having failed to do good.

This searching for opportunities is largely a matter of habit. It can be developed so that it becomes the natural rather than the exceptional attitude.

Another thing about the development of this faculty of helpfulness is that the oftener it is called into play, the easier it becomes. In this respect God teaches us great lessons in our own bodies, when we allow our muscles to remain idle and useless, in an incredibly short time they become flabby and weak. They also become uncontrollable. The weaker a muscle is, the less precision it has.

So it is with the good impulses of our hearts; the more frequently they are used, the better become their powers.

One of the wonders of our Saviour's teaching is its limitlessness. The object He sets before us can never be fully attained, because the more we do, the more we find to do—the broader becomes the vision of service.

This is shown in God's dealing with us, His human children. Christianity has so quietly been working in the hearts and minds of men that things which were a mere matter of course in our Saviour's time—like slavery and crucifixion—have entirely disappeared.

The pitifulness of the condition of the Pharisees, who loved to pray on the street corners so that men might see them, was "that they had their reward." The reward was so small that it was entirely attainable. The very glory of the Christly vision is that it is ever beyond our reach. In striving after it, we pass from glory unto glory, and ever new visions, new fields, are opening up before us.

If we turn again to the parable of the talents, we find that the reward offered to the faithful servants, who have used well what was entrusted to them, is not to come and sit down and fold their hands in idleness—but having been faithful over a few things, they are to be made masters over many. The recompense is to be greater occasions of service, and extended powers with which to serve.

Whether we find our way into this straight road of thoughtfulness for others through the narrow gate of answering the call to help in the columns of a Church paper or by picking up a wayfarer in a hot, dusty road, it will be found worth while, and that we shall in no wise lose our reward, which will be to be led to greater opportunities and new joys in meeting them.

HOME CARE FOR DEPENDENT CHILDREN.

Conditions occasioning the removal of children from their homes and measures by which family care may be preserved are discussed in a report entitled, "Children Deprived of Parental Care," recently issued by the United States Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau. This report presents the experiences of 513 children taken under care by Delaware agencies and institutions during a two-year period. At least half these children had both parents living, and only 3 per cent. were full orphans.

In one case out of every five, delinquency on the part of parents or guardians was the cause of the child's removal. Inability of parents or guardians longer to care for the child occasioned the removal of almost one-fourth. Delinquency on the part of the child was given as the immediate cause for somewhat more than two-fifths of the removals.

For 10 per cent. of the children studied, it appears that the developmental advantages of normal home life might have been preserved had financial assistance in the home been available. Nowhere in the State, at the time of the survey, was suitable care to be had for sub-normal children, who constituted 11 per cent. of the group. A beginning toward such provision has subsequently been made. Only 17 per cent. of the children were placed in private families, the other 83 per cent. being placed in institutions. This circumstance is especially surprising, inasmuch as home-finding agencies of other States have placed large numbers of dependent children in Delaware.

Such measures as a State probation system, mothers' pensions and placing out and boarding out under proper supervision are recommended in the report as means for correcting in part the social wastage originating in child neglect. Delaware has begun a carefully considered forward movement since the inquiry was made. Fundamental improvement can come only in the slow but sure development of standards of family life based upon wise educational, economic and civic policies.

Church Intelligence

Still Going Backward.

The Treasurer's report of receipts for account Nation-Wide Campaign for the month of June showed an alarming decrease of $130,042, as compared with the month June, 1920!

The July figures show another decrease of $60,670!

Another loan of $100,000 has been negotiated!

Lewis B. Franklin, Treasurer.

Dr. Meyer's Opinion About Unity.

The Rev. Dr. F. B. Meyer, well known in this country, is one of the great Free Church leaders of England, often called in consultation with the King and the government leaders, and also with the Archbishops of Canterbury and of York. He is a Baptist by ordination, but for years was pastor of Christ Congregational Church, London. He is now in America, speaking at Northfield and Ocean Grove.

Talking while in New York about religious conditions in England at the moment, he said the effect of the Lambeth Conference proposals has been very great both upon Free Church and Established Church leaders. For example, he said that during the past six months he has preached in more Anglican pulpits than Free Church ones. He explained that the Archbishop of York made the advances to him, followed by invitations to preach, but he assures that the Archbishop of Canterbury is not less in sympathy. He asked if Episcopal Church practice has yet gone as far as English church ones had done, and predicted that if not the influence of England would be felt in America eventually. He said Free Church ministers have not put themselves forward, but that the change is a natural and healthy one.

Dr. Meyer doubts if organic union will ever come, and doubts even more that it is wise. He believes that bodies that have commanded any considerable strength have messages from God to men, are faucets of truth, and should remain autonomous and perform their functions. Speaking just here of the forthcoming disarmament conference at Washington, and praising President Harding, Dr. Meyer said it was the same in Church conditions. That is, the spirit obtaining between men is the important matter, and not by what name Christians may call themselves, or how they manage material affairs. So, too, if peoples of different nations agree, the number of warships is not important. The spirit governs.

Like Dr. Holden, this Free Church leader of greater years and greater prominence, says that religious conditions in England are very bad. He speaks of churches losing by war every man under forty years of age, and not now having a family that had not lost sons and brothers. He also speaks of financial affairs, and the terrible drain upon the people. He gives America full credit for all it did, and says Allies could not have won but for America, and yet he adds, America was not in the war. It did not suffer. It does not know what suffering is, when compared to England, and in particular to France. The storm is still raging, and people do not know if God is in the heavens or not. They cannot see. They are stunned. They have faith, but somehow at the moment it is not available. They will recover, but time is needed. Then Dr. Meyer added that if America were to withdraw, if it refused to help, if it would not longer give its moral support, Europe would collapse, and generations would be needed to recover.

Speaking of work by laymen in England, he said that for years Free Church laymen have had community clubs, but that now Church of England laymen are joining them. Tremendous responsibilities brought them together. Then he added: If the men of America could realize at this moment what dependence Europe places upon America, surely they would not be idle, they would not shirk, but would go to work as they have never done. He assured that it is not money England needs from America. It is a helping hand, a cheery heart, and knowledge that America, and especially its men, will stand by till the clouds clear. Asked if Mr. Lloyd George will come to America for the disarmament conference, Dr. Meyer asked in turn, What more important thing could a British premier do? Not merely to reduce numbers of ships, he added, but to say personally to the men and women of America, "Let us keep hold of your hand. Guide us to the light, till once again we can see God."

A Rumor Denied.

A rumor that the architect who designed the carvings on St. Thomas' Church in New York, when dollar marks were said to have been used in ornamentatons, about which much discussion has arisen recently, was at one time connected with the plans of the Washington Cathedral, now in progress of building, was recently denied by Canon William L. DeVries, of the Washington Cathedral. Dr. DeVries stated that the architect under discussion was at one time one of four architects on a list for final selection, but that no designs by him have ever been used for the Washington Cathedral, which was designed by the late Henry Vaughan, of Boston, and the late George Bodley, of London.

A Memorial to Archdeacon Stuck.

Many Churchmen are interested in the proposal to commemorate the late Hudson Stuck, Archdeacon of the Yukon, who has been heard many times throughout the country, and whose work in Alaska was well known and admired by all who read or heard of it. The plan is to found a scholarship at Sewanee for the education of men for the mission field in Alaska. The sum needed is $10,000, and a definite quota of this amount will be asked from each Diocese. Archdeacon Stuck was a graduate of the University of the South, Sewanee, which makes the proposed memorial most fitting and appropriate, and one which will help to carry on the good work started by the one in whose memory it will be founded.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Israel H. Noe, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Atlanta, Ga., has accepted a call as dean of St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tenn. He will assume his new charge September 1, remaining in Atlanta until then. His successor at the Church of the Incarnation has not been chosen.

Announcement of Mr. Noe's decision will be received with regret by hundreds of Atlantians, who hold him in high esteem and who are sorry he is to leave the city. At the same time, they realize the great opportunity for Mr. Noe in Memphis, and see in his call a deserved recognition of the splendid work he already has done in the ministry.

Mr. Noe is a young man, but thirty years of age. He was born in North Carolina, and received his collegiate and theological education at the University of the South at Sewanee, Tenn., where he was an honor graduate, and where he received his B. A. degree in 1915 and that of B. D. in 1917.

Mr. Noe's first church was in North Carolina. He came to his present charge in Atlanta four years ago. During his rectorate the Church of the Incarnate has doubled its active membership and trebled its financial budget. The church was the first in the South to raise its quota in the campaign for Sewanee, and after this the rector traveled over the South, helping other churches to raise their quotas.

At the Church of the Incarnation Mr. Noe organized the first Episcopal Young People's Association in the South. He also organized the first Girls' Friendly Society in the Diocese of Atlanta.

Rev. Israel H. Noe, Dean Elect St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. Noe has been a member of the Bishop's Executive Board for the past two years. He is vice-chairman of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, a member of the Publicity Department of the Diocese of Atlanta, and Executive Secretary of the Nation-Wide Campaign in the Diocese of Atlanta for the past two years. Mr. Noe has taken an active part in Masonry, being high priest of Mt. Horeb Chapter and deputy master of Euclid Council.

St. Mary's Cathedral, to which Mr. Noe goes, is one of the leading churches of the city. The church plant includes the Bishop's residence, the Cathedral proper, the Cathedral School for Girls and the deanery. In calling Mr. Noe, the members of the Chapter sought a man as dean who should complete the building of the Cathedral according to the original plans, and a man who would make the Cathedral a greater spiritual force in Memphis.

Bishop Gailor, under whom the dean works, is the President of the Presiding Bishop and Council.

Stringfellow Memorial Church, at Blowing Rock, N. C., recently consecrated by Bishop Horner.

ASHEVILLE

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

On the crest of the Blue Ridge, in the District of Asheville, at Blowing Rock, N. C., the Stringfellow Memorial Church was consecrated Sunday, August 7, by the Rt. Rev. Junius M. Horner, D. D., Bishop of Asheville. The congregation represented the churchmanship of the entire South, and of many other sections of the nation.

This building takes the place of temporary structures that have ministered to the spiritual needs of the mountain village and to the ever-increasing throng of visitors to this notable summer resort. The church, perhaps the highest above the sea, 4,090 feet, of any of our churches east of the Mississippi, is built of native stone and timber on perpendicular gothic lines, with a messave tower, in which is swung a peal of four bells whose tones resound through the mountain tops every day at sunset, as a memorial chime to Mrs. Stringfellow.

The church itself is a memorial to the late Mrs. Susan Stringfellow, and is the gift of her husband, Mr. W. W. Stringfellow, of Anniston, Ala., who writes in his act of donation that "for thirty years she partook with me of the Holy Sacrament in the little church that was previously on the mountainside."

The interior of the building is finished throughout with native chestnut, the church furniture, executed by Lamb & Co., being made of the same material. Besides the beautiful structure and the notable location and grounds, and the memorial to a gracious woman that the church represents, one other noteworthy feature that will always make this building distinctive is the canvas of St. Mary of the Hills, by the artist, Mr. Elliott Daingerfield, N. A., of New York, who has generously made this gift to the church. The painting fills the reredos, and with the theme of the Incarnation as God's supreme gift, beyond the majesty of the everlasting hills upon which she treads amid the wild flowers of the mountains, adds to the inspiration of this hallowed spot.

The chimes bear the following inscription:

"Gloria in excelsis Deo."

"In memory of the men of Wautauga County, who gave their lives for the freedom of the world, and a thank offering for those others who served. 1920."

"To the glory of God and in memory of the father and mother of Susie P. Stringfellow—Duncan T. Parker, Cornelia Nixon Parker."

"For the glory of God in memory of John Elliott Parker Daingerfield and Matilda Brua Daingerfield."

"For the joy of the community; for the uplift of mankind; for the honor of religion."

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

In Kingston Parish, Mathews County, on July 21, the first of the quarterly socials was held at "Spring Hill," the beautiful old home of Mr. Shepherd G. Miller and Dr. and Mrs. R. R. Haskins.

The object of the socials is to have all these congregations meet, and being experimental in nature, made it more difficult, but the able rector, Rev. W. F. Carpenter, as master of ceremonies, with much tact and many pleasantries, carried it through to a successful close. Some of those present met for the first time, although long residents of the parish.

A short program was given, and in the midst of it a complete surprise was sprung on the Rev. Giles B. Cooke, former rector, now retired, and Mrs. Cooke, by the presentation by the parish of a handsome cane, gold mounted and inscribed, in honor of his golden anniversary in the sacred ministry, and to her a purse of gold.

Mr. Walter P. Smith, in beautiful words, made the presentation addresses, and the rector handed the gifts.

Refreshments were served later, and at the close the long metre Doxology was sung.

The parish plans to hold these socials in each congregation in its turn.

Since taking charge of the parish, two and a half years ago, the rector has kept the work up in spite of the removal of so many families and the loss of almost all of the young people seeking employment in the cities.

The contributions to missions and benevolent work have been quadrupled, and the churches been improved in many ways. Christ Church has recently been fitted out with book-racks, and kneelers are soon to be put in. St. John's has been painted and chancel windows being put in.

Trinity is being almost entirely rebuilt. An up-to-date furnace will be put in and other modern furnishings. Most of the windows are memorials, and when finished will be a thing of beauty, in place of the ugly building of the past.

Old Lamb's Creek Church Begins a New Phase of Her History.

The fifteenth annual meeting of the Lamb's Creek Restoration Association (held last Sunday, August 7, 1921) was made use of to mark the passing away of the status of that church as a mere mission of the King George Episcopal

(Continued on page 23.)

Family Department

AUGUST.

1. Monday.
6. Saturday. Transfiguration.
7. Eleventh unday after Trinity.
14. Twelfth Sunday after Trinity.
21. Thirteenth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Wednesday. St. Bartholomew.
28. Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity.
31. Wednesday.

Collect for Thirteenth Sunday After Trinity.

Almighty and merciful God, of Whose only gift cometh that Thy faithful people do unto Thee true and laudable service; Grant, we beseech Thee, that we may so faithfully serve Thee in this life, that we fail not finally to obtain Thy heavenly promises; through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for St. Bartholomew's Day.

O Almighty and everlasting God, Who didst give to Thine Apostle Bartholomew grace truly to believe and to preach Thy Word; Grant, we beseech Thee, unto Thy Church, to love that Word which he believed, and both to preach and to receive the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Peace of God.

Walk quietly before the Lord, let Him direct thy way.

Seek not to pierce the mystic veil beyond the great Today.

With happy heart assume each care encircled in the Now.

And other burdens ease with faith and question not the How?

Or Why? or When? but joying in thy work with willing hands

And deep humility hold fast, and know God understands.

That Compensation's unremitting Law can now atone.

The Peace that passeth knowledge shall at last become thine own.

Walk quietly before the Lord, let Him direct thy way.

And realize the dawning of a New and Glorious Day!

May Kidder Chase.

Your Child's Period of Imagination.

Have you observed it? If so, did you try to stifle it or did you encourage the day dreams? Little tots will often be seen sitting with face held by tiny hands, looking into space with round, wide eyes. Suddenly they burst forth in the most fanciful tales, their dear little faces lighted with enthusiasm. What do you do when you hear their prattle? Are you shocked thinking that they are untruthful? There is a vast difference between bursts of imagination and untruthfulness. The parent is generally responsible if the latter developes. Many parents are apt to put a stop to these little imaginations instead of trying to discern their children's ideas. By all means cultivate the imaginative qualities. What worth while thing in this world has been accomplished without it? The dream came first and then later the development. Alas, too many parents and teachers do not understand how to do this and often crush out that in the individual which might have developed him into a genius in later life. Many things can be had to help develop the imagination which begins to show at the age of three. The kindergarten does much for a child in this direction. If one is not accessible, the kindergarten song books and kindergarten games can be purchased and used in the home. These not only develop a child, but likewise amuse it. Then the wonderful fairy tales which were so dear to us and gave our imagination so much food for development.

I knew a father who was wont to take his child on long walks. We who have experience know the effect of nature on the child mind. At first it is awed into silence. Then the imagination begins. Question after question is put to us. This father said that he did little or no talking on these strolls, but showed his interest in everything, letting the child answer its own questions, and only helping him along when necessary.

Take time to study your children or any with which you may come in contact and help them develop the quality which they might need so much later in life.—The Lutheran.

The Leading Spirit.

Given any department of the Church's work, and it depends entirely upon the initiative and interest of a very few, sometimes only one. We often hear the expression, "He is the leading spirit." Nobody could follow such a leader without having some enthusiasm at the start and acquiring more through his leadership. In a given parish, no matter if it be a large one, more frequently than not these leading spirits could be counted on the fingers of both hands. Take them away from the parish work suddenly, and except that God would work the miracle of raising up others immediately to take their places, the parish activities would materially decrease.

To be a leading spirit is to be in a position of usefulness and responsibility. And yet these leaders are often borne down by discouragement and loneliness that seem at times to make them wholly inadequate. Christ Himself was lonely, and those great leaders who helped to establish the Church two thousand years ago were lonely, because they alone were full of enthusiasm, and the lack of response by those about them was disheartening.

Not only in the Church, but in all phases of life, everything seems to depend upon a small company of leading spirits, sometimes one man or one woman. Because in the drive of business or professional or political life there is often a purely selfish end to gain, men are more liable to keep up the fight and win the victory. When it comes to the Church, it is different. They are liable to put it second or third, and to fail of being either a leading or a following spirit.

In any congregation there is somewhere a group of leaders upon whom at the time all the work depends. In the power of the Holy Spirit they push ahead in their work, and in the main it is joyful work; but there are times when they seem inadequate, things go wrong, and everything looks discouraging. They should then remember the old bellman who for forty years rang the chimes in the top of the cathedral tower in Amsterdam. On his deathbed, surrounded by his friends, he mourned the fact that he had done nothing in those forty years but pull the levers of the bells. All he heard was the friction of the bearings and the terrific reveberation inside the stony belfry. But how was it with others? All over the city could be heard, not the friction in the bearings of those bells, nor the terrible jangling inside the enclosed tower, but music that sent the laborer forth from his cottage with enthusiasm each morning and comforted him on his return after the day's toil.

Let the leading spirits lead on and not become discouraged because of the difficulties and trials so close at hand. When the trials come, loneliness is likely to take possession of the soul. At such times remember that there is One Who stands close at hand. One cannot be lonely under those conditions, and no work thus fortified can fail.—St. Andrew's Cross.

The Mission of Christ.

To this day Christ's mission is the same—to bring the dead to life again. Is it not His own familiar characterization of His work? "I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." Are there any of us who are living merely "at a poor dying rate?" The Master of men is here to give life to us more abundantly, life like that of the summer time, when the flowers bloom, and the birds sing, and the brooks dance joyously along, and the cattle browse in the abundant meadows, and all things are glad. Oh, to have Jesus Christ bring full summer time into my heart!

There is a weird tale by Nathaniel Hawthorne, which tells of a professor who brewed a strange elixir, and when some drops of this mysterious fluid fell upon a stunted plant, that was about to die, the plant sprang into new and luxuriant life. The Word of Christ the Master is like that strange elixir, for it has power to revive a drooping heart, to lift up a fallen soul, and to bring back a lost or broken life.

The love of God in Christ can break the bondage of sinful habit. How many there are who are bound in the wintry frost of sinful habit. Meantime the heart is hard and unyielding. Once there was tender feeling in the soul, that rose like the sap of trees in the spring-time. But it is not so now. The hardness of winter has come instead. If the sinner could only feel his sin, if he could but weep tears of repentance, if he could but experience some warmth in his soul! Jesus Christ is close at hand, repeating His promise, "I am come that ye might have life."

Lift up your eyes and behold the face of the Redeemer so full of love and tenderness, and the warmth, the feeling, the penitence, will come. Then the barriers will break down and evil habits will yield to the new power of love.

There is an old story of a castle, the gates of which could not be opened until the true Prince came and took down the horn that hung by the gate and wound it out clear and strong. One day, after long waiting, the Prince came in the early morning, and all the hills and valleys were soon reverberating with the winding of the horn. Then the gates of the castle opened. When the Lord Himself comes to the soul, the barred doors, whose hinges are rusted by neglect and evil habit, must open to His presence.

How Christ works we may not tell. But we know that what He does is vital in its effects. A new force comes with His advent into the heart. Old and sluggish currents start afresh, a new buoyancy is in the soul. The dew of youth is on the heart, and all things seem new and full of life and hope. Into the mind of a gifted poet there came a vision of "The Palace of Art." But in it the soul dwelt alone. Growing weary of the lonely palace, so full of worldly fascinations, the soul reflected that a "cottage in the vale" would be better, if only there the soul might know the joy of rich companionship. Whether in palace or in cottage, to have Christ as the great Companion of the soul is joy beyond compare. In the Grecian mythology everything that Midas touched turned to gold. But Christ does more, for whatever He touches in the life of man turns into the high values of the kingdom of God. —Rev. E. W. Work, D. D.

Victory.

Out of the night
I see a light
  Agleam from a far-off shore;
Amid the gloom
Fair flowers bloom
  That shall wither nevermore.

Out of this life
Sorrow and strife
  There is hope for a better day;
Out of defeat
Victory complete—
  This is His wisdom way.

Out of its blight
Spotless and white
  He cleanseth the penitent soul;
I heard His Voice,
Now I rejoice,
  I am every whit made whole
—J. M. Samples.

Faith.

"The trouble is," said Harold Raymond, on his return from his second year in college, "that when you enter the sphere of religion, you deal with something quite different from anything that you meet in science. In the one you move step by step along lines of induction or deduction, and in the other you fling a highway through the air, in a bold and beautiful manner, but in a way quite different from that of science."

"I am not sure that the difference is so great as we are accustomed to suppose," replied his friend. "I have been thinking how scientific faith is, or, rather, how large a part faith plays in science. No man ever made a great discovery that was wholly an accident. Even if he were seeking the Northwest Passage and found America, it was faith that was guiding him."

"But it is a very different thing from what you call faith, isn't it?" asked Harold. "Faith seems very vague as compared with the processes of science."

"I don't think so. I have wondered how it would seem if we were to try to add some modern names of science to the great muster-roll of faith in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews."

"I should like to hear how it would sound."

"By faith Columbus, when he was called of God to discover a new world, went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sailed strange waters, with Cabot, Magellan, Vespucius and Balboa, the heirs with him of the same promise.

"By faith Copernicus lifted the earth from its solid base and set it to moving in rhythmic order round the sun; and all the suns and sons of suns with planets in bright array that circle round the throne of God. This he beheld by faith.

"By faith Laplace understood how the worlds are made from star-dust; and Newton beheld in the fall of the apple a force that holds the worlds in place, and that not by things that do appear.

"By faith the men of science, who did not always call themselves men of faith, found substance in the things hoped for, and moved from experiment to hypothesis and from hypothesis to theory, and from theory to fact and from faith to sight; and all these were the children of faith.

"And what shall I more say ? For time would fail me to tell of Stephenson and Fulton, or Morse and Roentgen and Edison and Lister; of Cyrus Field and Alexander Bell and Marconi and Wilbur Wright, who through faith made iron float, yoked chariots to the invisible power of steam, caused the voice of man to be heard by his fellowman at a distance of a thousand miles, filled the air with voices inaudible to the ear, but intelligible to the mind of faith, and lifted the bodies and the minds of men on wings of wonder, and set them to sailing amid the clouds.

"By faith they built railways, irrigated deserts, crossed the trackless ice to the poles; subdued climate, overcame hardship and incredulity, out of weakness were made strong, and added to the space and comfort of human life, and gave wonderful analogies to those who seek the farther knowledge which is by faith.

"And wherein we have learned from saints and apostles, and the Lord of life, and have found sure footing for faith, let us not count it unreasonable that still we follow, and live the life of faith."—Youth's Companion.

Jesus Wept.

Jesus wept.

Tears! Real tears! Human tears! —but divine tears! Twice it is recorded that Jesus wept; and one is moved to think about those tears as one thinks of no others that ever have been shed. Once at the grave of Lazarus—"Behold, how He loved him!" Here at the grave of a—His—nation—"O Jerusalem . . . how I would have gathered thee . . .!" One thinks one understands these tears! but they are full of awe, of much one cannot fathom.

But how this simple record—not of a simple sorrow or "ordinary" one by any means—reveals! One can follow it somewhat. Oh, the human touch of tears! the revelation of that heart breathing love, compassion, tenderness, sorrow, and deep, deep mourning, regret and loss! One reads of His hunger; of His being wearied and worn out; of His need for retirement, real recreation. Joy, too! yes, one can find it; but it is real joy! always tempered. One remembers the pleasures of the wedding at Cana; of the suppers at the homes of friends; of the intercourse with cherished ones—and one must not forget the joy when the sinner came and gave himself—herself to Him! But tears! Prophetic eye that looks out over the coming years with such all-seeing vision, yet dimmed with human tears! Omnipotent voice which even the sleeper in the grave must hear and obey—and yet tears! It is not mystery, but revelation. It does not carry one beyond one's depth of knowing and understanding—surely one can understand tears!—but into the realities and experiences that open His heart to me! —Lutheran.

A Prosperous Church.

A prosperous church is a church that prays. It is written, "My house shall be called a house of prayer." We must never lose faith in prayer. We must never abandon prayer. We must never lose the spirit of prayer. We might as well expect a man to live without breathing as expect a church to live without praying. Pray for the minister. Pray for the sick and afflicted. Pray for the children. Pray for the lost. Pray for the community. Pray for one another. Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that He may send forth laborers into His vineyard. Pray without ceasing. Pray everywhere. Let the church be characterized by prayer, filled with the atmosphere of prayer, and crowded with the trophies of prayer.—Christian Observer.

Tea-Party Make-Believe.

She gives tea-party make-believe
  Just any time she pleases
Beneath the old oak's bending boughs
  Where she can catch the breezes.

Her table-cloth is made of leaves,
  Her dishes are wee roses,
And all the fragrant food she serves
  Is borrowed from the posies.

When every one has had enough
  She gives the cloth a flutter
And flings away her "flower" bread
  And dandelion butter,

Then hurries off to skip and play
  And do the things she wishes;
She merely has to make believe
  That she has washed the dishes.
—Elizabeth Turner, in Youth's Companion.

For Every Man in His Work.

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Who declarest Thy glory and showest forth Thy handiwork in the heavens and in the earth; deliver us, we beseech Thee, in every calling, from the service of Mammon, that we may do the work which Thou givest us to do in truth, in beauty and in righteousness, with singleness of heart as Thy servants, and to the benefit of our fellowmen; for the sake of Him Who came among us as one who serveth, Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

There is a certain pastor in Brooklyn who has been pastor of one church for more than thirty years. During all these years he has had an active, live Christian Endeavor Society in his church. He is always present at the meeting when in town, and much of the time he has been an efficient officer in the society.

When recently some one said to him that he did not see how this pastor could give so much time to his Young People's Society for so many years, he replied: "What better could I do? What more important than training the young people? What better chance have I to reach their hearts and their heads than at this young people's meeting? At no other time have I such an intimate and fruitful hour for helping them. If I should lose this opportunity, I should lose the great opportunity of my pastorate."

Who will say that this pastor was not wise in his day and generation? At least, his long pastorate, marked by constant additions to his church, and growth in grace, of a multitude of young people, is a tribute to his wisdom.—Christian Endeavor World.

For the Young Folks

The Little Task.

The little task, my dear,
Small deeds, well done,
These pave our toiling way
Up to the sun.
Think not the noblest mount
By one swift flight,
They climbed while others slept,
Up through the night.

Lessons well learned, my child,
The kind word spoken,
The little game played fair,
Bad habits broken.
Small errands gladly run
By tiny feet—
God's choicest messengers
In duty sweet.

Thus we mount up, my dear,
To some bright star,
Whose glory is not known
Because so far.
So, day by day, with cheer,
Let's do our best,
Well done the little task;
Leave God the rest.

—Exchange.

Grandpa's Prisoners.

"You go first, Rosina," directed Roy, "so I can catch you if you fall." Rosina scrambled briskly up the ladder to the hay-loft of grandpa's barn. Roy, hugging his spaniel, Rab, followed his sister. The newly-mown hay was piled so high that it covered all the windows except one high in the gable; through this the sun shone, making golden mist of the rising hay-dust.

Rosina tucked the basket she carried into a corner, then the children climbed to a beam from which they jumped into the soft, sweet-smelling hay. "Isn't this fun?" asked Rosina; "but," she added, "I must let Ruby out to have fun, too." She opened her basket, saying, "You dear thing, did you feel lonely shut up while we were climbing?"

"Coo-oo-oo-coo," came from the basket, out of which stepped Ruby, who nestled against Rosina's cheek, then flew joyously with whirring wings round and round the loft. Ruby was a wood-brown dove with a collar of lovely changing blue and green.

"Come and bury me, Rosy!" called Roy.

Rosy heaped hay deep over her brother until he called, "Rab, Rab!" Then Rab, sniffing and barking, scratched his friend out of the hay and kissed him over and over.

"Aren't you glad we came here instead of going to the grove?" asked Rosina.

When the children started for their afternoon play, both they and their mother supposed they were going to the little grove beyond grandpa's field where they enjoyed many vacation picnics. But when they saw the open barn door they ran in to have a jump in the hay and lingered in its delight instead of going on to the grove.

"Course," Roy answered Rosina. "And now let's have the picnic."

Rosina took from her basket some ginger-cakes and rosy summer apples. As the children ate, Rab's brown eyes said plainly, "Please give me some." And his plumy tail wagged, "Thank you," for ginger-bread. Ruby pecked daintily at an apple and swallowed the brown seeds which Rosina offered.

After their picnic the children built hay forts and charged each other; and they played until Rosina suddenly exclaimed, "How dark it is!"

No sunshine fell through the small window; shadows crept out of the corners of the loft, and in the distance sounded a rumble of thunder.

"We must go home this minute," said Rosina.

When the children had hurried down the ladder they found the lower barn as dark as night, but they groped between the hay walls toward the door.

"Where is the door?" Rosina's voice was a little frightened.

"I've found it," Roy answered. "It's shut and I can't open it."

The children had often seen grandpa snap the big padlock on that door, turn the lock, and put the key into his pocket. And that was exactly what grandpa had done an hour ago. Of course, he did not know that a picnic was going on in his barn; and at this very minute, when the thunder-clouds were black, he was hurrying to the grove to bring the children home.

"We can't get out!" Rosina exclaimed,

"Not just this minute; but they'll soon come for us," Roy answered cheerfully.

"It's so dark," whispered Rosina. "And Roy, they don't know where we are? You know, we were going to the grove."

"Anyhow, some time they'll come here," said Roy. "Let's go back to the loft to wait. It's more cheerful there."

Slowly they felt their way back to the ladder, climbed up and sat down below the little window. The barn grew darker; they could see nothing but the gray square of the window.

"Roy," whispered Rosina, "we are prisoners. We can't ever get out of this dreadful dark barn. If mother only knew where we are!"

"I wish she did know," Roy answered. "We might scream out of the window. Let's pile up hay so we can stand on it and look out."

But when they looked, not a person was to be seen—only the big field, and the black sky over which flashed red zigzags of lightning.

The children shouted a few hallos, then Rosina sighed, "It's no use."

"We might send Rab," proposed Roy. "He'd bark and run back to the barn to show where we are." But the only way of sending Rab was to drop him from the window, and the ground far below was covered with stones.

"We can't," said Rosina, hugging the little dog. "Rab, dear, we wouldn't hurt you, even if we do stay here always."

The thunder crashed louder, and blacker shadows crawled about the barn.

"Roy," exclaimed Rosina, "we might send Ruby to tell them!"

"How could Ruby tell them?"

"She would fly straight home, and often she goes to the dining-room, where we feed her, and mother might see her."

"But how could she tell where we are?"

"You write it on the picnic paper," Rosina answered.

Roy searched his pockets and found marbles, twine, peppermints, a knife, pebbles, peach-stones and nutshells, but no pencil.

"I can't write, Rosy," he said, soberly, "unless—here's a bit of coal—yes, it makes marks."

On a scrap of paper Roy printed roughly one word—"B-A-R-N." With his twine Rosina tied the paper loosely around Ruby's neck, saying, "I don't believe that's the way pigeons ought to carry letters, but it's the best way I know. Now, Ruby, darling," she continued, "I hate to send you out in the storm, but you won't fall down and be hurt as Rab would, and you know the way home. O Ruby, you'll be good and fly to mother's window, won't you?"

Ruby answered, "Coo-oo-coo."

Rosina kissed the bird and thrust her out of the window, and the dove spread her strong wings and disappeared around the corner of the barn.

"She has gone the way home is," Rosina said. "Now we'll just have to wait."

A heavy rain began to fall, pounding on the roof close to the children's heads, as they crouched on the hay, with Rab nestling between them. Time passed—a long time it seemed—and then there was a noise that was neither rain nor thunder, and a gleam of light flickered through the darkness of the barn.

"Rosina, Roy!" called a voice.

"O grandpa, we are here," cried both children.

Grandpa, carrying his lantern, climbed the ladder. The children clung to him and Rab barked joyfully. Then they all crept down the ladder and out of the door.

"The outdoor dark is not so fearsome as the barn dark," said Rosina. "It's dreadful to be locked up in the dark."

"You poor little prisoners!" said grandpa. "But you were bright to think of sending Ruby. She came, soaked with rain, to the dining-room window and tapped with her beak, and mother found the letter."

"The darling," exclaimed Rosina.

Then there was home, and mother at the door to hug the freed prisoners and give them supper—scrambled eggs, cream toast, cocoa and baked apples.

Ruby perched on Rosina's shoulder and ate crumbs of bread and answered with her soft "Coo-oo-coo" every time Rosina said, "You darling." And that was many times.—The Congregationalist.

Patty and the Fly Paper.

A great deal was expected of Patty, for Patty was the biggest and whitest kitty you can imagine, and the only one of her kind in the whole town. But Patty had one fault—a fault that was losing her a great many friends among the people who came to call at the Jamieson home. The fault was snooping. If Mrs. Jamieson put her sewing on the table and left the room for a moment, Patty always jumped on the table to see what had been left there. If Jennie left a drawer open, Patty lost no time in snooping through the drawer to see what was to be found. Mrs. Jamieson scolded and threatened; Jennie boxed the offender's ears, but it did no good. Patty's worst fault remained snooping. Then one day something happened. Jennie was going to have a party that afternoon, and the house was being put in order to receive the little guests. Patty was all ready for the occasion, having had a bath that very morning and a bow of pink ribbon tied around her neck. Bridget had finished the last cake and set it on the pantry shelf and was arranging some sticky fly paper about the room to catch the flies before the little guests should arrive. Patty, quite confident that today was a day unlike most days, followed at Bridget's heels, poking her nose first into this and then that.

"My, but you're a nuisance!" vowed Bridget, giving Patty a gentle shove with the broom.

But Patty was not to be so easily rebuked. What a lot of flowers there were on the table! What did they smell like? Inquisitive, snoopy Patty gave a bound and landed with four paws and the tip of her bushy tail on a sheet of new sticky fly paper. Poor, frightened Patty! She forgot all about the flowers. She gave a leap, and fly paper and all landed on the floor. But not a foot could she loosen. The harder she worked, the faster they stuck. Another leap brought her to the door. She pushed against the screen and it opened just enough to let her out. And some way she got one paw loose. Whatever strange thing it was that held her, Patty meant to get away. Now she ran as fast as she could, with the fly paper dangling to three paws, her bow untied and flying in the breeze. Down the garden path she half rolled, half tumbled. Biddy, looking up, saw the strange sight, and leaving her twelve two-day-old chicks, flew for the hen coop. But Patty did not pause. She hurried past old Rover, who dozed in the sunshine. Rover, awakened from his sleep, thought his blinking eyes had not seen aright, and set up a most awful bark and growl, bringing Bridget out to see what was the matter. And Bridget's frightened cry brought Mrs. Jamieson and Jennie, and all three ran as fast as they could, trying in vain to catch up with Patty. They might all have been running yet but for a rusty nail on the pasture gate. This nail caught the trailing pink ribbon, and Patty and fly paper were prisoners. But this only served to frighten poor Patty the more. Now she began turning somersaults and hand-springs, finishing with high leaps into the air. The cows, browsing near the gate, thought they had never seen the like, and, ducking their heads, ran off down the lane as fast as they could. Patty, pulling, tugging, meowing and crying, went on with her somersaults. Just then Mrs. Jamieson, panting and breathless, came up. Close behind was Bridget and Jennie. What a lot of chattering and talking and petting there was! Patty, now certain that the new-comers meant only kindness, allowed herself to be held and the fly paper removed. Such a dirty, bedraggled kitty she was! But a wiser kitty, too. For after she had been washed and scrubbed and dried, she sat blinking in the sunshine, looking very sober and far from inquisitive or snoopy. And to this day Patty knows a kitty's place and keeps it.—Ethel Lynn Andrews.

A Boy's Vacation.

Little Tommy Doodle and his mother spent a week
At Gran'pa Doodle's farm, where Tommy tumbled in the creek
And got his lungs so full of wet he couldn't get his breath
Till poor old Gran'ma Doodle had been frightened 'most to death.
He ate some poison berries that he found along the lane;
It took a doctor half the night to soothe away the pain.
He tried to ride a "kicky" colt—a risky thing to do—
'Twas quite a little while before they really brought him to.
He stuck a stick into a hive of bees—oh, sorry day!
He couldn't see a thing until the swelling went away.
He teased the goat to see if it was cross, as he had heard:
They had to work with him a while before he spoke a word.
And then he climbed a cherry tree—just like a boy—and fell
And broke his arm, and—sakes alive! you ought 'a heard him yell.
His mother took him back to town to get a little rest,
But Tommy says of all his life that week was far the best.

—Exchange.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

Cuticura Soap
—Is Ideal for—
The Complexion
Soap, Ointment, Talcum, 25c. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. V. Malden, Mass.

"IN SHORT"

St. John's Church, Providence, R. I.

"I like it! It was strange at first and we missed some familiar tunes that we were fond of. But we found others to take their places, so that we have become very happy with the new book. The arrangement of the hymns is splendid. Perhaps the feature I like most is the new pointing in the chants. In short, we like the whole book."

(Signed) JOHN F. SCOTT, Rector.

THE NEW HYMNAL
With Both Words and Music

Single copies	$1.20 per copy
In lots of 100 or more	1.05 extended payment
In lots of 100 or more	1.00 cash

Carriage Charges Extra

Published by
THE CHURCH PENSION FUND
14 WALL STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Green Glass Bead.

Pauline and her doll, Deborah, were going to a lilac tea when they met Stacy Poole and his patchwork cow. Every one called the Poole cow the patchwork cow because of her gay red-and-white coat. She had broken out of the pasture only a few minutes ago, and Stacy was driving her back.

Pauline looked so fine that Stacy stopped to stare. She had on her homely old brown gingham, to be sure, but over it she wore a long double string of bright beads of all sizes and colors.

Pauline looked pleased. "I found a big box of beads in the attic," she explained, "and made myself a necklace, because I hadn't any new dress to wear to Norma Thurlow's lilac tea."

"What's a lilac tea?" asked Stacy as he exaxmined the strings critically. "Look, Pauline; how much will you take for this big bead?" He put his finger on a large bead of sparkling green glass.

"I can't let anybody have that one," Pauline answered quickly. "O Stacy, do make the patchwork cow behave herself!"

The patchwork cow was leaning down to chew a fold of Pauline's dress in a way that pet cows have. As Pauline pulled away from her she threw up her head. The long necklace caught on one of her sharp little horns, and the string broke with a snap that sent a shower of beads all the way across the road.

"O dear!" wailed Pauline. "Look what your cow has done, Stacy! I haven't a single pretty thing now to wear to the lilac tea!"

Stucy began hurriedly to pick up the beads. The patchwork cow calmly watched him.

"We'll find most of them, Pauline,' Stacy said, "Look, here's a piece of string with beads enough on it to make a necklace for your doll, anyhow."

He wound the piece of string round Deborah's neck, and Pauline smiled in spite of her grief when she saw how pretty the beads looked against the doll's blue dress.

"There," she cried, "I don't believe any of the girls ever thought of necklaces for dolls! If I can find beads enough, I'll make a string for every doll at the lilac tea."

Stacy was much relieved; he said it was a fine idea. They managed to find a good many of the beads in the wide, hard road. Stacy found the big green one; he looked at it a little wistfully as he gave it back to Pauline.

"Now, if you come with me to Norma Thurlow's garden, you'll see what a lilac tea is," Pauline told him.

And away they went up the road, and the patchwork cow tagged along behind.

In Norma's garden six little girls with their dolls were gathered round a little tea table that was set out in the shade of some blossoming lilac bushes. The table was trimmed with lilac; in the centre was a large frosted cake on a pink china platter.

Stacy looked at the cake out of the corner of his eye. "If you say so, Pauline," he suggested, "I'll help string the beads. The cow will graze around by herself near by without giving any great trouble, I think."

"All right," Pauline agreed. Then she turned to the other girls. "Who wants a string of beads for her doll?"

Every girl there wanted one, and said so at once. They were delighted.

"Stacy thought of the plan," Pauline said as she took her seat. "And so we must let him help us string the beads."

They all fell to work with a will. As fast as they finished the necklaces they hung them up on the lilac bushes to see them sparkle in the sunshine. Now and then Stacy was obliged to stop work to get the patchwork cow away from the pansy bed or to shoo her out into the road when she reached up to nibble at the lilac bushes. But he managed to do a good deal of work all the same.

Have You Made Your Will?

See G. Jeter Jones, Vice-President, about this now. All conferences confidential. Phone or write for appointment.

Merchants National Bank

11th and Main Streets, Richmond, Va.

"SAFEST FOR TRUSTS"

There's a Word

frequently used now-a-days that sometimes is meant and sometimes isn't.

The word is "SERVICE," and we leave it to you to determine whether we mean it.

The Union Bank of Richmond

1104 East Main Street

"----and strong men retain riches."

In the olden days they retained them by force of arms; today they protect them in the vaults of modern banks.

An individual safe deposit box in our vault will safeguard yours. Rent only $3.00 per year.

PLANTERS NATIONAL BANK

Main & 12th Streets Richmond, Va.

J. & R. Lamb
23-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER, COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

Oriental Rugs Cleaned and Mothproofed

DO YOU KNOW that we will clean, mothproof and store all your Rugs under a guarantee against Moths? See this wonderful Department of our Fireproof Warehouse

W. Fred. Richardson
Security Storage Company, Inc.
Fireproof and Non-Fireproof Storage
Main and Belvidere Streets Randolph 845

SAFES

L. N. COOKE SAFE & LOCK CO.

807 East Franklin St.
Richmond, Va.

HOW TO HAVE THE BEST TIME WHEN YOU GO ABROAD

Take only the necessary things with you; buy the other things over there.

Take the lightest luggage that you can get along with.

Take advantage of everything that will lighten the strain of travel.

Take the best care of your health, and, above all,

Provide yourself with Travelers Checks or Letter of Credit from the

First National Bank

Richmond, Virginia

JOHN L. RATCLIFFE
Florist

209 W. Broad St. - - - Richmond, Va.

Flowers of Quality

R. L. Christian & Co.

514-16 E. Broad St.
Richmond, Va.

Leading Fancy Grocers

AGENTS FOR
PAGET AND SHAW AND MIRROR CANDIES.

Special attention given to out-of-town orders.
Catalogue mailed on application.

Nick Bull's Market

Richmond's Leading Dealer in

FISH, OYSTERS, POULTRY and GAME.

312 N. Sixth St., Richmond, Va.

Phone Randolph 1680

WE INVITE YOUR PATRONAGE

XANTHINE!

Restores Gray Hair to Its Natural Color
REMOVES DANDRUFF AND SCURF
Invigorates and prevents the hair from falling out
MARVELOUS IN ITS EFFECTS
For Sale by Druggists, or Sent Direct by Mail
XANTHINE COMPANY, Richmond, Va.
Price $1.25 per bottle, trial size 50c. Send for circular

A Great Spiritual Awakening.

That we are on the eve of a great spiritual awakening is the belief of very many, and there are good reasons for coming to this conclusion!

In the first place, for nearly a century we have perhaps been passing through the most wonderful intellectual movement that the world has ever seen. The mind of man has awakened to a consciousness of new powers which have enabled it, within a short space of time, to gain control of the giant forces of Nature and in this way to bring about a complete transformation of human life and conditions.

The progress of a thousand years seems to have been condensed into less than a century. To find any historical parallel we must go back to the Renaissance, the great intellectual revival of the fifteenth century, and the Reformation which immediately succeeded it!

We see there an assertion of the freedom of the human spirit, following upon and in a great measure resulting from, a great awakening to the mind to a fresh consciousness of its power over material things. There cannot be a great intellectual awakening without its affecting and influencing man's spiritual nature, as well.

Strange to say, the human reason, as one of the results of its recent awakening, has taken up a critical attitude with regard to religion the effect of which has been, in a certain measure, to depress rather than to stimulate the spiritual life. Doubt and unbelief have chilled spiritual zeal and enthusiasm, but this cannot continue much longer. The spiritual nature of man cannot be kept in the background; for the most important and significant thing about him is that he is a spiritual being and he cannot be kept out of his divine birthright. A new age of Faith is about to dawn and a greater spiritual awakening than the Reformation will take place because the intellectual movement which has been leading up to it is far greater than any which have preceded it.

We have seen the marvelous triumphs of the human mind; we have now to see the still more marvelous things which the spiritual nature of man can accomplish, when men are thoroughly awakened to a consciousness of what it really means to be the sons of God and heirs of eternal life. To take a definite stand upon the high ground of absolute conviction that God wills that His children should control the destinies of this world and this age—this is what is more needed than anything else at this time.

Such a stand would mean placing the children of God where the mighty tides of the divine purpose converge; where every thought and word and deed will receive such reinforcement as will make them more powerful and effective for good, than all the plans and schemes and manoeuvres of politicians or financial magnates or other great ones of the earth. The future destiny of the world and of mankind lies, under God, in the hands of His people, and the approaching spiritual awakening will come as a result of the general recognition of this fact.—Rev. Frederick W. Neve, in Our Mountain Work.

Her Way.

Eleanor, aged eight, was enjoying a good cry, when her aunt came in.

"I wouldn't cry like that," said the aunt to her. "if I were you."

"Well, auntie." said Eleanor, between sobs, "you can cry any way you like, but this is my way."—Selected.

How rare are families whom Jesus loves! Individual believers are numerous, but households of faith are rare.—A. Roberts.

HOT WATER HEAT
For Small Homes, Churches, Stores, Etc., Without Cellars
ARCOLA SYSTEM

R. C. BEVERLEY HEATING CO.
9 N. 7th St. Inc. Richmond, Va

SERVICE

That's what the nation-wide campaign asked of you.

Service—in your church, in your home, in your business. That's what you get when you buy your Furniture of Sydnor & Hundley.

Service, and a price commensurate with that service.

Sydnor & Hundley

FURNITURE

CARPETS DRAPERIES

IT PAYS

In a five weeks' canvass among the church members in one city, a subscription representative of the Southern Churchman earned in commissions and bonuses $186.25.

A young woman in a small community, by putting in an hour or two a day taking subscriptions for this paper, realized in a week $11.25.

There is room on our subscription staff for more men and women who want more money. Right in your neighborhood there are many people who would gladly send orders for the SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN through you, if you should ask them to. A liberal commission will be paid you on each order, and a generous bonus on your production.

For full information with complete equipment for immediate and profitable work, mail this coupon to-day to SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO., 815 E. Grace St., Richmond, Va.

Gentlemen.—Please send me full details about your offer to subscription representatives.

Name.....

Town.....State.....

Street.....

Classified Advertising and Notices

All notices and advertisements, excepting positions wanted, will be inserted in this department at a rate of 20 cents per agate line, each insertion. Special rates to contracts of any length. A rate of 15 cents per line is made to persons seeking positions. No advertisement accepted for less than 50 cents.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday of the week in which it is intended that the first insertion shall appear.

PIPE ORGANS.

If the purchase of an organ is contemplated, address HENRY PILCHER'S SONS, Louisville, Kentucky, who manufacture the highest grade at reasonable prices.

LOANS, GIFTS AND GRANTS TO AID IN building churches, rectories, and parish houses may be obtained of the American Church Building Fund Commission. Address its Corresponding Secretary, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

ANTIQUES.

WE PAY THE HIGHEST CASH PRICES for old-time furniture and antiques of all kinds. H. C. Valentine, 219 W. Broad St., Richmond, Va.

MISS M. M. TYLER.

All summer hats reduced. $15.00 hats to $7.50; $10.00 hats to $5.00. Avail yourself of this opportunity and wear a pretty summer hat.

209 N. FOUSHEE ST.

HOME SCHOOL.

Retarded Children—An ideal suburban home, where a limited number of children of slightly retarded mentality can have individual instruction and care under teachers of twelve years' experience in this line of work. Address Miss Sue I. Schermerhorn, Colonial Place, Richmon, Va., R. F. D. 2.

BOARDING.

LADY, TRAINED NURSE, WITH HOME in West End, convenient to public and private schools, will take under her care one or more little girls. References exchanged and terms upon request. Address "B.," care of Southern Churchman.

HELP WANTED

NURSES—YOUNG WOMEN OF EDUCATION and refinement have an opportunity to acquire a profession. Requirements—one year high school or its equivalent. Maintenance, books and uniforms furnished; also a remuneration of $10 a month the first year, $12 second, $15 third. This is a registered school of high standing. Apply St. John's Hospital, Albany and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A WORKING HOUSEKEEPER for Loudoun County Hospital in Leesburg, Va. References required. Any one interested please write Mrs. Arthur Chichester, Secretary Lady Board of Managers, Leesburg, Va.

WANTED—COMPETENT WOMAN, PREferable of middle age, as child's nurse, or mother's helper, to go to Haiti with officer's family for a year or eighteen months. Good, kind home. Address Mrs. Joseph A. Rossell, 116 Gloucester Street, Annapolis, Md.

WANTED — EXPERIENCED NURSERY governess, or mother's helper, in clergyman's family, New York City. Three children, two in school. Address "C-3," care of Southern Churchman.

SITUATION WANTED.

WANTED—BY ELDERLY LADY, POSITION to teach small children, or be companion, or do Church work. References exchanged. Asks $25 and board per month. Address "Y.," care of Southern Churchman.

HIGH SCHOOL PUPIL SEEKS TO WORK through his course. Fourteen-year-old son of Episcopal missionary desires to do light work in a good home where there is a high school of good repute. Missionary's home is nineteen miles away from nearest school, and unless this boy finds the right home he will have to go out to work. Strong healthy, ambitious. Drives a Ford car. All he asks is reasonable opportunity for accurate work in his classes. Write to "A. X. M.," care Southern Churchman.

CULTURED, EXPERIENCED TEACHER wishes to teach in private family. Moderate salary. Prefer small children. Address Miss D., care Southern Churchman.

WANTED—SOCIAL OR LITERARY SECretaryship, preferably in Washington, D. C., by gentlewoman, cultured, experienced. Excellent business and social references. Box 246, Williamsburg, Va.

MAN AND WIFE, REFINED, EDUCATED, want position as care-takers, either country or city. References. Address "L. M.," care of Southern Churchman.

EXPERIENCED STENOGRAPHER DESires position as secretary, preferably in a girls' school, or to travel. Address Box 136, Orange, Va.

EXPERIENCED TEACHER DESIRES position to teach small children, or as companion. No music. State terms. "Miss W.," Buckner, Va.

Marriages and Deaths

Marriage notices not exceeding 40 words, $1.00. Death notices, not exceeding 40 words, inserted free. Over 40 words at the obituary rate. Obituaries and resolutions, 20 cents per line. Six words to the average line.

Copy for this department must be received not later than Tuesday previous to the Saturday on which it is intended to be published.

Buckner: In the early morning of Monday, July 25, 1921, at the residence of his parents, LEIGH, in the twenty-third year of his age, elder son of Katherine Hulda Bickham and Leigh Buckner.

"I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help."

Arrington: Entered into rest on August 3, 1921, at the home of her sister, Mrs. Thomas E. Bond, Baltimore, Md., MARY JOSEPH, daughter of the late Dr. and Mrs. B. F. Arrington. Interment in Goldsboro, N. C.

RESOLUTIONS OF WOMAN'S AUXILIARY, ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, TAPPAHANNOCK, VA.

Resolved: Whereas, God in His loving wisdom has removed from the sufferings of earth to the joy and peace of heaven our loved and faithful member, MISS LOUISE THEBIDAUX DeSHIELDS; that we bow to the will of Him Who is too wise to err; that while the sense of loss is great, we yield Him thanks for the life lived in our midst, for its inspiration and incentive. That recalling her rare faithfulness in all the duties of life, in the Woman's Auxiliary, the home where she was so tenderly loved, in social life where the sunshine of her nature spread cheer, in choir, in Sunday school and in Guild where her helpfulness is sorely missed; that we strive to follow her example in these things.

Frail from childhood, but quickened by an inner spirit consecrated to the service of her Lord, she was strong to serve as few are strong. As the casket of flesh fell away, the jewel of her spirit shone with steadier radiance. Care and sorrow were at times her lot, but her life on earth assures us the Beatitudes are hers now.

"What are these that are arrayed in white robes? These are they which have come up out of great tribulations and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Resolved, that these resolutions be read at the next meeting of the Auxiliary, a copy sent to her family, and be published in the Southern Churchman.

COMMITTEE.

TYPEWRITERS

All makes slightly used machines, $20 up. Easy monthly payments if wanted. Express prepaid. Five days' trial. Guaranteed two years. Write today for price list "R."

PAYNE CO.,
Rosedale Station, Kansas City, Kan.

666 IS A PRESCRIPTION FOR COLDS, FEVER AND LA GRIPPE. IT'S THE MOST SPEEDY REMEDY WE KNOW.

THE MEARS TOURS, ONLEY, VA.,

will leave Washington September 1 with a small party to spend two weeks seeing Niagara Falls, Thousand Islands, Quebec, Montreal, Saratoga Springs, New York City, etc. 1,300 miles on most beautiful waterways in America—Lakes Ontario, Champlain and George, and St. Lawrence, Saguenay and Hudson Rivers. Total cost, $245. Reservations close August 24. Write today for itinerary.

A PLACE TO GO.

Dixie Cabin Tea House, Richmond-Washington highway, 35 miles north of Richmond. Drive out for dinner or afternoon tea. Everything home-made. Good meals, cold water and fine campground with mineral spring. Swimming and fishing. Proprietor, Mrs. Elisabeth Churchill Ward, R. F. D. 2, Beaver Dam, Va. Phone, 2033-Beaver Dam.

The next time you buy calomel ask for

Calotabs

The purified and refined calomel tablets that are nauseales, safe and sure.

Medicinal virtues retained and improved. Sold only in sealed packages. Price 35c.

Second Edition now Ready!

"The Gospel of Life"

by the Reverend

PHILLIPS S. GILMAN

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

Hundreds of readers have testi- to its simple, uplifting revelation of Health, Happiness and Holiness in the Name of Jesus Christ

Price 60 cents, postpaid

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.,

Richmond, Va.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

(Continued from page 14)

Churches to a much larger field of service designed for it by the Diocesan Missionary Society. Through the resignation of this portion of the cure of the former rector, the way opens for the community in the upper part of King George to gather round the old church as a spiritual home under the new spiritual adviser, the Rev. John Feild, of Fredericksburg. The design of the Missionary Society is to use a method that is new in the sense of making use first and foremost of all that spiritual energy of the laity which is a direct outcome of the Nation-Wide Campaign. It is new also in the sense that the efforts to be used are a distinct effort to bring the future activities of the Church in immediate touch with that great wave of unity which seems to be sweeping over the entire spiritual world. The work, however, is on the old foundation, said Mr. Feild, which has already been laid by fervent hearts and willing hands of those who have gone before blazing a trail—a trail at least of glorious hope and persistent faith. The time now is the opportunity of those who come after to gather the harvest.

After the morning service, lunch was served in the vestibule, accompanied by very hearty reunions and cheerful introductions.

The afternoon session was opened with a business meeting, Judge Chichester in the chair. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Rev. John Feild, President; Judge Chichester and Mr. L. M. Williams, Vice-Presidents; Allen Smith, Treasurer; H. Roy Stuart, Secretary.

Mr. Feild has taken hold of this work with a vigorous interest, and a minister as public spirited and as well balanced as he is stands pre-eminently fitted, we think, for a community made up of so many sectarian views.

Contributed by Mrs. Roger Boggs, King George County local correspondent to the Fredericksburg Free Lance.

August 9, 1921.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop recently spent ten days or two weeks in the Archdeaconry visiting Grace House on the Mountains, Dante, Sandy Ridge, Shannon, Big Stone Gap, Cuto, Tom's Creek, Ulilda, and Moss. In order to avoid a forty-five mile drive, he made the trip from Ulilda to Dante through the mine, a distance of six miles. A distance of five miles from Grace House to Sandy Ridge had to be made on foot. The descent the following day of three miles was also made on foot. Notwithstanding such difficulties, the Bishop is enthusiastically interested in this great field, and is high in his praises of the excellent work done by Archdeacon Rich and his associates.

The Bishop has just returned from the Warm Springs, where he spent a few days keeping certain engagements and preaching twice at Christ Church Sunday.

During his stay he made a trip to Highland County for the purpose of investigating conditions affecting the Episcopal Church in that county. There is no Episcopal Church in Highland County.

The Bishop has shown a great deal of interest in the summer school recently held at the University of Virginia under the auspices of the Dioceses of Virginia, Southern Virginia and Southwestern Virginia. August 9 he conducted the sunset service and delivered an address. That night he spoke on "Placing the Emphasis in the New Science of Education."

Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, Roanoke, has declined a call recently extended him to the Episcopal Church at Winston-Salem, N. C. He now has under consideration a call to the rectorship of the Church of the Ascension, Baltimore, in succession to Dr. LaMotte, who was recently consecrated Bishop of Honolulu. Mr. Mead's removal from the Diocese would be a severe loss, and those interested in his progress earnestly express the hope that he will remain at Christ Church.

come.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Verbal word has been received by the vestry of St. Markaret's Parish, Bronx Borough, that holders of a $60,000 mortgage against its property will be marked satisfied and the obligation cancelled without payment of anything. The parish property, clear of debt, will be therefore about $100,000. This property is chiefly in a site that is almost a square block in size. St. Margaret's was started in 1899 by volunteer laymen, who afterwards founded the Seabury Society. Its services were held for two years in the parlor of a local mansion. Then the Johnson family, owners of property in the district, built a frame church, later a parish house, and deeded the site to the parish, subject to a holding mortgage. No interest was ever paid on the mortgage. Now the family cancels the mortgage. The Rev. Dr. Henry Hale Gifford, late rector, has resigned to accept a call in the Diocese of Albany, and the Rev. Mr. Sturges, from St. Bartholomew's Parish, Manhattan, is taking the services during August. No plans for the future of the parish have been made, pending the return of Bishop Manning. Very much of the success of the parish was due to the late Rev. Dr. Charles A. Hamilton, its first rector, to whom the laymen in charge transferred the work, after the land had been secured and the frame church erected. St. Margaret's last confirmation class, presented by Dr. Gifford, numbered seventy-three.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop

The congregations of St. Paul's, Williamstown, Christ Church, Lykens, and St. Bartholomew's, Millersburg, met at a picnic in Millersburg early in the summer. In the morning the Holy Communion was celebrated on the picnic grounds by the Rev. William M. Gamble, of Manheim. The choir of Christ Church, Lykens, furnished the music. After the service there was a program of edification and amusement. The Lykens choir was assisted by an orchestra, and hymns were sung and also songs of a lighter nature. The address of the occasion was made by the Rev. Thomas S. Cline, rector of Grace Church, Mount Airy, Philadelphia. He dwelt on the topics of Dr. Cabot's book, "Work, Play, Love, Worship." The occasion ended with evening prayer.

At a vestry meeting recently held the Rev. William M. Gamble was elected rector-emeritus of St. Paul's, Manheim. Mr. Gamble will be leaving for his home near Washington, D. C., early in December. He proposes to enter upon a course of special study.

The third annual Grove Assembly of the Northern Archdeaconry took place in the private park of Mr. Joseph Eberly in Westfield on Sunday, August 7. Three hundred people were present from the thirteen parishes and mission stations in that Archdeaconry. Morning Prayer was read at 10 A. M. by the Rev. L. P. Davies, of Brookland; the lessons being read by Mr. B. Trowbridge, a junior of Cornell University. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Tyndell, of Christ Church, Williamsport. The Rev. Henry A. Post, of Christ Church, Coudersport, was the celebrant of the Holy Communion, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Davies and Tyndell. The vested choir of St. John's, Westfield, furnished the music.

After the luncheon the Assembly was called to order by F. J. Wandall, Esq., warden of Christ Church, Coudersport. Those who spoke were J. G. Covey, a warden of Christ Church, Coudersport, who spoke on a vestryman's viewpoint of the clergyman and the congregation and the need of contact with the Church in the solution of modern family and business problems; Captain Harvey Horton, of California, of the airplane service of the U. S. Army, who spoke of his religious experience and thoughts while flying thousands of feet up in the air, particularly of his first night flight and hazardous landing. Rev. Dr. Tyndell spoke concerning the thoughts of the laity as revealed to him from the lips of the laity.

Resolutions were passed thanking Mr. and Mrs. Eberly for courteous hospitality, and expressing regret at the removal of Archdeacon Caruthers from Westfield, and good wishes for his new work in St. Paul's, Columbia.

Personal Notes

The Rev. S. Moylan Bird, for the past sixteen years rector of St. Peter's Church, Brenham, Tex., has accepted the call to St. Andrew's Church, Bryan, Tex., effective September 1. Mr. Bird is Secretary of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Texas, and all communications should be addressed to him at Bryan, care St. Andrew's Church.

Rev. Guy F. Caruthers, D. D., has accepted a call to St Paul's, Columbia, and will enter on his work there September 1. He has been rector of Christ Church, Coudersport, for about seven years, and has served there most acceptably.

Blowing Rock: The Stringfellow Memorial Church has been ministered to this summer by four clergymen from different parts of the State. The Rev. Basil M. Walton, of Lenoir, and the Rev. R. B. Owens, of Charlotte, had charge of the services during June and July. The Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, of Gastonia, is the priest in charge for August, and the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, of Red Springs, will officiate in September. The church is a beautiful new stone structure, a memorial to Mrs. Susie P. Stringfellow, erected by her husband, Mr. W. W. Stringfellow, of Anniston, Ala. It was consecrated on Sunday, August 7, by the Rt. Rev. Julian M. Horner, of Asheville.

How Coca-Cola Resembles Tea

If you could take about one-third of a glass of tea, add two-thirds glass of carbonated water, then remove the tea flavor and add a little lemon juice, phosphoric acid, sugar, caramel and certain flavors in the correct proportion, you would have an almost perfect glass of Coca-Cola.

In fact, Coca-Cola may be fairly described as "a carbonated, flavored counterpart of tea, of approximately one-third the stimulating strength of the average cup of tea."

The following analyses, made and confirmed by the leading chemists throughout America, show the comparative stimulating strength of tea and Coca-Cola stated in terms of the quantity of caffein contained in each:

Black tea—1 cupful (hot) (5 fl. oz.) ..... 1.54 gr.

Green tea—1 glassful (cold) (8 fl. oz., exclusive of ice) ..... 2.02 gr.

Coca-Cola—1 drink, 8 fl. oz. (prepared with 1 fl. oz. of syrup) ..... .61 gr.

Of all the plants which Nature has provided for man's use and enjoyment, none surpasses tea in its refreshing, wholesome and helpful qualities. This explains its almost universal popularity.

The Coca-Cola Company has issued a booklet giving detailed analysis of its recipe. A copy will be mailed free on request to anyone who is interested. Address:

The Coca-Cola Co., Dept. J, Atlanta, Ga., U. S. A.

J1

INCORPORATED 1832

Virginia Fire and Marine Insurance Company

Of Richmond, Va.

ASSETS - - - - - - - - $2,744,156.41

Wm. H. Palmer, President
B. C. Lewis, Jr., Secretary
J. M. Leake, General Agent
E. B. Addison, Vice-President
J. C. Watson, Treasurer
Wm. P. Hill, Asst. Genl. Agent

JOHN L. WILLIAMS & SONS

BANKERS and BROKERS

Eighth and Main (P. O. Box 565)

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA

Transact a general Banking and Brokerage Business. Deal in Southern Investment Securities. Negotiable Railroad and Municipal Bonds

GRAIN, HAY, FEEDS

FIELD SEEDS AND BASIC SLAG

S. T. Beveridge & Co.

Office: 1217 East Cary Street

Warehouse and Elevator: Seventh and Byrd

Richmond, Va.

School Desks

Opera Chairs,
Folding Chairs,
Church Pews,
Kindergarten Chairs,
School Supplies,
Blackboards.

SOUTHERN DESK CO., Hickory, N. C.

GRANITE AND MARBLE MEMORIALS

Largest stock in the South
We pay the freight and guarantee safe arrival

The Couper Marble Works

(Established 65 years)
264-268 Bank St., Norfolk, Va.

To Mothers

And all Friends of Children:

What will you read to your boys and girls this summer to give them a religious message they will love?

Thousands have found the answer in

Sunny Windows

By W. Russell Bowie, D. D.

Author of "The Children's Year."

The first edition is already exhausted, and the second is on the press.

CLOTH, $1.25 NET

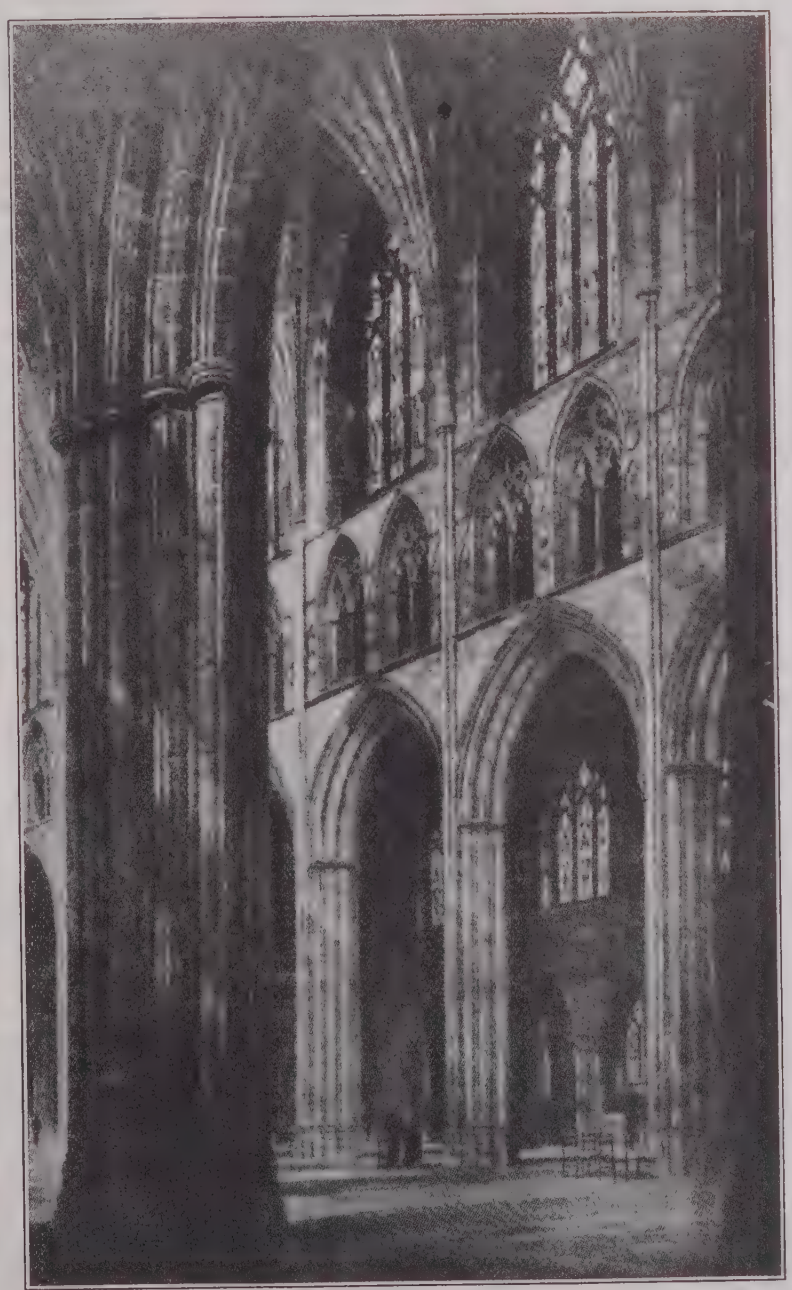
For Sale by

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN

Richmond, Virginia

"The Store That Pleases"

FOR FURNITURE



JONES BROS. & CO.

INCORPORATED

1418 East Main St. :-: Richmond, Va

Southern Churchman

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 27, 1921 No. 35.

PILLAR IN NAVE OF THE WASHINGTON CATHEDRAL.
(From the Architect's Drawing.)

EDUCATIONAL

Church Schools in the Diocese of Virginia, Inc.

RT. REV. WM. C. BROWN, D. D., President.

FOR BOYS:

ST. CHRISTOPHER'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Boarding and Day School. Separate Lower School for smaller boys. 6 bldgs., 15 acres of grounds and athletic fields. Small classes. Staff of 10 college graduates. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $650. Eleventh session begins Sept. 21, 1921.

Catalogue from REV. C. G. CHAMBERLAYNE, Ph. D., Headmaster.

CHRISTCHURCH SCHOOL
Middlesex County, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater Virginia. 3 bldgs., 100 acre farm. Safe boating, bathing, fishing. Home influences. Ready accessibility. Boarding department limited to 22 boys for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from REV. F. E. WARREN, Rector, P. O., Marl, Va.

FOR GIRLS:

ST. CATHERINE'S SCHOOL
Westhampton, Richmond, Va.

A Country Day School (Boarding department planned for 1922). From Montessori through college preparatory courses, etc. 5 bldgs., 8 acre playground. Emphasis on healthy outdoor life. Catalogue from MISS ROSALIE HAXALL NOLAND, B. A., Principal.

ST. ANNE'S SCHOOL
Charlottesville, Virginia

A Boarding and Day School in Piedmont Virginia. Location healthful and beautiful. From primary through college preparatory courses. Also music, art and general courses. Boarding department limited to 40 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $500. Twelfth session begins Sept. 21, 1921. Catalogue from MISS EMMA S. YERBY, Principal.

ST. MARGARET'S SCHOOL
Tappahannock, Essex County, Va.

A Boarding and Day School in Tidewater Virginia. Beautiful location on Rappahannock River. 6 acres, central building antebellum home remodeled, with 2 new wings. All modern conveniences. From primary, through college preparatory courses. Also music and general courses. Boarding department limited to 32 pupils for the present. Board and tuition in same $400. First session begins Sept. 28, 1921. Catalogue from MISS BERTHA A. LATANE, M. A., Principal.

Gifts and bequests for equipment, enlargement, scholarships, and endowment, requested. Address communications to REV. E. L. WOODWARD, M. D. Dean, 400 Old Dominion Trust Bldg., Richmond, Va.

Episcopal High School

NEAR ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The eighty-fourth year of this School for Boys opens September 21, 1921. Modern equipment throughout. Catalogue on application.

A. R. HOXTON, B. A., Principal.

FASSIFERN SCHOOL, FOR GIRLS
Hendersonville, N. C.

Situated in the beautiful mountain country. College preparatory and general high school courses. Lower school for grades below high school. Music, Art, Athletics, Home Economics. Riding lessons under trained teacher. MISS KATE C. SHIPP, Principal.

The Bishop Payne Divinity School

The accredited Seminary of the Church for training colored men for the ministry. The forty-fourth session opens September 21, 1921.

For catalogue and information, apply to

REV. C. B. BRYAN, Dean, Petersburg, Va.

Southern Churchman

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN COMPANY
Publishers
815 East Grace Street, - - Richmond, Va.

LEWIS C. WILLIAMS.....President
E. B. ADDISON.....Vice-President
REV. E. L. GOODWIN, D. D.....Editor
REV. W. RUSSELL BOWIE, D. D..Associate Editor
REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE.....Associate Editor
JOHN H. COOKE.....Managing Editor

Entered at the Postoffice in Richmond, Va., as second-class mail matter.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE—After January 1, 1918, $3.00 per year in advance. To the Clergy, $2.00. Six months, $1.50. Trial subscription 3 months 50 cents, 10 cents a copy. Foreign postage 50 cents additional. Back numbers not over 3 months old 30 cents each, over 3 months old 25 cents each

For the convenience of subscribers, subscriptions are continued at expiration unless otherwise ordered. Notice of renewal, discontinuance, or change of address should be sent two weeks before the date they are to go into effect.

RECEIPT OF PAYMENT is shown in about two weeks by change of date on address label. If date is not properly extended after each payment notify us promptly. No receipt for payment will be sent.

Notice post office address. The exact post office address to which we are directing the paper at the time of writing MUST ALWAYS BE GIVEN. Our mailing list is arranged by post offices and not alphabetically.

Make all checks and money orders payable to the Southern Churchman and not to an individual.

ADVERTISEMENTS—Rates quoted on request. For Classified see head of that department.

Representatives wanted in each Parish, liberal commissions.

News concerning the church at large always welcome.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Religion that is not used cannot be kept sweet.—Ex.

Wherever I see a young man teaching the gospel to half a dozen children, I recognize a living branch of the Church of Christ.—John Cairus.

As soon as we make God's Word a lamp to our feet, we stop traveling in the dark.

Every Christian has as much of a call to preach to her children as St. Peter had to preach to the multitude on the Day of Pentecost.—Ex.

There is no sin so little but that if it had the right of way and time enough, it would wreck the universe.—Ex.

Christ never sent any one to anybody else who came to Him for help.—Ex.

(U. S. Destroyer in distance)
R. O. T. C. and NAVAL UNITS
A CHURCH SCHOOL FOR CHURCH BOYS.

Established 1867. Prepares for college and business life. Military training by Army officers. 8 Naval cutters, high-powered launch for Naval unit. Sea trips on U. S. war vessels. $70,000 improvements last year. Mild climate permits outdoor sports the year round. Unique training in carefulness and the value of money. Broader training than public schools. Separate School for smaller boys. Catalog.

REV. WALTER MITCHELL, D. D., Rector
Box A Charleston, S. C.

Emerald Hodgson Hospital

—AND—
TRAINING SCHOOL FOR NURSES
UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tenn.

A Church institution where the best training to be had for development of Nurses. For further information, address,

REV. W. S. CLAIBORNE, Supt

ST. HILDA'S HALL

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA.

The Chevron School for girls. Episcopal. In the Shenandoah Valley. College preparatory. Elective Courses. Music and Art. Athletics. Open air classes Individual instruction. $600.

MARIAH PENDLETON DUVAL, Principal
(Former Principal Stuart Hall)

HOBART COLLEGE For Men
William Smith College for Women

GENEVA, N. Y.

100th Year Opens September 20, 1921

Hobart offers a large number of scholarships to students preparing for Holy Orders.

RT. REV. CHARLES H. BRENT, D. D., LL. D., CHANCELLOR

REV. MURRAY BARTLETT, D. D., PRESIDENT

For information address the President

The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

The Ninety-ninth Session Open Wednesday, September 21, 1921

For catalogs and other information, address The Dean, Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

Roanoke College

Salem, Va.

A standard college for men. In beautiful Valley of Virginia. Noble record for producing leaders for the Church and nation.

CHAS. J. SMITH ... President.

The Virginia Home and Training School

Falls Church, Fairfax County, Va.
For the Feeble-Minded.
Established 1892.
For terms and information, address
MISS M. GUNDRY.

The General Theological Seminary

CHELSEA SQUARE, NEW YORK.

The next Academic year begins on the last Wednesday in September.

Special students admitted and Graduate Course for graduates of other Theological Seminaries.

The requirements for admission and other particulars can be had from THE DEAN, 1 Chelsea Square, New York, N. Y.

Virginia Episcopal School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Prepares boys at cost for college and university Modern equipment. Healthy location in the mountains of Virginia. Cost moderate, made possible through generosity of founders. For catalogue apply to

REV. WILLIAM G. PENDLETON, D. D., Rector

EDUCATIONAL

To have your path made plain means that strength will be given to walk in it. Difficulties will prove to be incentives; tribulation is always on the upward road that leads to perfection.

Peden, the Covenanter, speaks for all right Christians when he says: "For my part, I seek no more, if He bids me go." And in one of his sermons the refrain is this: "They sought no more than this commandment; they went and He carried them well through."—W. M. Macgregor.

"The very charge of inconsistency" which unconverted men so often bring against those who call themselves by the name of Christ is a tacit homage to the gospel."

"Christ showed His disciples His need of them. Surely this was an enviable portion."

THE CATHEDRAL SCHOOL of Florida.
Episcopal—a homelike school for girls. College preparatory and general course. Delightful winter climate. LILIAS S. BILL, Principal, Orlando, Florida.

Virginia, Chatham. Box 13.
The Chatham Episcopal Institute for Girls
Music, Art, Domestic Science, Expression. Thorough preparation for all colleges. New buildings. Ten-acre campus. Athletics. Gymnasium. Terms moderate. Catalogue and views.
B. D. Tucker, D. D., President; Rev. C. O. Pruden, D. D., Rector; Miss Annie Marian Powell, A. B., Sweet Briar, A. M., Columbia, Prin.

The Misses Eastman's School for Girls
1305 Seventeenth St.
Washington, - D. C.

SEWANEE MILITARY ACADEMY
53rd year. In an ideal spot, heart of the Cumberland mountains, 2,000 feet elevation. College preparatory; also equips for citizenship. Military instruction secures regularity, neatness, respect, promptitude. Student body are boys of character who are developed into manly men of purpose. 40-acre campus and 8,000 acres added domain. Vigorous outdoor life; all athletics R. O. T. C. Episcopal. Early registration advisable. Catalog. Address The Principal, Sewanee, Tenn.

The Church Training and Deaconess House
OF PENNSYLVANIA
provides for resident students a two years course of study and training in practical work, fitting them to be Church Workers or Deaconesses. For information, apply to
THE ADMISSION COMMITTEE
708 Spruce Street. Philadelphia, Pa.

I like to think of Him when at twilight the tide lies low,
And the boats slip out from the beach with measured oar and slow;
I like to think how He walked on the shores of Galilee;
And saw with the eyes of the Christ the common things we see.

I like to think of Him, too, when the sunrise colors spread
Over a world that seemed sleeping, and still, and dead;
How at Gennesaret they flashed over His brave, wan face;
Taking the dark night out; putting God in its place.

I like to think of the Lord as I walk each walk of life;
How His eyes looked straight at God, how His hands cured pain and strife;
I like to remember His love when the night is cool and still;
Brother and Friend and King, deed of a perfect will!

—M. S. Wonson.

Trust in Jesus Christ brings infinitude on my side. Submission is repose. When we cease to kick against the pricks they cease to stick and wound us. Trust opens the heart, like the windows of the ark, tossing upon the black and fatal flood, for the entrance of the peaceful dove with the olive branch in its mouth. But "the wicked is like the troubled sea which cannot rest."—A. Maclaren.

O Father, turn Thy face toward me, bless
Each darkest hour! Knowing Thou art near,
I will not try dark things to comprehend,
Nor shall my heart in sorrows darkness fear,
But rest on Thee, my Father and my Friend!

—Bishop Doane.

Never dare to hurt any soul. The most awful consciousness a man can have is that he has hurt a human soul years ago and now has no power to repair the damage. He may have recovered from the injury to his own being, but the knowledge that he has ever injured the soul of another man or woman, who has gone out of his sight now, so that he cannot know how serious the injury may have been, is a terrible thing for any one to know.—Phillps Brooks.

Worldly men are sometimes malicious observers, glad to see Christians go wrong; but often they like to see something better than they realize, and are disappointed when Christians go wrong. All society has a real interest in the elevation of the standard of morals. The world generally only despises what is despicable in character. It dislikes pretence, sanctimoniousness, narrowness, readiness to lengthen the creed and shorten the decalogue.—R. Tuck.

MCGUIRE'S UNIVERSITY SCHOOL
Opposite William Byrd Park.
A private preparatory day school for Richmond boys. Efficient and experienced faculty. Personal attention. Individual instruction. Small classes. Thorough preparation for college or business. Accredited by the leading universities, colleges, technical schools, and the U. S. Military and Naval Academies. Tuition and expenses reasonable.
Lower School for little boys. Apply for catalogue with college record.
JOHN P. MCGUIRE, Principal.
Richmond, Va.

VIRGINIA POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE
(The State Agricultural and Mechanical College.)
All Courses Open Alike to Men and Women.
Four-year courses for high school graduates, leading to B. S. degree, in Agriculture, Engineering, Applied Science and Teacher-Training. Two-year courses in Pre-medical, Home Demonstration and Practical Agriculture. Short unit courses in agricultural branches and printing (linotype). For catalog and full information, address Dean of the College, V. P. I., Blacksburg, Va.

PEABODY
BALTIMORE, MD.
The Leading Endowed Musical Conservatory in the Country.
Scholarships, Operatic training.
Tuition in all grades & Branches. Circulars mailed.

MARY BALDWIN SEMINARY. For Young Ladies. Established 1842. Term begins Sept. 8th. In historic Shenandoah Valley. Students from 33 States. Courses: Collegiate (3 years), Preparatory (4 years). Music, Art, Expression and Domestic Science. Athletics, gymnasium. Catalog. Staunton, Va.

Collegiate School for Girls
Incorporated.
In the city of Richmond, Va.
A private day school for girls, with primary intermediate and high school departments. College preparatory and general courses. Seventh session opens September 22, 1921.
MARY ALICE BRADFORD,
Head of the School.

Stuyvesant School
WARRENTON, VA.
Foothills of the Blue Ridge
Fifty miles from Washington
Lower School for boys nine to thirteen.
Upper School for boys thirteen to college.
Small classes and individual attention.
Send for Catalogue
EDWIN B. KING, M. A.
Headmaster

FAUQUIER INSTITUTE
For Girls and Young Ladies Warrenton, Va.
The 62nd session begins September 29, 1921. Situated in Piedmont region of Virginia, 55 miles from Washington. A limited and thorough home school. Modern buildings, 5-acre campus. Catalog.
MISS NELLIE V. BUTLER, Principal, Box 17

ST. FAITH'S
A HOME SCHOOL FOR GIDLS
Saratoga Springs - - - New York
Thoroughness of Instruction
Vocational Guidance
Definite Church Teaching
Invigorating Climate
Provincial School of the Synod of New York and New Jersey.
Very Low Rates. For catalogue, address
The Rev. Harry Clarke Plum, A. B., Prin., Box 356-S

O. Luetke's Art Works

Church Furnishings

IN METAL, WOOD, MARBLE, ETC.

Est. 886. 328-332 7th Ave. New York

The Norfolk Convention

Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the United States
The thirty-sixth annual national gathering of clergy and laity of the Church

NORFOLK, VA.

Wednesday to Sunday, October 12 to 16, 1921
The first convention in the South since 1914

The program and speakers will be announced later
For information, address

BROTHERHOOD OF ST ANDREW

CHURCH HOUSE, 202 SOUTH 19TH STREET
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Johnson's Foot Soap

(On market for over fifty years)

Made of Borax, Iodine amd Bran, is a sure and safe relief for those tired, aching, tender swollen, burning

FEET

that have been causing you so much pain. 25c, ALL DRUGGISTS. If unobtainable at your druggist, sent direct on receipt of price.

Thomas Gill Soap Co.

711-719 Kent Ave., Brooklyn, New York

J. & R. Lamb
25-25-27 SIXTH AVENUE NEW YORK
MEMORIALS IN STAINED GLASS
MOSAIC · MARBLE · STONE · GRANITE
CARVED WOOD · METAL · ETC.

666 CURES MALARIA, CHILLS AND FEVER, BILIOUS FEVER. COLDS AND LA GRIPPE, OR MONEY REFUNDED.

Second Edition now Ready!

"The Gospel of Life"

by the Reverend

PHILLIPS S. GILMAN

With an Introduction by

THE BISHOP OF EAST CAROLINA

Hundreds of readers have testified to its simple, uplifting revelation of Health, Happiness and Holiness in the Name of Jesus Christ

Price 60 cents, postpaid

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN CO.,
Richmond, Va.

In Matters Pertaining to

Banking, Trusts or Real Estate we cordially invite your business.
Interest allowed on daily balances of Savings and Dormant Accounts.
We have many customers who do their banking by mail.

RICHMOND TRUST CO.

Capital and Surplus $1,200.000.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS, Chairman of the Board
E. L. BEMISS, President — C. J. ANDERSON, Vice-President
J. D. CRUMP, Vice-President — R. J. WILLINGHAM, Jr., Sec'y. and Treas
DEANE MAURY, Trust Officer.

IS IT COLLEGE FOR YOUR BOY OR GIRL WHEN THEY GROW UP?

Let us help you send them to any College in this State.
Write or ask for our College Plan booklet.

American National Bank

Richmond, Va.

THE PRAYER BOOK

of the Protestant Episcopal Church is not only a compendium of Religion, but also of sound common sense.

x x x

It gives this advice (page 285)—

x x x

"Men should often be put in remembrance to take order for the settling of their temporal estates whilst they are in health."

x x x

Remember: "Whilst YOU are in health."

x x x

VIRGINIA TRUST CO.

The SAFE EXECUTOR,
821 E. Main St.

x x x

P. S.—Many times in the past we have been able to give helpful suggestions to men and women who were making their wills, and we cordially invite interviews on the subject, which, of course, are confidential.

Southern Churchman

Catholic for every truth of God; Protestant against every error of man.

VOL. 86 RICHMOND, VA., AUGUST 27, 1921. No. 35.

SOME "DOGMAS" WE DO NOT WANT

We must confess that we are not particularly up to date concerning the ideas and practices of that group of our uneasy friends within this Protestant Episcopal Church who meticulously call themselves American Catholics. So perhaps it follows naturally that we happen only at this moment to be reading the May issue of the American Church Monthly.

Therein we find certain matter of a highly interesting kind. Here, plainly, is history in the making. And this—let us mark—not merely the commonplace making of present history, which the very process of living will somehow accomplish anyhow, but the making over of past history to suit our present ideas, which is a more deft and graceful accomplishment.

Says the American Church Monthly:

"The decline of moral standards which we are witnessing on every hand today has little to do with the great war. The trouble began many years before the war. It is the outcome of the modern revolt against the dogmas of the Catholic faith. That revolt began with the New Learning—the revival of Paganism, which we call the Renaissance. It was carried still further with the continental Reformation, when the authority of the Catholic Church was rejected by a large section of the population of Europe, and the Bible, as interpreted by private judgment, was put in the place of the dogmatic tradition of the Church. * * *

"The only remedy which can go to the root of the difficulty is the return of the modern world to the Catholic faith. That alone can re-establish the supremacy of the moral ideals of the gospel. A hodge-podge kind of unity, which attempts to synthesize the affirmations of the Catholic faith with the negations of Protestantism, cannot do it. The whole Christian world must come back into the one fold under the one Shepherd. Even that will not ensure a perfect civilization. Sin will still be powerful, and the devil will continue to lure many from the flock of Christ. Nevertheless, the return to the old faith is the only thing that can preserve our modern civilization from decay and destruction."

The obvious inference from this is that the world lived in its beatific innocence in an unspoiled Garden of Eden until that calamitous iniquity which was known as the Protestant Reformation came like a serpent into the happy paradise. In the previous years, when everybody was safely dogmatic and no one disputed the authority of the Church, all was well. How happy some of the devout souls whom the American Church Monthly must think of with wistful regret as now in their purgatory, will be to know this! The verdicts of ordinary history have quite gone astray. What curious mistake have the centuries fallen into until now the American Church Monthly in May, 1921, corrects it. The Cardinal Archbishop of Mayence, who patronized the indulgences which Tetzel sold, was doubtless thoroughly correct in his Catholic dogma. So was Leo X, and his predecessors, including those interesting popes, the Borgias. Manifestly, then, it is a mere darkness of ignorance to suppose that they were not the moral lights of their generation. In Catholic dogma they were impeccable. If only we could have preserved the conditions which bred them and their life, and have suppressed the influences which resulted in such inconvenient rebels as Martin Luther, how much better all the world would be!

The trouble with the American Church Monthly is that it is living in a world of unconscious make-belief. It deals with dogmatic abstractions, and loses sight of realities. The kind of dogma which it pleads for is tangled with the medievalism which is no longer tolerable to the Christian liberty of mind and spirit. It is an idol of the cave. Our age, today, does sorely need convictions, but the convictions it needs will not arise from the obscurantism which makes men lose all their sense of discrimination under the spell of words. We want a conviction which rests upon the simple foundation-stone of the personality of Jesus, and which recognizes that the Church, in the very ages when it was most dogmatic, has sometimes most grievously failed to understand Him. We want a conviction which faces forward instead of backward, and knows that the Church can bring redemption to the lives of men only when she realizes that all life is progress, and that past the confessed mistakes of earlier years, she must seek forever afresh to interpret the spirit of the living Christ through the largest thought and most enlightened purpose of the present day.

It is a very old confusion of ideas into which men unconsciously are misled when, as in the quotation from the American Church Monthly, the great word "faith" is used in cloudy and ambiguous sense. If we turn to the eleventh chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, we can read more fully and gloriously than in any other expression what the early Christians meant by faith. It was "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." It was an attitude toward life governed by a living trust in God. It was the spirit of heroic hazarding which glowed in Abraham, and Moses, and the prophets, and in all those others who "quenched violence of fire escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong." The evidence of its belief was not in dogma, but in daring. It was a loyalty, a purpose and a passion. This was the sort of faith which the earliest disciples knew. It was the faith of John and James and Peter and the others when first they followed Jesus. They did not have any elaborate theology. Only they knew that they loved Him, and that they wanted to commit everything they had to Him and to His ideal of the Kingdom of God.

That sort of faith we want forever. We want it equally in every age, because it never dies, and never grows old. It can express itself through ideas and programs which are as new and as infinite as life itself.

But there is another meaning of "faith." It is the meaning which has been given to it by those who try to catalogue into definitions the incommunicable movement of the Spirit. It formalizes into dogmas the convictions which faith turns into fire, and calls these dogmas faith. And inevitably the dull tyranny of ecclesiastical phrase-makers, with ecclesiastical interests to serve, add to the dogmas which are set up as "the faith" formulas which had nothing whatever to do with the convictions on which the fire of the real and living faith was fed. That was what happened in the mediaeval Church. Crude superstition and priestcraft combined to multiply the dogmas which "the faithful" were bound to accept; and the jumble of mediaeval theology, with its crass materialism of the mass, its sacerdotal insistence on the authority of the few to hold in leading strings the souls of the many, its intolerance and impatience of independent thought, is what the American Church Monthly calls "the old faith" which is to be "the only thing that can preserve our modern civilization from decay and destruction"!

Any one who is tempted to believe that might read to his profit the chapters in H. G. Wells' "Outline of History," which include the following paragraph on the mediaeval Church:

"The first thing that will strike the student is the intermittence of the efforts of the Church to establish the world City of God. The policy of the Church was not wholeheartedly and continuously set upon that end. * * * The Kingdom of God that Jesus of Nazareth had preached was overlaid almost from the beginning by the doctrines and ceremonials of an earlier age, and of an intellectually inferior type. * * * In the inevitable jangle of these incompatibles the Church had become dogmatic. In despair of other solutions to its intellectual discords it had resorted to arbitrary authority. Its priests and bishops were more and more men moulded to creeds and dogmas and set procedures; by the time they became cardinals or popes they were usually oldish men, habituated to a politic struggle for immediate ends and no longer capable of world-wide views. They no longer wanted to see the Kingdom of God established in the hearts of men—they had forgotten about that; they wanted to see the power of the Church, which was their own power, dominating men. They were prepared to bargain even with the hates and fears and lusts in men's hearts to ensure that power."

So the great awakening when "the authority of the Catholic Church was rejected by a large section of the population of Europe" was not such a disaster as the American Church Monthly imagines. On the contrary, it set the mind and conscience of whole nations free from the authority of an over-weening ecclesiasticism which had substituted its own dogmas for the glory of a vital faith. Our own age, though it has faults enough, heaven knows, to be corrected, is a great deal better than anything which mediaevalism ever produced; and there is not the slightest danger that twentieth century America, unless it suddenly goes crazy, will turn back to the thing which "Catholic" Christianity used to be to cure it of its ills.

We need "the old faith," but the old faith is something very different, and very much older, than the collection of dogmas and definitions, and the veneration of the corpse of an ecclesiastical authority, which the American Church Monthly recommends. The old faith is the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. It is the enfranchisement of mind and spirit to seek in ever larger ways for the interpretation of His ideal of the Kingdom of God in the life of men.

Book Notices

The Life and Growth of Israel. By Samuel A. B. Mercer, Ph. D., D. D. Morehouse Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis. Price $1.25.

This little book, which contains but eight chapters, is wonderfully informative, and shows great learning and research in its preparation. Its style is thoroughly readable and interesting.

The author treats the Jewish nation as a person, entitling his chapters "The Infancy of Israel," "The Childhood of Israel," "Israel's Youth," etc., etc., pointing out the way in which the history of each period corresponds to the same season in the growth and development of an individual.

After a chapter on "The Rock From Whence They Were Hewn," in which he introduces Abraham, and deals with his migration from Ur, he divides the life of the nation as follows:

Infancy, from the entrance into Egypt to the end of the desert wanderings and growth, concluding with the death of Moses.

Childhood, from the entrance into Canaan to the establishment of the kingdom.

The Youth of Israel begins with the activities of Samuel, introducing Saul and David, and continuing to the death of that great Bible hero, leaving a well organized and firmly established monarchy.

The "Coming of Age of Israel" took place between the death of David and the time of the prophet Amos in the eighth century. During this time the author says, "This was perhaps the most eventful period of their life, but they were just beginning to enter upon that fuller and richer life which was destined to be theirs."

Dr. Mercer considers that the maturity of the Hebrew nation took place between the date of Amos, the first of the writing prophets and the fall of Jerusalem, and her "ripened maturity" during the period of four centuries or so from that time to the establishment of the Maccabees.

His last chapter, on "Israel's Residuary Gifts," is very interesting, and deals with a period on which the Bible is entirely silent.

The author takes the position of the higher critic toward the Bible, and ascribes the authors and dates of the various books to a time much later than those given by most commentators.

In the beginning of the book is a table of approximate dates and events which is concise and useful for reference.

M.

Dramatized Bible Stories for Young People. Mary M. Russell. George H. Doran Co., New York. $1.28.

This small volume is valuable more for its suggestions than for its contents. Indeed, its author tells us in the introduction that it is meant to be used as an outline for busy clergymen or Sunday school workers to use in their work and save them the time of preparing scenes and additional characters for dramatizing familiar Bible stories.

The whole subject is one of tremendous importance and value, for it deals with a new method of giving Bible instruction, and that a method which has a peculiar fascination for young people of today.

In this book Miss Russell offers twelve of the most familiar episodes of the Scripture in the form of short plays. She begins with Moses' birth, hiding and discovery by Pharaoh's daughter, and takes Isaac and Rebecca, Miriam, Ruth ,Esther, Naaman and Nehemiah from the Old Testament.

In the New Testament the following scenes and subjects are used: "Easter Morn" and "Easter Morning," "The Ten Virgins," "The Good Samaritan," "The First Christmas."

All of these chapters are short, so as to leave room for additional scenes or acts to be planned and composed by pupils or teachers in Sunday schools.

Miss Russell is instructor in Young People's Methods in the School of Religious Education and Social Service of Boston University, and was formerly Associate Superintendent of Young People's Department of the Board of Sunday Schools.

In her introduction she calls attention to the fact that this book is meant for the use of adolescents and not little children, and that the dramatic method of Bible instruction can best be used with the teen ages.

Altogether, this book is one that should be in every Sunday school library for reference and help. M.

LABOR SUNDAY MESSAGE.

From the Commission on the Church and Social Service, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America

The message for this Labor Sunday is set against a background of suffering and confusion. The land is filled with unemployment. Possibly one-fourth of the population are straiteened and anxious. Thousands of employers are holding their industries together merely from day to day. Labor is fighting for the fundamental right of collective action, and fighting at a serious disadvantage. The freedom of the ministry to proclaim a social gospel and to apply it according to their own honest convictions is sharply challenged. Even the common right of citizens to freedom of speech and assembly in many communities is at stake.

In such a troubled time as this it would be easy for the Church to hold aloof from industrial questions. To confine itself to simpler tasks would seem the path of prudence. The summons, however, is not to the easy way, but to the way of duty. Concerning the relations of men to each other in the economic and industrial realm, as well as in the other areas of life, the Church must seek to discover and to proclaim the mind of Christ. To do so calls us, indeed, to humility and to prayer, but also to courage and to faith.

When the pulpit speaks on human relations in industry it is not undertaking to advise the engineer or manager about the technique of management or machine processes. It is simply trying to apply its gospel to the relationships between men in the working world. It cannot be too strongly asserted that the preacher has a specialty as well as the engineer. Machinery, buying, selling, finance—these are matters of which he has only incidental knowledge. But the relation of persons to one another is always a moral and religious question, and so is inevitably in the preacher's field.

The immediate and compelling consideration for the Church is always its divine commission to win men and women to personal discipleship to Christ. But a redeemed life is one redeemed in all its aspects and relationships. The economic and industrial factors that condition the lives of men and women and help to make them what they become are, therefore, as much a concern of the Church as any other phase of their moral environment. An industrial practice that cramps and devitalizes human beings in body or in spirit is as much a foe of religion as is the liquor traffic. The Church cannot ignore the one any more than it can ignore the other.

Not only so, but the charter of the Church, received directly from its Leader, requires that it proclaim the gospel of the kingdom. Jesus said of this kingdom that it is like leaven hidden in meal—it works until "the whole lump" is leavened. There are no areas of life which Jesus excluded from the ultimate operation of the law of the kingdom. A gospel that is susceptible of only partial application is not a gospel which can save the world. A Church which is content to recognize limits to the proclamation of its message is a defeated Church.

Christian Principles to Be Applied to Industry.

There are at least three fundamental principles in the teachings of Jesus that the Church must apply to industry. Unless we can learn to conduct industry according to these basic principles, the kingdom of God cannot prevail in the modern industrial world.

1. Men are to live as brothers.

That God is our common Father, and that men are therefore to live together as brothers, is the very foundation of Jesus' message. To the more simple social and business relationships the application of this teaching is at once apparent. The storekeeper and his clerk, the farmer and his hired man, the mistress and her maid, find no obstacle outside their own wills to the maintenance of Christian relationships. But between several hundred absentee stockholders on the one hand and several thousand wage-earners on the other, relations are so impersonal and distant that the responsibilities which brotherhood implies are more difficult to grasp and are too seldom regarded with seriousness. In the administration of a large industry policies are frequently inaugurated which would not have been determined upon if their full human consequences could have been instantly visualized. The investors in an industry expect its managers, first and principally, to produce profits. The directors scrutinize the records, but rarely visit the workshops. In consequence, men and material are lumped together as commodities. labor is bought in the market like goods, and the personal equation is lost in a mechanical system.

Democracy in industry must be realized progressively and is being steadily approached today in an increasing number of industrial establishments. Recognition of the ideal commits no one to any particular social theory or program. Collective bargaining with labor unions is an expression of the democratic ideal; so also are some of the various forms of labor representation in shop councils. There are also democrartic forms of co-operation by which labor relations within a plant are handled as in a town meeting or a family circle. It is quite possible to develop such forms of association, without prejudice to those vital interests of labor which are conserved by its own regular forms of organization, and to secure a real partnership between employer and employes. Such a partnership may go to any length in democratic procedure that those concerned may desire it to go.

2. A human life is of immeasurable value.

Jesus taught the immeasurable value of a human life. Once born into the world, all society is obligated to see that it has a chance. Modern high-speed machinery is dangerous even with the best of safety devices. Although we have deeply mourned the loss of the 48,000 American men who were killed in the great war, we have given little thought to the fact that during the same period of nineteen months, American industries claimed 35,000 victims. This fearful rate of destruction still continues. With all the impetus to protection of life given by the workmen's compensation and industrial safety movements, the dangers of modern machine processes still show that too low a value is placed upon the life and health of human beings.

Since prices began to recede we have heard much concerning excessive wage demands. Without doubt, wages in certain occupations have been out of proportion to those paid in the less skilled and less well-organized trades. But throughout the entire period of war prices large groups of wage-earners have been compelled by inadequate wages to live at a low standard. Not only so, but even the war-time wages of higher skilled labor, whether of hand or brain, can be considered disproportionately high only when it is forgotten that in the production of all our wealth labor bears the most irksome burden, takes the heaviest risks and suffers the gravest insecurity.

3. Service is the Christian motive.

Of course, business cannot be run without an adequate financial return. The services of physicians, teachers and even of ministers require compensation. But the primary motive in these professions is assumed to be service. A Christian society will try to put business under the same motive; it will purge itelf of all ruinous competition and substitute for it a co-operation that preserves initiative and all the stimulus of competitive enterprise without its war-like methods. The kingdom of God is builded through service and sacrifice; it cannot be builded out of selfishness and with the motive of profit dominating, nor can it ever be builded apart from the daily activities of men.

And the motive of service is not only entirely practicable, but it is the only salvation of business itself. The service motive will bring a spirit into industry that will minimize strife and selfishness and magnify fraternity and goodwill. It will inspire production and tend to eliminate waste. With the profit motive controlling both employer and employe, each seeks to exploit the other, each looks upon the other with suspicion, friction grows between them instead of confidence, and industry assumes the aspect of war broken only by periods of truce. The operation of the profit motive defeats the practical purpose of industry—continuous, efficient production. If the service motive can be made mutual, employer and employe will learn to work together in mutual goodwill and the wastage of strife will be turned into mutual advantage.

The Golden Rule is the classic expression of all these ideas and of the spirit in which alone they can ever be made real. Without that spirit the most carefully devised system of organized relationships will be ineffective. The Golden Rule means the comprehension of another's point of view, and the doing as one would be done by. It is a rule to be observed day by day, especially as new situations arise, and to be used equally by manager and men. These Christian principles are as binding upon one group in industry as upon the other; and only in so far as they are recognized can industry achieve permanence and security. They will be found at last to underlie the social structure as the laws of chemistry and physics underlie the phenomena of the material world.

The Church as a Teacher of Right Industrial Relations.

The right of the Church to speak on human relationships in industry has been challenged by some representatives of employers, although upheld by many others. It is objected that ministers know nothing about industrial processes, and therefore are not competent to speak upon the relations of employer and employe. This is a challenge which the Church must meet by a full understanding and a clear statement of its relation to industry.

Even in the absence of demonstrations in familiar fact, the Church and its ministry would not lack a sufficient warrant for the proclamation of the gospel with respect to industry. The Church is commissioned to bear testimony to the truth as it is in Christ. The responsibility for making the world of business and industry conform to Christian requirements rests upon those leaders of business and industry who profess to be Christian men.

But the Church is not advocating an untried experiment. Abundant demonstrations are at hand that every sincere approach to the application of the Golden Rule in the world of work has made not only for stability by putting co-operation in place of competitive strife, but for lower costs and a better product. Illustrations of this principle in many types of industry are now at hand. The ideal has nowhere been attained, but the soundness of the principle is no longer open to question.

Clearly the function of the Church is not to manage industry, or to teach either employers or workers how to manage it, but to interpret these Christian principles and to mediate the Christian spirit. To do this effectively, its teachers, and especially its ministers, need to have direct knowledge of industrial conditions. They need to be sufficiently familiar with industrial processes and procedure so that they can illustrate and make clear what these principles mean to industrial relations and in the conduct of business. The pastor must understand the point of view of both the employer and the worker, so as to know the difficulties and responsibilities of each. This requires frequent visits to factories and to the homes of the workers and intensive study of specific problems. Else he may know the gospel, and still be like a physician who is well trained in materia medica and yet who, because not trained in diagnosis, fails to heal. The need of the Church today is for men skilled in the diagnosis of moral ills that the gospel may be more adequately applied to human needs.

But the Church has also the possibility of teaching through its laymen, including employers and leaders of labor who have the Christian spirit and who are working conscientiously at the problem of Christian relationships. These men know the problems of management as the ministers do not, and are competent to speak upon them in their technical aspects. The Church can use them appropriately and with great effect in explaining what Christian principles mean and how they actually operate in industry. The application of these Christian principles rests finally with the laity—with employers, managers and leaders of labor—and upon their spirit and faithfulness depend the future of our industrial life.

The Church must therefore assert and maintain the authority of Christian teaching with reference to the industrial order, and its own right and duty as interpreter of Christian motives and ideals. Let the Church gird itself with humility for this great new task. Let it work by faith, for the difficulties are insurmountable unless one believes in the presence and power of God.

Let the Church keep also the comprehensive social point of view. It is not, and cannot be, partisan. It is, or should be, the shepherd of all; rich and poor, radical and conservative, employer and employed. Class distinctions or conflicting selfish interests have no permanent place in the kingdom of God. The Church may find itself, in the defense of right relations, temporarily supporting the claims of a particular individual or group, but it is not, and cannot be, partisan. Its platform is the Sermon on the Mount. Its function is to promote goodwill and to secure that social justice without which goodwill is impossible. Others will propagate self-interest, hatred and class struggle; it is for the Church to work in the Master's spirit and to give itself to the coming of His kingdom of brotherhood upon the earth.

THE WONDER OF LIFE: EZEKIEL'S VISION.

By the Rev. George William Douglas, D. D.

Afterwards he brought me again unto the door of the house, and behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward. . . . And when the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward, he measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through; the waters were to the loins. Afterwards he measured a thousand, and it was a river that I could not pass over; for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over.—Ezek. 47:1, 3, 4, 6.

Look at the child in the nursery, playing with its toys. That four-square room, those toys, they are its baby measure of its life: a shallow stream that is soon forded. But, before one knows, the little one has grown tall enough to see out of the window, and already the world is before him. By and by he is at college, eager to join the popular society, to win the athletic prize or graduation honors. The stream is higher now; but to most young men it appears fordable. Anon this same person is at his desk in some trade, or a lawyer, or a teacher, or a statesman; or going his rounds as a physician. He is busier now, more anxious. The current is stronger; but he is strong, too, and for some time he supposes that he is contriving to ford the stream. But it brings him to another. Sooner or later the man is in a darkened room. The wind moans, and it is the Death King's voice. The clock beats solemnly in the stilly hall, and it is the man's last earthly hour. The waters have risen and carried him off. The stream of Death is beyond our sounding.

As with the individual, so also with the race. Again and again in human history it has seemed as if mankind has reached the limit of knowledge and power, and despondent critics have proclaimed the decadence—not merely of bad men, but all men—and they have crooned over memorials "of the olden time, the golden time," when both things and men were better. But for those who see with Ezekiel's eyes there is still cause for the same old wonderment, since, in spite of the problems and the horrors, there are still deeper streams for us to cross, and good people, who follow "the man with the line in his hand," are going to cross them. For such as trust the Lord and do righteousness, who, with history to judge by, dares to say that they have over-lived? Or that these few thousand years on this small transtory ball have exhausted the being we call humanity, unsatisfactory indeed in our exhibition of it, but whose ultimate glory has already stood revealed on Easter morning in our Lord Christ, "The first fruits of them that slept"? With Him at our side—with the line in His hand—who of us dare say that even we puny folk have over-lived, in the thirty, fifty, seventy years God has given us here, "before he go hence and are no more seen"?

> "For I, Sir Arthur, saw the Holy Grail.
> I saw the Holy Grail, and heard a cry,
> O Galahad, and O Galahad, follow Me!"

Such, to the prophetic eye, is the general prospect, but let us look at the matter closer and the more personally.

Take, first, man's knowledge. Most of us, at some period of our lives, have undertaken what is called "mastering" a subject. We had a book in our hand of definite dimensions. We could hold it to our eyes, count the pages, and determine to read at least so much a day. The stream seemed fordable. But it was one of the really great books; we soon saw it was not to be treated so cavalierly. Though we had read it through, we were not yet done with it; and we must go on to other books—not only to the new discoveries in the same field, but, if we would rightly appreciate the new, we must go backward to the old; to the monuments and relics of antiquity, Rosette stones, Egyptian hieroglyphics and other strange traces of vanished civilizations. "The waters are risen; waters to swim in; a river that cannot be passed over."

The Positivist does indeed undertake to make it easier for us here. He will separate between what is worth while and what is useless to study. This Positivist says confidently: "I will confine myself to this present time, and to what works now; at any rate to this earth, its facts and needs, its pragmatic tests." But alas for him. Present problems have their springs in the past, their issues in the far future, so that even pragmatism flies away with you. The science of this one earth compels you to the stars also, for earth and stars affect each other. Look at our statesmen who are tackling now that one near thing, our national tariff. Why, they had hardly touched it before they found themselves dealing with the affairs of the entire world, and with that imponderable factor the various mentality of men and races.

Then comes the agnostic, to assist us by circumscribing

the area of knowledge in a diffeffrent way. He would have us confined to what can be treated scientifically. Of God and religion there is no science, he says: for God is unknowable. But of practical, material things there is a science, for matter is knowable (he says). Yet, is even matter knowable in the sense that claims God and the force of spirit in the world to be unknowable? How about electricity, and atoms, and the ether of space? Listen to Herbert Spencer—certainly not a prejudiced witness on the religious side. "Matter," says Spencer, "though we can see and handle it, in its ultimate nature, is as incomprehensible as space and time. It is absolutely certain that behind the veil of visible phenomena there is the presence of an energy, infinite, eternal, and from which all things proceed." On which passage, instead of offering any remark of my own, let me select, by way of commentary, a sentence of Pasteur in his celebrated address when he was admitted to the French Academy: "The man who proclaims the infinite (which Herbert Spencer does)—"the man who proclaims the infinite, and no man can avoid it, accumulates in that one affirmation more of the supernatural than can be found in all the miracles recorded in all religious. For the notion of the infinite is at once self-evident and incomprehensible. When that notion masters our mind, nothing is left for us but to prostrate ourselves in adornation." So the river of Knowledge invariably takes you to waters too deep for man. It is one thing to know, even as a child knows his mother; it is another thing to master and exhaust the object known. If it be possible for man to have a science of matter, then by the same principle it is possible to know Spirit and God. But in both cases man is soon at a point where the contents of his own knowledge transcend his faculties of comprehension. "Thou hast set my feet in a large place." And it is this necessity of wonder, this capacity for it, this vision of the Wonder of the Universe, that has brought, one by one, such scientists as Pasteur, Kelvin, William Crookes, Romanes, Wallace, Langley, Oliver Lodge, William Barrett to confess with Job that "there is a Spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Some of them, like Sir William Barrett, go further. They kneel at the Christian altar, insisting that Christ-like action is scientifically as wonderful as all the rest. "Go, and do thou likewise." "Follow the gleam!"

But the trouble is that so many people, at point after point of this common experience, try to dodge it. When their materialistic, earth-bound assumptions are disproved at one point, they turn away and try them over again at another point. Discouraged in religion, dumb-founded in abstract thinking, bewildered in ethics, they devote themselves to what they call "business" and "affairs." They will not repudiate God, but they will postpone Him, and at point after point let Him alone. They are not "saints," but merely fairly good, as goodness goes; for without some goodness and some honesty even "business" could not be between gentlemen. If active faith in God and religion is difficult, at any rate you must put faith in your fellowmen to a considerable extent; else commerce and fortune-making could not go on, and that would be absurd. So let sociology do, instead of theology. Such men don't pause to consider that those their arguments for business are just as telling for religion—but let that pass. Clearly this river of "affairs" seems, when first you enter it, not beyond your depth. The man that has the line in his hand goes forth, and measures a thousand cubits, and brings you through; the waters are only to the ankles, or at most to the knees. But do they stay so? As you become engrossed in your business, are not the currents swifter, the volume of affairs deeper, the complications and the risks vaster? If you succeed at all, is not the stream of trade a mighty rushing tide whose issues no human mind or will can be sure of? How you do rack your brains! The wheat crop fails in Dakota, or sugar in Louisiana; there is a little less heat, or a little more cold; unforeseen international complications, as now, make men timid; ignorant schemers juggle with the currency; or the workmen quarrel and shoals of immigrants glut the market; or a rampant enemy makes war on you and anon, all your calculations go wrong. You are carried sheer off your feet, while the Bolsheviki knocks sociology in the head.

So you beat a safe retreat, "while it is called today." You retire from business, consolidate your fortune, and say to yourself: "At any rate, I will be happy in my own home. With wife, children and friends I will lead the life of the affections—there I have terra firma." But do you find it, brother? The child you love so dies suddenly, and abashed, heart-broekn, you find yourself peering into the mystery of the grave. Or your children live, and are healthy; but their very healthfulness and their various bents and abilities puzzle you with the anxious problems of fatherhood and motherhood: where shall you send them to school? What profession shall they choose? Whom shall they marry? Where shall you and they live? Or if these matters be settled after a fashion, here is your youngest child that steals up to you on a Sunday afternoon—to you, as father or mother—and asks you those same old questions that you have been trying to avoid in your own case—the questions to avoid which was one reason why you gave up high thinking and the difficult endeavors of the sincere religious life: questions about God, and the soul, and the significance of life, and the riddles of political economy, and why it is necessary to fight for right and justice. You are concerned once again.

And to patriotic citizens of our American nation, there is still another wonder that has lately dawned on us with compelling power. It is that we, such as we know ourselves to be—the youngest nation so far and in some respects so irregular and crude—should have the line given to us by God Most High! With our baffling, perilous, unprecedented history, with our polyglot population, and with so many unsolved problems of our own—all the other nations are looking to us to show them the way to genuine democracy, to a wise and helpful commonwealth. We are "the man with the line in his hand" that Ezekiel saw. Who would have thought it possible? St. Paul's exclamation to the Corinthians (first Cor. 9:17) has a new significance now for every one of us: "Woe unto me, if I preach not the gospel!"

At last, then, humbled, convinced and very serious, you betake yourself to personal religion, about which those dear eyes of the children search you so as to your own behavior. You are more regularly at church. You receive the sacrament. You read your Bible with the up-to-date commentaries. You say your prayers—the old prayers you had intermitted for so long. You perceive that if there be knowledge anywhere, there is knowledge in the Most High. who somehow seems to be unwilling to let you go. Tired of yourself, you lean on God more, and a little on the Church, and most of all on our Master Jesus, Whose personal character appeals to you as an example now more than in the earlier days. The power of God in Jesus Christ takes hold of you and bears you on. You do not ask to see the distant scene: one step enough for you, one step with Jesus—Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end.

Ah! but to believe thus in Jesus—to take Him as your clue in thinking and living and loving, in life and death—is not a reversal of the old law that you found everywhere else. Christ came not to destroy that or any other law, but to fulfil it. You are still beyond your death, carried sheer off your feet. Christ called Himself the Way, implying a perpetual going on. To take up your cross, to commit yourself to Jesus, is to commit yourself to infinite progress. There is no limit to His exactions, no bound to the horizon of truth and duty. "Be ye therefore perfect," he says, "as your Father in heaven is perfect." Put it simply, as our Church Catechism puts it for a child: "To be true and just in all my dealings; to bear no malice or hatred in my heart." Ah, God! it is beyond me still—me, an aging man. I haven't got there. I have not yet attained. I am still seeking a better country, even an heavenly. The old story of Christopher is reversed; it is not you that carry Christ; it is Christ that carries you. For the waters are risen, waters to swim in, a river that cannot be passed over; and this not alone in the domain of duty, but of Christian thinking and spiritual research. Human life and death and eternity, the Bible and theology and science, still have mysteries to test your simplicity of intellect and the courage of your faith. And though Christ has yet many things to say unto you, you cannot hear them now.

Does this sound discouraging? I trow not. On the contrary, this true lesson of our entire life is also the encouragement of life. For, mark you, Ezekiel's waters issued from the door eastward, towards the sunrise, the point of Hope. What is this ever present, yet ever receding limit to the finality of our knowledge and endeavors? What is this mighty stream that rises and rises till it carries us off our feet? It is God: the Lord God Almighty, before Whom we stand, in Whom we have our being. It was a saying of the philosopher, Lessing, that if he were offered the alternative of possessing the truth or searching for it, he would choose the search and let the possession go. But our Divine Father never cuts us in that dilemma. In giving us Himself to live with, He gives both the possession of the truth and the search for the truth. To know and live with Him is to be set free; free to be what we are, what finite beings must be in the presence of infinity; free to pursue, and to investigate, and more and more to apprehend the eternal reality, the great I AM. This is the prospect of heaven, as well as our experience on earth. If it is often pain to us here because of our sins and selfishness, it will be perfect joy to us hereafter, if by God's mercy we stand with the redeemed. The true man knows that it is not for him to be on a level with his God: that he wants, with his whole being, to be lifted up towards God—to wrestle with the mystery of Him, to be humbled by the beauty of Him, to speculate and ponder, to aspire and adore, and evermore to serve unflinchingly where duty lies.

A Thinking God

The Rev. Heerbert D. Cone.

God thinks. This brings Him into the range of human comprehension. The vastness, distance and spirituality are forgotten: He comes near enough to His people to make them feel that He is One with them, like them, and acts just as they do. This was the revelation of the man Christ Jesus. Mingling with people, He thought as they did, and His words fixed this fact on the mind of the race. The Son of God would have His disciples realize that the Father was like them, and used the powers of mind exactly as they do. Here is the mark of a man—he thinks. It is seen, and at once the human is recognized. Christ won this estimate and impressed on every age the certainty that God the Father is very like His children.

Constantly does this fact come to the front. Back of world affairs is a master plan. Study the present condition of this earth—chaos, material, social and religious—reigns. No one can tell where things are going. The business man is plodding on blindly: he tries plan after plan: talks to uphold his courage, and admits after all he sails in a midnight sea without chart or compass. Yet the world of business moves on. The same holds true of national struggles. Attempts to right national conditions is all a chance endeavor. The cry is that so little has been done since the war. The reason is that no one knows what to do. But all the time nations are getting to a better state and conditions are changing for the better. All this drives thoughtful people to the silent leadership of God. He thinks and carries thought into action. Only an infinite Father can bring order out of the issues of today. But He has ever made that part of His work. Careful His plan; patient His processes; but certain His designs in all that has been undertaken. A thinking God in present conditions, is a solid basis for His people's confidence. Never can fear or doubt touch the final issue. He is our Leader and the world will be guided to the best results.

Nature feels the hold of His thought. Often seasons seem to go as they will. Human estimates call them failures. A famine comes to a part of China. Weeks pass and rain has not fallen on fields which needed it in the United States. Changes in heat or cold thwart world harvests. Frosts make the fruit trees barren. These and like events raise the question, Where is the God Who cares for His people? But somehow the world goes on; the famine sufferers, left to starve by their neighbors, are fed by strangers. Just in the time of greatest need rain comes. One product fails and another helps furnish food. Somehow each year life is comfort and food is found. The very strangeness of the working is a pledge of God's thought of His children. He plans to let people know that His thinking is essential to prosperity and welfare, and that no year passes without a revelation of His careful leadership.

Moral and spiritual life is another witness of God's thought. The problem of trial, pain, sorrow and death come in. Living seems too hard to be endured. One ordeal follows another. Loud is the cry, "I have reached the limit of endurance!" But greater burdens are imposed. These additions show that God is thinking of us. His thought shows His estimate of individual possibilities, and He will not suffer us to go beyond our strength.

Out of this fact comes the satisfaction of feeling that God is intensely active in all that goes on, and with a thinking God at the helm the world cannot go wrong and life fails of its great purpose. Confidence rises into certainty. The present processes may seem chaotic, but God will blend them into one beautiful, harmonious triumph. Comfort crowns the whole struggle. All is in God's mind. As a loving Father His people can rest content with the final outcome. It is our privilege in the passing scene to gain these factors from it and win a higher, stronger and more constant trust in God as thought follows thought in the unfolding of His plan for the perfecting of His dear children.

THE ANVIL AND THE HAMMERS.

Last eve I passed beside a blacksmith's door,
And heard the anvil sing the vesper chime;
Then, looking in, I saw upon the floor
Old hammers, worn with beating years of time.
"How many anvils have you had?" said I,
"To wear and batter all those hammers so?"
"Just one," he said; then, with a twinkling eye,
"The anvil wears the hammers out, you know."
And so I thought, the anvil of God's Word
For ages skeptic blows have beat upon;
Yet, though the noise of falling blows was heard,
The anvil is unharmed—the hammers gone.

—John Clifford, D. D.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE HYMNAL QUESTION.

Mr. Editor: May I beg the courtesy of your space to discuss the anomalous situation with regard to the New Hymnal, nearly two years after its adoption by the General Convention? I recall vividly the Hymnal of 1892, coming into almost universal use as soon as published. Congregations were eager to introduce it. To be sure, there was occasional criticism; and small wonder, for it retained only three hundred and seventeen "old hymns," and introduced three hundred and sixty-two "new." Our New Hymnal has only one hundred and five hymns never previously authorized by this Church, leaving four hundred and fifty-six of those in our older books. It can, therefore, not be due to its revolutionary character that its acceptance has been so slow; that, to speak conservatively, the majority of our parishes and missions have not yet adopted it; and that upon the recommendation or mere mention of it, one is met with objections. There is no use denying it, the book is not popular; it has not come into general use, in spite of the decidedly attractive (and no doubt expensive) advertising it has had.

I am prepared to allow for my being not in the State of New York, as in 1893, but in Montana; but I have encountered elsewhere, as a member of the Hymnal Commission (I remember particularly, at a summer conference of clergy) what our English friends describe as "heckling." Most of the criticisms I have answered, at least to my own satisfaction; but the fact remains that a great many of our own people will not take the New Hymnal.

In 1892 the Committee on Canons in the House of Bishops had referred to it a "Resolution of Inquiry"; "as to the measure of obligation in the use of the Hymnal now set forth, and of other Hymnals set forth in like manner." Their report was, in effect, that a Hymnal is adopted by joint resolution of the two Houses of General Convention, and "joint resolutions have never been deemed to have, and are not to be construed as having the force of law, but as being merely the expression of an opinion." The recommendation followed that all future legislation should be by the Constitution required to be by Canon.

Holding perhaps a rather strict view as to the permissibility of hymns not authorized, I introduced a resolution in the House of Deputies in 1913, to add in the Canon Of the Music of the Church, after the words "authorized by the rubric," the words "or allowed by the ordinary"; intending thereby to afford legalized opportunity to try out by actual use hymns which appeared to have a claim to be admitted into any proposed new Hymnal. The committee recommended the reference of the matter to the Joint Commission on Hymnal Revision! The interest of that Commission in the legal or canonical phases of this matter may perhaps be guessed from their printing on page 4 of the New Hymnal, "Canon 25 of Title I of the Digest"—which has been defunct for now more than sixteen years.

In fact, this matter of the authorization of a particular hymn or collection of hymns appears to be in an utterly unsettled state. Our present Canon 48, Of the Music of the Church, reads:

"It shall be the duty of every minister to appoint for use in his congregation hymns or anthems from those authorized by the Rubric, and with such assistance as he may see fit to employ from persons skilled in music, to give order concerning the tunes to be sung in his church." "It shall be his especial duty to suppress all light and unseemly music, and all irreverence in the performance."

The "Rubric" referred to (Book of Common Prayer, page 8, reads):

"Hymns set forth and allowed by the authority of this Church, and anthems in the words of Holy Scripture or of the Book of Common Prayer, may be sung before and after any Office in this book, and alsobefore and after sermons.'

The Canon thus tells us of "hymns—authorized by the Rubric"; and the Rubric tells us of "hymns set forth and allowed by the authority of this Church." Like hunting the dictionary for some anxiously sought definition, we go to the Canon and are told, "See Rubric"; and we go to the Rubric and are told, "See Canon." Remember, we were told in 1892 (in fact, in 1877), the "authority of this Church" is legislatively expressed, not in joint resolutions, but in canons. And our particular Canon uses language loosely in speaking of "hymns authorized by the Rubric."

The Rubric does not "authorize" hymns. The Rubric permits in certain places in divine service the use of hymns "which have been set forth and allowed by the authority of this Church."

That this is no quibble—that in fact it is as yet an open question what kind and what degree of "authority" attaches to any hymn or collection of hymns, became clearly evident when the late Rev. Dr. Hutchins, putting out a year ago his own Church Hymnal Revised, met an attempted inhibition of his book with a defiant denial that the use of a Hymnal, even if approved and authorized by General Convention, was in any such sense obligatory as is the use of the authorized Prayer Book. The appearance of the new "Hutchins," with the immense popularity of the old behind it, with its undeniable merits, with a welcome ready for it in many quarters, forces a question upon us which is no longer to be ignored.

The Canadian Church, after many years of optional use of several popular English collections, unanimously resolved in General Synod in 1905: "It is in the best interests of the Church of England in Canada that there be only one Hymnal in common use in the public services of the Church." And so a Hymnal was prepared and issued in 1909, The Book of Common Praise, displacing all others. Is the Church in the United States going to say, "It is not in the best interests of this Church that there be only one Hymnal"? If so, let us at least do it understandingly.

As a member of the Commission, I trust I am nevertheless open-minded enough to recognize the fact that hymns and hymn-books are made for the Church; that the Church's edification comes first, and that the Church is entitled to the best service obtainable in this as in other things. I think there can be no disloyalty in that. At the same time, is the deliberate action of General Convention in entering upon this undertaking, is the painstaking labor of appointed representatives extending over six years, to say nothing of expert study and research qualifying those men to express judgment—and finally, the concurrent vote of both Houses accepting and approving the result; is all this to amount in the end only to a suggestion to "use the new book if you like it"?

Meanwhile, let us consider frankly some objections one encounters in urging the New Hymnal.

Any new book will have left out some favorite regretted by some one. But while the new "Hutchins," deferring to that sentiment, retains thirty-one more than did our Commission, I myself could find among these scarcely five I should be willing to retain. (Of course. this book also omits one or two I really miss!) Any new book will be criticized for some new hymns admitted; but curiously the New Hymnal has been faulted more for not having a larger number of "Social Service" and other "modern" hymns. The new "Hutchins" has many more of this class; the quality of some of them is decidedly inferior, and I predict that many of them will prove ephemeral. The Survey a few years ago put out a supplement of "One Hundred Social Service Hymns"; there was hardly a "hymn" in the collection.

One may, I think, safely say that the literary as well as the devotional standard of the New Hymnal is high. It has one hundred and eighteen less hymns than its predecessor. In my judgment, if it had been held down to four hundred it would have been even better.

But criticism has fastened more upon the music than upon the words: and also upon the "dress" of the book. It is pleasing, to be sure, to have generous spacing, and wide margins, and type well displayed; but elegance in a hymnal is of questionable value. Our standard Prayer Books, even the costly ones. waste no paper. A considerable saving in the cost of the book, and a real attractiveness of compact size, could have been effected by wise economy. The new "Hutchins" has one hundred and ten more hymns in a book of the same size.

There are more people than musicians in New York would believe—and choir singers among them—who dislike the open half-notes—who loudly rebel at them.

I have been told, "There is so much Plainsong in it." It only shows how opinions are formed by prejudice, when one finds less than twenty Plainsong tunes in a total of five hundred and twenty-eight tunes! These Plainsong tunes have a right to be there; there are other tunes a-plenty for those who dislike them.

Two of our clergy said to me, "They promised to lower the key of some of the tunes; they haven't lowered one, but some they have raised." After a thorough study of that point, I find that the New Hymnal has lowered the key of fifteen tunes; in four a whole tone, in eleven a half-tone. But it has raised the key in sixteen; in nine cases a half-tone, in seven a whole tone! Meanwhile, the new "Hutchins" again shows wisdom; it lowers the key in twenty-eight tunes, in twenty-two of them a whole tone; and raises the key in only five.

The impression is met again and again that our book is not "a people's book"; it is regarded as being made to the taste of a select minority.

Be that as it may, in my opinion what is now called for is a smaller book, an abridged edition (a "Chapel Edition," our denominational brethren used to call it) with some two hundred and fifty hymns, with the music printed in black notes; making provision for every office in the Prayer Book, and every season and day in the Calendar, and a sufficient number of "general," of the great devotional classics. Why should one of my little missions have to buy seven pages of Dies Irae?

We cannot get the New Hymnal adopted more generally by compulsion; it is not—as the law now stands—canonically obligatory. It is the best of all books ever in use in the American Church. But it has grievous faults. Its contents must be brought to the people; an abridged edition would help.

W. F. FABER.

Helena, Mont., August 12, 1921.

SERMONS FOR LAY READERS.

Mr. Editor: I enclose herewith copies of the first three sermons printed by the Lay Readers' League for their members and others, after a good deal of delay.

Our original idea was to publish a book, or at any rate a pamphlet, containing a number of sermons, but for various reasons this has been impracticable, and we are inclined to think that the better plan is to issue separate sermons as leaflets and those enclosed are a sample as to length and form which may be modified and improved by experience.

Our idea is, in time, to have a variety of sermons covering many subjects and adapted to various seasons and occasions, so that those desiring assistance of this kind may select those which meet their circumstances and desires. Various circumstanes unnecessary to enumerate have caused delay, but I am glad that at length we have been able to begin this practical work.

L. BRADFORD PRINCE,
President L. R. League.

Sante Fe, N. M.

(The sermons inclosed by Judge Prince strike us as plain and practical and well adapted for their purpose. Lay readers, who are often put to it to discover suitable sermons for their uses, will find them helpful; of course. after they have been approved by the minister under whom the reader serves or by his Bishop. They may be obtained, we suppose, from our old friend, Mr. Ben F. Finney, Church House, 202 South Nineteenth Street, Philadelphia, the Secretary of the Lay Readers' League.—Ed. S. C.)

WANTED: NAMES OF STUDENTS.

Mr. Editor: As minister in charge of the work among Episcopal students at the University of Michigan, I should much appreciate the insertion in the Southern Churchman of a paragraph calling the attention of rectors to the urgency of their notifying the clergy at universities and colleges of young people of their parishes in attendance at these institutions. Although the names of such are sometimes obtainable, as here at Michigan, through a religious registration or census, it is always helpful to have some personal connection with a student's home parish. Otherwise, unless the student takes particular pains to make himself known, he is apt to become lost in the crowd, at least in the larger universities. At a place like Michigan, for instance, where there are between seven and eight hundrd students of our communion (761 were personally looked up last year), at best the majority are little more than names and faces to the clergy. Co-operation on the part of rectors helps greatly, particularly with freshmen, and especially if letters are sent in advance of their arrival.

CHARLES T. WEBB.

Harris Hall, Ann Arbor, Mich.

"THE CHURCH STANDARD."

Mr. Editor: Any person or library may have files of The Church Standard from 1895 to the discontinuance of Dr. Fulton's excellent magazine by paying crating and freight charges.

(Miss) C. J. THOMPSON.

Box 95, Greensboro, Ala.

The fear of God is the bulwark of society. Every institution which enforces it upon the human heart and conscience is of incalculable worth to the community. The religious people, those who recognize God and His law, rule the city; and they have a right to rule it; for through them God exercises His protecting power and keeps the city from destruction.—H. Van Dyke.

The Great Commission.

STAND BEHIND ALASKA.

On August 17 Bishop Rowe, then in Fairbanks, Alaska, telegraphed to the Department of Missions in New York as follows:

"Girls' school building, Anvik, unsafe. Immediate rebuilding imperative. Chapman able to do work before winter. Authorized him to go ahead. Cost from six to eight thousand dollars. Had to proceed at once in the confidence that generous Church people will once again stand behind Alaska."

The building referred to by Bishop Rowe was cheaply erected about twenty years ago. It has housed successive generations of Anvik school girls. Many of them are now living in Anvik and surrounding villages as mothers of Christian families. Bishop Rowe and Dr. Chapman are most anxious that this work of giving Alaska Indian girls a chance for happier lives should go on.

Those who are interested in knowing something of the history and the work of the school can secure it from Mr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

St. John's Alumnus Coming.

An interesting Chinese physician comes to study in Boston next fall under Dr. Verhoeff, the eye specialist. He is Dr. Li Tsing-meu, associate Professor in Aphthalmology of the Peking Union Medical College, and is described in Millard's Review as the ablest Chinese eye specialist. He graduated in medicine from St. John's University in 1907, and since then, after special study in the United States, has made a splendid recor of work in Chinese institutions.

Dr. Koo's Marriage.

Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo, Chinese Minister to England and representative of China in the League of Nations, is known to most of us as one of the most distinguished alumni of St. John's University, Shanghai, and his personal doings are always of interest. He was recently married in Brussels to a sort of fairy princess, the daughter of a Java sugar king who is known as the "Rockefeller of the East." The bride was formerly a lady in waiting to the Empress Dowager of China, but has adopted with enthusiasm the modes and customs of the West.

City Mission Work in Morgue.

Chaplain Ussher, of the New York City Mission, has in hand the furnishing of an altar and an organ for a chapel in the morgue in New York, where funeral services may be held for any of the various faiths that find need for it there.

The total attendance in City Mission chapels in New York City institutions last year exceeded 84,000.

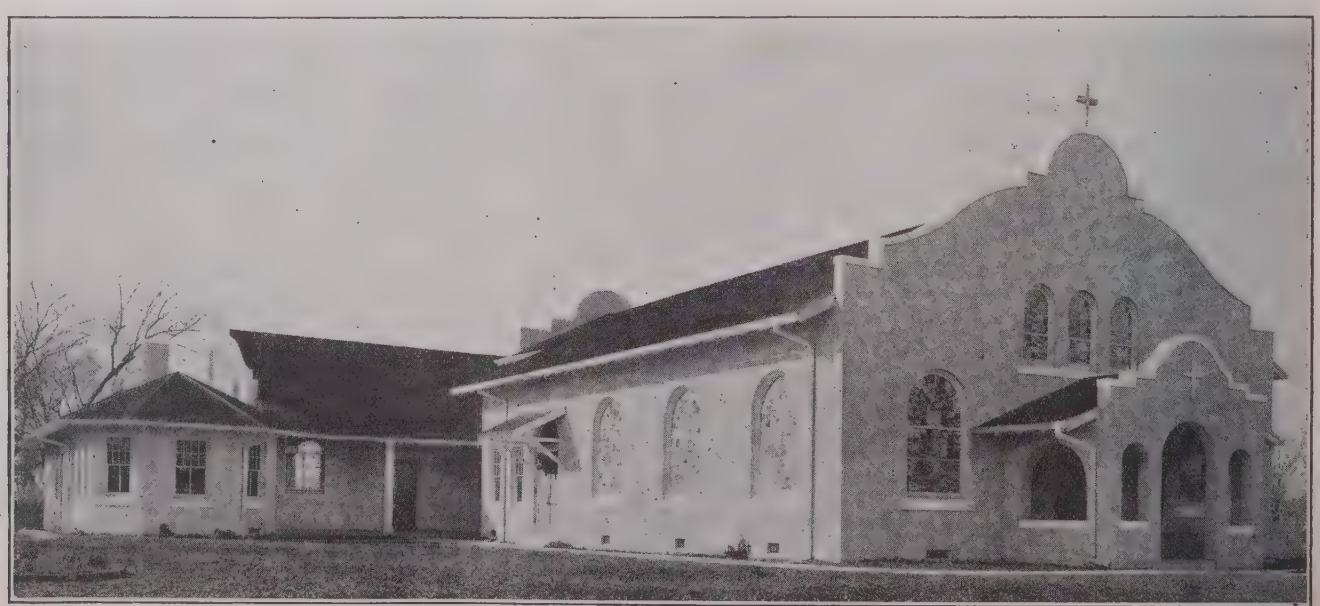
Japanese Book Buyers.

Our book-seller friend, Mr. McDevitt Wilson, tells us that the politest and most intelligent customers he has here are Japanese. They buy nothing but the best books—biography, politics, science, history; they have little interest in fiction; they know exactly what they want; they never complain at the price of books, though the kind of books they buy are those that the publisher prices very high. They do not fill his shop with uproar and chatter, like some newspaper men he knows, says Mr. Wilson; they go straight to the table of important non-fiction; they are sage, urbane and decided.—Christopher Morley, in New York Post.

Fourteen Women Sail This Month to Serve Y. W. C. A. in Orient.

When the Empress of Asia leaves Vancouver for the Orient on August 18, fourteen young women from eight States an dtwo Canadian provinces will ship for service with the Young Women's Christian Association in China and Japan.

They hail from Louisiana to Quebec, New York to Michigan. One is a native of China. A few have served abroad before. To most of them, the 10,000 girl members of the Y. W. C. A. in China and Japan are strangers. As secretaries of religious work, physical education, recreation leaders and industrial secretaries, they will work to adjust the lives of women spiritually, socially and physically to changed conditions in an awakened China and an industrially chaotic Japan.



Among those sailing are: Elvira Braden, Lowell, Mass.; Dr. Bessie Coffin, Detroit, Mich.; Constance Ball, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Edith Lacey, Buffalo, N. Y.; Caroline Marsh, Rockford, Ill.; Eleanor Robertson, Toronto, Can.; Ruth White, Canajoharie, N. Y.; Claire McKinnon, Zuolle, La.; Elsie McIntosh, Stanstead, Quebec; Lillian Waring, Chicago, Ill.; Lila Chere, Shanghai, China; Sophie Most, Jersey City, N. J.

Bishop's Son Leaves to Teach in China.

Ellis N. Tucker, five years a member of the faculty of Virginia Episcopal School at Lynchburg, Va., has gone to Vancouver to sail next Thursday for China, where he will be instructor in mathematics at St. John's University. Mr. Tucker is a son of Bishop and Mrs. B. D. Tucker, of Norfolk, Va.

As an offset to the terrible "Plantation Pictures" recently published in The Atlantic Monthly, The Congregationalist has printed a report of a secretary of the American Missionary Association who attended a conference of about five hundred negro farmers in North Carolina, 85 per cent. of whom own their own hand. The secretary also addressed about four thousand pupils in Congregational schools, and found them neatly dressed and well behaved. He says the difference between the desperate conditions of the negroes described in the Atlantic and those he describes is contained in the one word, "education."

As part of the celebration of the parish anniversary, St. James' Church, South Pasadena, adopted the slogan, "A Book for Boone!" which resulteed in a box of 150 volumes for Boone library.

Church of the Redeemer, Eastwood's Community Church, Houston, Tex.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

A VENTURE OF FAITH.

This is the story of a Venture of Faith on the part of the Church. Early in 1919 the new Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Texas had his attention drawn to the fact that a great community of people within the city of Houston were virtually unchurched, by reason of the fact that there was no church of any denomination near enough adequately to administer to them. Upon making a preliminary inquiry he found that our Church had only a few communicants in this territory, but that these were workers and willing ones. He was impressed, however, by the large number of others who were as sheep scattered abroad, having no shepherd. In June of 1919 Bishop Quin asked the Rev. L. Valentine Lee, at that time the assistant minister at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., to come to Houston and start a work in this community of Eastwood. The plan was to have the Diocese back a project to build and equip a fine plant consisting of a church, a community parish house and a rectory. With this equipment furnished, the problem which Mr. Lee confronted was to demonstrate the fact that the Protestant Episcopal Church could go into a community where it was practically unknown and so minister to the people that it would rally to its standard a sufficient number of them to assure the success of the undertaking.

After many delays in financing and building, the first service in the church was held on the second Sunday in June, 1920. The Mission of the Church of the Redeemer had just been instituted with ten communicants. The first service was advertised. The church was well filled with residents of the community and other interested friends. After this first service there began the real test of the work. The ones who were really interested came again, while the vast majority of mildly interested and curious melted away. The Sunday school was started in the fall at the time of the reopening of the public schools. A complete staff of officers and teachers had been enlisted. There were six men and four women who eagerly awaited the results of that first session of the new Sunday school. They knew definitely of not more than twenty-five children who could be counted upon to attend. Fifty-eight actually came. The following Sunday there were fewer. But from then on a steady increase was noted.

Easter Day marked the end of a seven months' period of actual work under conditions which could be considered normal to the life of the venture. At the 11 o'clock service the music was furnished by a children's choir, vested, and reverently rendering the service. At this service Bishop Quin confirmed eight men, eight women and one boy. The rector reported that with the new confirmees that the actual communicant list would stand at seventy. Since then four others have been added through confirmation and transfer. The congregation, which numbered two hundred, was delighted to hear the report that there had been one hundred and fifteen present at Sunday school out of an enrollment of one hundred and thirty.

These strictly church results have been brought about in the following manner. There is a large sign in front of the church, which reads:

Eastwood's Community Church,
Church of the Redeemer.
Rev. L. Valentine Lee, Minister.
Demonstrate your religion here by Work, Worship and Play.

Sunday Services.
Sunday school, 9:45.
Morning Prayer, 11.
Evening Prayer, 7:45.

Holy Communion, first Sundays.
Week-day activities for men, women, boys and girls.

For further information ask the minister.

This sign typifies the kind of work done. Every side of life is looked after in this church. The Community House was in use late in the winter and in the early spring seven days and seven nights a week. Recreation in the form of athletic clubs for men and women and boys and girls is provided. Scouting, Camp Fire Girls and clubs for smaller boys and girls had a successful year. Various entertainments were held for the whole community. No work has been started for which there was not a clear need and demand. There has been no effort to duplicate other agencies already existing. There is a strong Community Council in Eastwood. A wonderfully equipped and splendidly run public school. With such agencies there has been maintained the most friendly relations. This spirit of co-operation was most wonderfully demonstrated at Christmas time, when, at the suggestion of the Sunday school, every organization in Eastwood joined hands for a community tree, which was a great success.

Some one will want to know how this venture has turned out from the standpoint of local finances. In December, 1920, an Every-Member Canvass was made, with the result that over $1,300 was pledged for local support, and although the mission had been assigned no quota for the Nation-Wide Campaign, over $400 was subscribed for that purpose. In addition to these pledges, local gifts that have been made will bring the total for the year up to $2,000. The Woman's Guild has made gifts to the church of the following items during the year: A carpet, complete altar furnishings, furniture for the guild room, and a piano for the Sunday school. So from the local side the finances would seem to be well above the average for the first year of a mission's life.

The average man in Eastwood today, when asked about the little church, will tell you that he believes it is the finest agency which has come into the life of Eastwood, which, considering everything else, that Eastwood has, is a large statement.

Does the reader believe in Ventures of Faith?

We give this department entirely to the account of this community church, because its example can be followed in many places throughout the country.

Such plants, however, do not grow up by themselves, and Rev. L. Valentine Lee has been unremitting in his energy and attention in order to produce the results here shown.

The Faith of Henry Ford.

The surprising account of the way in which the Ford Motor Company last winter faced obligations of $58,000,000 with cash assets of $20,000,000, and came through without the aid of the banks, is more than an interesting tale of finance. Mr. Ford's story, as it appeared in the New York Times of July 23, occasioned words of high commendation from the banks whom he had rebuffed. They had lost a big deal at a time when the banks were making advantageous loans, but they recognized a master hand in Mr. Ford's operations.

The fact was, as Mr. Ford says, "They didn't know our men and the spirit behind our organization." Two years ago the late Henry L. Gantt, a great production engineer, said that Andrew Carnegie and Henry Ford were outstanding examples of industrial leaders who understood finance as a problem, not of tangible assets, but of producing power. Mr. Gantt predicted, and Mr. Ford gives evidence, that the basis of credit must come to be not physical assets, but organization of production power. This means the socializing of credit—basing it on service instead of on wealth. It demands, of course, a higher moral tone throughout the business world.

When Mr. Ford told a newspaper correspondent that the key to his success was found in a Bible verse, he was evidently not making a mere pious reflection. His industrial achievements are as he says, a commentary on Hebrews 11:1, in the King James Version:

"Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

Church Intelligence

Election of Trustees, General Theological Seminary.

The terms of office of three trustees of the General Theological Seminary (elected by the alumni) expires on December 31. Members of classes whose year of graduation ends in "1" or "6" are entitled to make nominations of a bishop (alumnus or partial student), a presbyter (alumnus), and a layman (communicant).

The outgoing trustees are: The Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., the Rev. John Keller, '86, and Mr. Robert L. Gerry.

Nominations should be mailed to the Secretary, Associate Alumni, 175 Ninth Avenue, New York City, before September 15.

Good Work Being Done in Prisons by Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

A report from the chapter of St. John's at the Auburn State prison, New York, indicates an earnest work being done in that institution. The Rev. Norton T. Houser, rector of St. Peter's, Auburn, conducts a communion service for the chapter once a month. Mr. Strain, director of the chapter at St. John's Church, Auburn, attends nearly all of the meetings of the prison chapter, and has recently had with him on two occasions every member of his chapter. Mr. Clark, director of St. Peter's Chapter, has likewise visited the prison group and several times brought his entire chapter to their meeting. These united meetings have been the source of great joy and help to the men who are striving amid conditions, not at best encouraging, to live influential Christian lives. It has been arranged to have outside chapters visit the prison monthly and lend the inspiration of their coming to the chapter there.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robt. C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Executive Secretary of the Diocese.

At the recent meeting of the Council it was decided to engage the services of an executive secretary for the Diocese, who should act as secretary to the Bishop and secretary of Council as well.

The committee appointed to secure the services of some suitable person reported at the July meeting of the Executive Board that the call had been extended to Mr. Thomas H. Scott, of Lynchburg. After careful consideration of the duties of this office, Mr. Scott has accepted the appointment to take effect the first of September. Mr. Scott has been for some years a member of a Lynchburg real estate firm. He is a member of St. Paul's Church of that city and a former vestryman.

The Diocese is to be congratulated on securing the services of Mr. Scott, who is admirably fitted for the duties of the office.

Evangelistic Services: The Roanoke Ministers' Association has decided to hold simultaneous evangelistic services in the churches of all communions throughout the city, commencing about October 23. Each minister is to conduct his own meeting, or invite some one to do so for him. St. John's and Christ Church will enter heartily into the plan.

Virginia Episcopal School: Mr. J. E. Johnson, of Wingina, Va., who a few years ago gave the money for the athletic field at the Virginia Episcopal School, has made an additional donation which will make possible the enlargement and decided improvement of the Johnson athletic field. The school is in a most flourishing condition under the rectorship of the Rev. William G. Pendleton, D. D.

Trinity Church, Bedford County, possessing the distinction of being one of the two oldest church buildings in Bedford County, was built in the year 1826, under the ministry of that saintly Churchman, the Rev. Nicholas Hamner Cobbs, rector of Russell Parish, and later Bishop of Alabama.

At many intervals during its existence, Trinity has suffered from being without a rector.

The Rev. Thomas Howell has been the rector of Trinity for the last seven years. During his rectorship very creditable improvements have been made. A new chancel has been installed, equipped with modern furniture and a brass communion rail, the former having been given by the four Rucker brothers in memory of their father, J. T. Rucker. The interior of the church has been repainted and a new roof put on.

Not only have the recent years been marked by many material improvements, but there has been a great spiritual growth in the church, as evidenced by the increased attendance at church services, and a very liberal response to the call of the Nation-Wide Campaign.

St. John's Church, Lynchburg (the Rev. G. Floyd Rogers, rector): Work has been begun on the enlargement of the church and is well under way. It is hoped that it will be completed so that the services may be resumed early in September.

Drawings for the rearrangement of the chancel and the equipment were made by Lamb, of New York, based on details and suggestions prepared by Mr. C. H. Hinnant, have been approved by the Building Committee and vestry, and have been submitted to the congregation.

These drawings provide for a recess chancel of great beauty and also for a rearrangement of the choir, pulpit and lectern, so as to provide a most churchly appearance. All of the equipment will be of such a character as to be a permanent asset to the parish and ultimately moved into the new church when that is needed and built.

The memorials to be put in are as follows: An altar, The Last Supper, the communion rail, the pulpit, the lectern, the prayer desks, the communion service and a number of others.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Coadjutor

Recent Gifts to Grace Church, Newport News.

Grace Church, the Rev. M. Colgate Daughtrey, rector, has recently been much improved by the following gifts: A new semi-indirect lighting system, with chancel electroleer; the New Hymnals; polished floors, with chancel rugs and aisle carpet; decoration of walls; altar hangings; exterior painting; a handsome oak reredos, given by St. Paul's Church, Suffolk, and a handsome processional cross, as a memorial to the late Rev. R. H. Wright, a former rector. An organ has also been purchased and installed.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan-Elect.

Funeral of Dr. Victor Baier.

The funeral service for the late Victor Baier, Mus. Doc. A. G. O., organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, New York, was held in the parish church on Monday afternoon, August 15. A full choir was present including many old members formerly associated with Dr. Baier at Trinity. There was a large congregation and many representatives of the "American Guild of Organists," of which Dr. Baier was the warden.

The choir sang Noble's "Souls of the Righteous" as the anthem, and Croft and Purcell, "Man That Is Born of a Woman," and the Gilbert, "I Heard a Voice from Heaven." The assistant organist was at the organ.

The Bishop of New York and rector of Trinity conducted the services. The opening sentences were read by the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates, the Rev. Dr. E. B. Smith was the lector, and the remainder of the service and the committal was read by the Bishop.

The Rev. Henry P. Veazie held the service at the grave in Woodlawn Cemetery. Other clergy present were the Rev. Frederic W. Goodman, the Rev. George B. Cox and the Rev. John Keller.

Dr. Baier would have been connected with Trinity fifty years next February. He became choir boy in 1872 under Dr. Messiter, with whom he studied the organ. He was appointed assistant organist in October, 1884, and remained in that position until his appointment as organist and choirmaster in 1897 to succeed Dr. Messiter.

Dr. Baier had been in poor health for the past year, but in spite of this he most courageously kept up his work at the organ and with the choir. He is a distinct loss to Trinity and to the high standard of American Church Music, for which Trinity has stood for over two hundred years.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. J. Garland, D. D., Suffragan.

Ground Broken for Buildings of New Philadelphia Divinity School.

Ground was broken Friday, August 19, for the first unit of the proposed group of buildings comprising the new Philadelphia Divinity School, at Forty-second and Spruce Streets. The ground for this school was purchased nearly two years ago, but building conditions delayed the start of actual construction until the present.

The building on which work was started is to be called the library, although it will also contain offices and class-rooms. Herbert G. Campion is the contractor, and the plans were drawn by Zantzinger, Borie and Medary. The contract price is $77,000. The building is to be of Chestnut Hill stone, with Indiana limestone trimmings, and is expected to be completed within a year.

The Philadelphia Divinity School, when completed, will occupy the entire area bounded by Spruce, Locust, Forty-second and Forty-third Streets. It is estimated that the cost of the entire group when completed will be $2,000,000. The buildings will be erected parallel to the streets on which they border and will enclose a quadrangle which is intended to be a thing of rare beauty, with shaded walks.

The Rev. P. E. Osgood Accepts Call to St. Mark's, Minneapolis.

The Rev. Phillips E. Osgood, vicar of the Chapel of the Mediator, Fifty-first and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, has resigned and accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis, Minn., succeeding the Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., now rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C. He will enter upon his services at St. Mark's the second Sunday in October.

Since Mr. Osgood came to the chapel, April 19, 1915, the number of communicants has increased from 260 to 1,056. The new chapel was built at a cost of approximately $300,000, and was consecrated last April. It has been due largely to his efforts that the present church, which is a memorial to the late George C. Thomas, was built. As a member of the Commission on Religious Drama and Pageantry, Mr. Osgood has been active in bringing about the present realization of the value of the drama in connection with religion. He was also a member of the Social Service Department and Anti-Vice Commission.

Compensation Board Rules Church Employes Eligible for Benefits.

All persons paid out of church treasuries as employes, including ministers, sextons, organists, etc., are "workmen" in the eyes of the Workmen's Compensation Board, and entitled to compensation.

According to this ruling of the Board, churches are regarded as employers, as are industrial and commercial organizations.

The death of the Rev. H. G. G. Vincent, rector of the House of Prayer, Branchtown, who was struck by a motor car, is cited as an instance where a clergyman's family is entitled to death compensation from his church.

Dr. Grammer Improving.

Physicians at the American Hospital, Paris, have determined that the Rev. Carl E. Grammer, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia, will not have to undergo an operation there.

Dr. Grammer's voice failed last spring, and he went abroad in search of health. It was then believed that an operation would be necessary. He has left the hospital and is steadily improving.

The Rev. Robert Norwood has returned from a vacation trip to Ontario, and preached on Sunday in the Memorial Church of St. Paul, at Overbrook, of which he is the rector.

The General Clergy Relief Fund receives $12,000 from the estate of Frances C. Wilson, who died recently at Sixteenth and Spruce Streets, Philadelphia, and whose will was probated August 12.

The Rev. Richard J. Morris, Secretary of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, preached Sunday morning, August 21, in the Pro-Cathedral of St. Mary, Broad and South Streets, Philadelphia.

R. R. W.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Death of a Prominent Churchwoman.

The death of Miss Jane Wilkes, on Wednesday, August 17, marks the passing of a figure conspicuous in the Church life of Washington, and well known for her special interest in the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions. Ninety-two years of age at the time of her death, she had continued her position as president of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary until three years ago, when her failing eyesight compelled her to give up this work. She had held this office for twenty-five years, having succeeded Mrs. Addison, of Trinity Church, who was the first president of the organization, and having been followed by Mrs. Albert Mills, who holds the office at the present time. Only three presidents of this vital work of the women of the Diocese during so long a period makes a record unique and interesting.

Miss Wilkes was born at Newport, R. I., in 1829, and was the daughter of Admiral Charles W. Wilkes, noted for his antarctic explorations. She died at the home of her niece, Mrs. A. E. Rankin, at Wellesley, Mass. Funeral services at St. John's Church, Washington, of which she had been a life-long member, were conducted by the Rev. E. S. Dunlap, on Saturday morning, August 20, and interment was in Arlington, beside the remains of her father.

To Complete St. Alban's Church.

Announcement is made that a campaign for a large sum of money will be conducted by St. Alban's Parish some time in the fall, and probably during the first ten days of November. The primary object of this campaign will be the completion of the church building, which still calls for the erection of the chancel and tower in stone. Included in the campaign budget will be the amount expended for the heating plant, the improvements in the Guild Hall and some outstanding indebtedness of the church, but these objects will be secondary to the completion of the church building. Mr. B. A. Bowles has been appointed chairman of the campaign, who in turn has selected certain men and women of the parish to constitute an Executive Committee. The exact amount of money to be raised will be announced as soon as the contractor's figures are available, so that every member of the parish will understand the goal for which all are asked to work

M. W. W.

EASTON

Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D.D., Bishop.

Will Ask Legislature to Extend Suffrage to Women in Church Affairs.

At a conference held in Baltimore recently, made up of Churchmen from the Dioceses of Easton, Maryland and Washington, each Diocese being officially represented, it was decided to ask the coming Legislature to amend the Vestry Act of 1798, so as to extend suffrage to women in Church affairs. The proposed act is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, that on the petition of the vestry of any parish or separate congregation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Maryland, the convention of the Diocese with which said parish or separate congregation is in union, is hereby authorized and empowered to give the same right to women to vote and hold office as is now conferred upon men by existing laws.

After the presentation of the proposed bill the conference adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, that the conference of the committees from the Dioceses of Maryland, Easton and Washington, approves the submission of the foregoing proposed act to the General Assembly of Maryland at its next session, subject to the approval of the Bishops of Maryland, Easton and Washington, and that the chairman of the three diocesan committees are requested to submit the proposed act to the General Assembly of Maryland at its next session."

The Bishop of the Diocese has signified his approval of the proposed act.

The faithful at St. Paul's By the Sea, Ocean City, are now building a new rectory. Formerly the church was a mission in Worcester Parish, but the last convention created it an independent parish. The present rectory was built for summer use only, as the services were not continued through the winter, and is not suitable for winter use.

L. L. W.

WYOMING

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Miss Lucy Taylor, the efficient secretary of Bishop Thomas, and the faithful correspondent for the Southern Churchman from Wyoming, met with an accident recently while cranking one of the missionary Fords. She was injured by being pinned between the car and the wall of the Bishop's garage, when the missionary vehicle, without any warning, suddenly manifested an earnestness of purpose, which in its future work will be very commendable, but which on this occasion was painfully inappropriate. Miss Taylor is in the hospital with a badly damaged hip, daily hoping, as she expressed it, "to be promoted to crutches." It is sincerely hoped she may speedily regain her well-known activity in well-doing.

Church Services in Yellowstone Park: It is not generally known that regular services are held in Yellowstone Park by a clergyman of our Church. The Rev. J. F. Prichard officiates at a government chapel at Mammoth Springs. If this should meet the eye of any churchman who is "doing" the Park this summer, he will, of course, do his best to attend if he should happen to be near Mammoth Springs on a Sunday.

The mystery of divine suffering requires the mystery of human conscience to explain it. Now, that mystery of human conscience is simply this: Man attaches to his own actions the sense of responsibility. Out of the fact that man does praise and blame his own conduct, comes this surest evidence for God's existence and for your own immortality. A deep appreciation of what Jesus actually did for the sinful is the cause of our admitting Him to our hearts and minds to be our Friend, King, Saviour, Redeemer, Lord and God.—Archbishop Thomson.

Family Department

AUGUST.

1. Monday.
6. Saturday. Transfiguration.
7. Eleventh unday after Trinity.
14. Twelfth Sunday after Trinity.
21. Thirteenth Sunday after Trinity.
24. Wednesday. St. Bartholomew.
28. Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity.
31. Wednesday.

Collect for the Fourteenth Sunday After Trinity.

Almighty and everlasting God, give unto us the increase of faith, hope and charity; and, that we may obtain that which Thou dost promise, make us to love that which Thou dost command; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Inner Passion.

There is a Master in my heart
To Whom, though oft against my will,
I bring the songs I sing apart
And strive to think that they fulfil
His silent law, within my heart.

But He is blind to my desires,
And deaf to all that I would plead;
He tests my truth and purer fires
And shames my purple with His need.
He claims my deeds, not my desires.

And often when my comrades praise,
I sadden, for He turns from me.
But sometimes, when they blame, I raise
Mine eyes to His, and in them see
A tenderness too deep for praise.

He is not to be bought with gold,
Or lured by thornles crowns of fame;
But when some rebel thought hath sold
Him to dishonor and to shame,
And my heart's Pilate cries, "Behold."

Behold the Man. I know Him then;
And all those wild thronged clamors die
In my heart's judgment—hall again,
Or if it ring with 'Crucify!"
Some few are faithful even then.

Some few sad thoughts—one bears His cross;
To that dark Calvary of my pride;
One stands far off and mourns his loss,
And one poor thief on either side
Hangs on his own unworthy cross.

And one—O truth in ancient guise!—
Rails, and one bids him cease alway,
And the God turns His hungering eyes
On that poor thought with "Thou, this day, Shalt sing, shalt sing in Paradise."

—Alfred Noyes, in C. E. World.

Story of an Artist's Studio.

Years ago a painter stood in his studio, his right thumb to the belt of his blouse, and his left hand holding the pipe he had withdrawn from his lips in honor of his visitor, Father Hugo, the vicar of the rich Church of St. Jerome. The artist had not yet reached middle age. He was famous in Dusseldorf, and some said that his name would some day be known world-wide. When that day came, Stenburg ruefully thought that he would be past the enjoyment of riches which tarried so long. Still he managed to enjoy life in the present. He loved his art. Now and again he became so absorbed in his work that he forgot all else than the picture on his easel.

Still, though good work he had done, he had as yet never satisfied himself, nor reached his own ideal. His was good work, but he desired something more. Thus Stenburg was not a satisfied man. There was a restlessness in his handsome eyes, and a sharp tone in his voice, which, to a close observer, proclaimed a spirit not at peace. Otherwise, to the world, he appeared a jolly, prosperous man, who displayed, on occasion, a shrewd business capacity, and one who knew his own interests well. He was speaking now.

"No, Reverend Father, the sum you offer would but ill repay me for the labor of so large an altar-piece as you honor me by naming. It must have many figures, all carefully studied. The crucifixion is not an easy subject, and it has been so often taken that it would be difficult to compose a picture different—as I should wish it to be—from others."

"I will not limit you to the price. You are an honest man, Sir Painter. and the Church of St. Jerome will not pay for the altar-piece. It is to be the gift of a penitent."

"So! That makes a difference. Return, Reverend Father, a month from today, and studies for the work shall be ready."

So they parted, both well pleased, and during the following weeks Stenburg studied the composition of the altar-piece, and penetrated into the Jewish Strasse for models for his figures.

Father Jerome was satisfied. He desired the central point of the picture to be the cross of the Redeemer, and left the grouping of the accessories to the artist. From time to time the vicar dropped in, often accompanied by another priest, to inspect the progress of the work. It was to be placed in the church upon the feast of St. Nicomede, the patron saint of the donor, and which fell upon June first.

With the bursting of the young green leaves, and the upspringing of the first flowers, a hunger had seized upon the artist's soul to leave Dusseldorf, and with his sketch-book wander over the surrounding country. On the borders of the forest he came one day upon a gipsy girl plaiting straw baskets. Her face was beautiful; her coal-black hair fell in waving ripples to her waist; and her poor tattered red dress, faded and sun-burnt to many hues, added to her picturesque appearance. But her eyes were the features that caught the artist's regard—restless, limpid, black eyes, whose expression changed every moment; pain, joy, fun and roguery were reflected in their depths as swiftly as the cloud shadows chase each other across a lake.

"What a capital picture she would make!" thought Stenburg; "but then who would buy a gipsy girl? No one!"

The gipsies were looked upon in Dusseldorf with hatred; and even to this day the fact of being a gipsy is, in the eyes of the law, a punishable offense.

The girl noticed the artist, and flinging her straw down, sprang up, raising her hands above her head, and snapping her fingers to keep time, danced lightly and gracefully before him, showing her white teeth, and her glance sparkling with merriment.

"Stand!" cried Stenburg, and he rapidly sketched her. Quic kly as he drew, it was a weary position for the girl to maintain; but she never flinched, though a sigh of relief, as her arms dropped and she stood at rest before him, attested to the artist the strain the attitude had been.

"She is not only beautiful; she is better—a capital model. I will paint her as a Spanish dancing girl."

So a bargain was struck. Pepita was to come thrice a week to Stenburg's house to be painted. Duly at the appointed hour she arrived. She was full of wonder. Her great eyes roved round the studio, glancing on the pieces of armour, pottery and carving. Presently she began examining the pictures and soon the great altar-piece, now nearing its completion, caught her attention. She gazed at it intently. In an awed voice she asked:

"Who is that," pointing to the most prominent figure, that of the Redeemer on the cross.

"The Christ," answered Stenburg carelessly.

"What is being done to Him?"

"Being crucified," ejaculated the artist.

"Turn a little to the right. There! that will do."

Stenburg, with his brush in his fingers. was a man of few words.

"Who are those people, about Him—those with the bad faces?"

"Now, look here," said the artist, "I cannot talk to you. You have nothing to do but stand as I tell you."

The girl dare not speak again, but she continued to gaze and speculate. Every time she came to the studio the fascination of the picture grew upon her. Sometimes she ventured an inquiry, for her curiosity consumed her.

"Why did they crucify Him? Was He bad; very bad?"

"No; very good."

That was all she learnt at one interview, but she treasured each word, and every sentence was so much more known of the mystery.

"Then, if He was good, why did they do so? Was it for a short time only? Did they let Him go?"

"It was because—"

The artist paused, his head on one side, stepped forward and arranged her sash.

"Because?" repeated Pepita breathless.

The artist went back to his easel; then, looking at her, the eager, questioning face moved his pity.

"Listen. I will tell you once for all, and then ask no further questions"; and he told her the story of the cross—new to Pepita, though so old to the artist, that it had ceased to touch him. He could paint that dying agony, and not a nerve of his quivered; but the thought of it wrung her heart. Her great black eyes swam in tears which the fiery gipsy pride forbade to fall.

The altar-piece and the Spanish dancing girl were finished simultaneously. Pepita's last visit to the studio had come. She looked upon the beautiful representation of herself without emotion, but turned, and stood before the altar-piece. unable to leave it.

"Come," said the artist, "here is your money, and a gold piece over and above, for you have brought me good luck; the 'dancing girl' is already sold; I shall want you some time perhaps again, but not just yet. We must not overstock the market with even your pretty face."

The girl turned slowly.

"Thanks, Signor!" but her eyes, full of emotion, were solemn. "You must love Him very much, Signor, when He has done all that for you, do you not?"

The face into which she looked flushed crimson. The artist was ashamed. The girl, in her poor, faded dress, passed from his studio, but her plaintive words rang in his heart. He tried to forget them, but impossible. He hastened to send the altar-piece to its destination. Still he could not forget, "all that for you."

At last the pain was not to be borne. He would face it and conquer it. He went to confession; Father Hugo questioned Stenburg. He believed all the doctrines of the Church. So the vicar gave him absolution, and assured him that "all was well." The artist allowed a liberal discount on his altar-piece, and for a week or two felt at ease. But then up rose the old question, "You must love Him very much, do you not?" and would be answered. He grew restless, and could not settle to his work. So wandering about, he heard of things which had not come under his notice before. One day he saw a group of persons hastening to a house near the walls, a poor place, and then he noticed others coming in the opposite direction, and they, too, passed into its low doorway. He asked what was happening there, but the man he questioned could not satisfy him. This aroused his curiosity.

A few days later he learned that a stranger, one of the "reformed," lived there—one of those despised men who appealed on every occasion to the Word of God. So Stenburg went to observe, perhaps to inquire, certainly not to join them; but a man cannot approach fire and remain cold. This reformed preacher spoke and looked as one who was walking the earth with Christ; yes, one to whom He was all. Stenburg found what he longed for—a living faith. His new friend lent him for a time a precious copy of the New Testament, but hunted from Dusseldorf after a few weeks, he left, and had to take the Book with him; but its essence was left in Stenburg's heart.

Ah! no need to question now. He felt in his soul the fire of an ardent love. Did all that for me! How can I ever tell men of that love, that boundless love, which can brighten their lives as it has mine? It is for them, too, but they do not see it, as I did not. How can I preach it? I cannot speak. I am a man of few words. If I were to try I could never speak it out. It burns in my heart, but I cannot express it—the love of Christ!" So thinking, the artist idly drew with a piece of charcoal in his fingers, a rough sketch of a thorn-crowned head. His eyes grew moist as he did so. Suddenly the thought flashed through his soul, "I can paint! My brush must proclaim it. Ah! in that altar-piece His face was all agony. But that was not the truth. Love unutterable, infinite compassion, willing sacrifice!"

The artist fell on his knees and prayed to paint worthily, and thus speak.

And then he wrought. The fire of genius blazed up—up to the highest fibre of his power; nay, beyond it. The picture of the crucifixion was a wonder —almost divine.

He would not sell it. He gave it a free will offering to his native city. It was hung in the public gallery, and there the citizens flocked to see it, and voices were hushed and hearts melted as they stood before it, and the burghers returned to their homes knowing the love of God, and repeating to themselves the words written so distinctly beneath—

"All this I did for thee;
What hast thou done for Me?"

Stenburg also used to go there, and watching far back from the corner in the gallery the people who gathered about the picture, he prayed God to bless his painted sermon. One day he observed, when the rest of the visitors had left, a poor girl standing weeping bitterly before it. The artist approached her. "What grieves thee, child?" he asked.

The girl turned; she was Pepita. "Oh! Signor, if He had but loved me so," she said, pointing to the face of yearning love, bending above them. "I am only a poor gipsy. For you is the love, but not for such as I"; and her despairing tears fell unrestrained.

"Pepita, it was also all for thee." And then the artist told her all. Until the late hour at which the gallery closed, they sat and talked. The painter did not weary now of answering her questions, but the subject was one he loved best. He told the girl the story of that wondrous life, magnificent death, and crowning glory of the resurrection, and also explained to her the union that redeeming love effected. She listened, received and believed his words. "All this I did for thee."

* * * * * * * *

Two years have passed since the altar-piece had been ordered. Winter had come again. The cold was intense, and the wind moaned down the narrow streets of Dusseldorf, and shook the casements of the artist's dwelling. His day's work was done, and by the blazing pine logs he was seated, reading a copy he had with difficulty obtained, of his beloved gospel. A knock sounded at the door, and a man was admitted. He wore an old sheepskin jacket, on which the snow had frozen; his hair hung in dark locks about his face. He glanced ravenously towards the bread and meat upon the table, even as he gave his message.

"Would the gentleman come with him on urgent business?"

"Wherefore do you wish me to come?"

"I cannot say," replied the man; "but one who is dying wants to see you."

"Eat," said the artist. "I will accompany you." The man murmured his thanks as he devoured the food.

"You are hungry?"

"Sire, we all are famished with hunger."

Stenburg brought a bag of provisions.

"Can you carry this?"

"Ah! gladly, gladly. But come—there is no time to lose."

The artist followed. His guide led him quickly through the streets, and out into the country beyond. The branches were laden with snow, and the great crowded trunks confusing. No path, but the man never hesitated. He silently and swiftly kept ahead of Stenburg. At last they came to a glade belted round with trees. Here a few tents were erected.

"Go in there," said the man, pointing to one of the tents, and then turned to a group of men, women and children, who thronged about him. He spoke to them in a wild tongue, and lifted his bag from his shoulder.

The artist, crouching, crept into the tent. A brilliant ray of moonlight illuminated the poor interior. On a mass of dried leaves was the form of a young woman. Her face was pinched and hollow. "Why, Pepita!"

At the sound of the artist's voice the eyes opened. Those wonderful dark eyes still were brilliant. A smile trembled to her lips, and she raised herself on her elbow. "Yes," she said, "He has come for me! He holds out His hands! They are bleeding!" "For thee." "All this I did for thee." And she bade him farewell.

* * * * * * * *

Long years after both the painter and the gipsy girl had met in another land, a gay young nobleman drove in his splendid equippage into Dusseldorf, and while his horses were baited, wandered into that famous gallery. He was rich, young, intelligent—the world bright, and its treasures within his grasp. He stood before Stenburg's picture arrested. He read and re-read the legend on the frame. He could not tear himself away—it grew into his heart. The love of Christ laid its powerful grasp on his soul. Hours passed; the light faded; the curator touched the weeping nobleman, and told him it was time to close the gallery. Night had come—nay! rather for that young man, the dawn of eternal life. He was Zinzendorf. He returned to the inn and re-entered his carriage, but to turn his back on Paris and seek his home. From that moment he threw life, fortune, fame, at the feet of Him who had whispered to his heart—

"All this I did for thee.
What hast thou done for Me?"

Zinzendorf, the father of the Moravian Missions, answered that question by his devoted life and his welcomed death.

Stenburg's picture no longer hangs in the gallery of Dusseldorf, for when some years ago the gallery was destroyed by fire, it perished; but it preached, and God used it to tell of His gift, of whom St. Paul said, "He loved me and gave Himself for me."

The Hammer Jesus Swung.

If I could hold within my hand
The hammer Jesus swung—
Not all the gold in all the land,
Nor jewels, countless as the sand,
All in the balance flung,
Could weigh the value of that thing
Round which His fingers once did cling.

If I could have the table He
Once made in Nazareth,
Not all the pearls in all the sea,
Nor crowns of kings or kings to be,
As long as men have breath
Could buy that thing of wood He made,
The Lord of lords, who learned a trade.

Yea—but His hammer still is shown
By honest hands that toil;
And round His table men sit down
And all are equal, with a crown,
Nor gold nor pearls can soil;
The shop of Nazareth was bare—
But Brotherhood was builded there!

—C. M. Sheldon, in Sunday at Home.

What rest is to the body, peace is to the mind. Peace internal, peace external, peace eternal, peace with men, peace with God, peace with oneself. "Seek God," says Fenelon, "within yourself, and you will assuredly find Him, and with Him peace and joy. One word from Christ calmed the troubled sea. One glance from Him to us can do the same within us now.—F. W. Robertson.

The South's Best Book Store
HUNTER & CO
105 E. Broad Street
Richmond, Va.
Stationers, Engravers, Bookmen
Prompt and Reliable Service

For the Young Folks

Only.

Only a word for the Master,
Lovingly, quietly said,
  Only a word!
  Yet the Master heard,
And some fainting hearts were fed.

Only a look of remonstrance,
Sorrowful, gentle and deep,
  Only a look!
  Yet the strong man shook,
And he went alone to weep.

Only some act of devotion,
  Willingly, joyfully done;
  "Surely 'twas nought!"
  (So the proud world thought),
But yet souls for Christ were won!

Only an hour with the children
Pleasantly, cheerfully given,
  Yet seed was sown
  In that hour alone
That would bring forth fruit for heaven!

"Only!" But Jesus is looking Constantly, tenderly down
  To earth, and sees
  Those who strive to please;
And their love He loves to crown.

—Selected.

Tweedle-Dee's Strange Journey.

"Here's a little joke for your birthday gift, twins. He resembles a mop, but he's really a Skye terrier." That is what the twins' daddy said when he brought Tweedle-dee home in his pocket one day. Frank and Flora were delighted with their new pet, and in spite of his comical face, with its sharp eyes peeking through untidy hair, they thought him a very handsome dog.

Tweedle-dee, in turn, became so fond of the twins that he was restless and uneasy whenever they were out of his sight. Every day about three o'clock he would begin to watch for them to return from school, and when he saw them he would race wildly to meet them, looking so much like a fly-away bundle of rags that everybody had to laugh.

"It's the very first time we've gone away and left him," sighed Flora one day early in vacation. "If only we could take him along!" But mother shook her head.

"It would cost too much to take him on the train to the hills with you," she explained. "Besides, daddy and I will bring him with us when we drive up after you." And with this the twins had to be content.

"Two weeks are pretty long, though," observed Frank, as the children started away with their suitcases. "He's going to be lonesome. He knows something is up, the smart little rascal!" Certainly Tweedle-dee had acted very suspicious all that busy morning, hanging around in the way and looking as if he simply had to find out what it all meant. Flora found him curled up in her open suit-case once.

"If I only had a magic wand, I'd change you into a truly mop, Tweedle-dee, and take you along. Nobody would ever know. But I can't, so you'll have to wait, and that's all we can do about it," she sighed, patting the wriggling little fellow. Tweedle-dee went to the street car with the twins, and it was hard to decide which felt the worst.

The twins didn't say a word for a block, and the dog raced after the disappearing car until he had to stop and pant. He gave a forlorn little yelp, as if he felt sure they had deserted him. For a time he wandered about uneasily as if waiting for them to come back. Then he evidently made up his doggish mind to get lost and be done with it. For hours the twins' mother watched and wondered about him, but dark fell and no comical Skye terrier came home.

Frank and Flora reached the mountain town late that afternoon, and of course Aunt Helen and the two cousins welcomed them warmly. On the way home from the station, Cousin Dick pointed to a level field by the river. "Tomorrow we're going down there to see an airship land," he told Frank, eagerly. "It's the very first one to fly up here, and I wouldn't miss seeing it for a pocketful of pennies."

"I wonder if it could be the Oriole airship that is out about half a mile from our neighborhood," said Frank, instantly. "It sails around over us every day, doesn't it, Flo? Sounds like a giant bumble-bee; and daddy knows Mr. Mason, one of the aviators. It will be fun to see him land up here."

"He hopes to make the trip in less than a hour," Aunt Helen said. "It takes four or five hours in an automobile now. Won't it be fine if we can come flying to visit each other in a few years?"

Next day the big field was black with people, all eager to see the first plane alight in a mountain park. The children danced about and yelled like savages when they caught the first glimpse of the Oriole over the hills. First it was just a moving speck; it might have been an eagle. But it rapidly grew larger until it circled over them—the red-and-gold airship the twins had watched so often at home. Then it dipped down, and the crowd scurried out of the way as the great wooden bird flew along the ground.

The cousins were lucky enough to be near where it stopped. The pilot in helmet and goggles climbed out, with a grin, and a queer creature wriggled up from the leather cushions after him. "My mascot," laughed the flying man, lifting the little creature in his arms. Then a boy and girl fairly flung themselves upon him, and for a second there was wild excitement. "It's our own Tweedle-dee!" squealed Flora, while Frank seized the man's arm, exclaiming, "O, Mr. Mason, where did you get our dog?"

To the aviator's amusement, his little passenger was beside himself with joy. He was licking Flora's hands and barking into Frank's face as if eager to tell them how it happened. "We wanted to bring him with us," Flora explained after Mr. Mason had heard who they were, "but daddy and mother promised to bring him with them week after next."

"That dog certainly made up his mind he couldn't wait," laughed Mr. Mason, heartily. "He came out to the hangar late one afternoon and took such an interest in Oriole that I decided to adopt him. I had never made a trip over the mountains, so I brought him along for luck. And it was a fine trip," he added with satisfaction. "We made it in forty-five minutes, and not a hitch on the way."

"Well, it's lucky for us and for Tweedle-dee," Flora told him gratefully. "I'll write mother today and tell her where he is, for of course she'll think he is lost."

Mr. Mason gave the happy dog a last pat. "He wasn't one bit nervous, and just behaved as if he were born with wings," he said admiringly. Then with a twinkle he added, "Still, there's nothing strange about that, when you stop to consider he's a regular Skye terrier.—Copyright, 1921, Marjorie Dillon.

Patty and the Fly Paper.

A great deal was expected of Patty, for Patty, you see, was the biggest and whitest kitty you can imagine, and the only one of her kind in the whole town. But Patty had one fault—a fault that was losing her a great many friends among the people who came to call at the Jamieson home. That fault was snooping. If Mrs. Jamieson put her sewing on the table and left the room for a moment, Patty always jumped on the table to see what had been left there. If Jennie left a drawer open, Patty lost no time in snooping through the drawer to see what was to be found. Mrs. Jamieson scolded and threatened; Jennie boxed the offender's ears, but it did no good. Patty's worst fault remained snooping. Then one day something happened. Jennie was going to have a party that afternoon, and the house was being put in order to receive the little guests. Patty was all ready for the occasion, having had a bath that very morning, and a bow of pink ribbon tied around her neck. Bridget had finished the last cake and set it on the pantry shelf and was arranging some sticky fly paper about the room to catch the flies before the little guests should arrive. Patty, quite confident that today was a day unlike most days, followed at Bridget's heels, poking her nose first into this and then that.

"My, but you're a nuisance!" vowed Bridget, giving Patty a gentle shove with the broom.

But Patty was not to be so easily rebuked. What a lot of flowers there were on the table! What did they smell like? Inquisitive, snoopy Patty gave a bound, and landed with four paws and the tip of her bushy tail on a sheet of new sticky fly paper. Poor, frightened Patty! She forgot all about the flowers. She gave a leap, and fly paper and all landed on the floor. But not a foot could she loosen. The harder she worked, the faster they stuck. Another leap brought her to the door. She pushed against the screen and it opened just enough to let her out. And some way she got one paw loose. Whatever strange thing it was that held her, Patty meant to get away. Now she ran as fast as she could, with the fly paper dangling to three paws, her bow untied and flying in the breeze. Down the garden path she half rolled, half tumbled. Biddy, looking up, saw the strange sight, and, leaving her twelve two-day-old chicks, flew for the hen coop. But Patty did not pause. She hurried past old Rover, who dozed in the sunshine. Rover, awakened from his sleep, thought his blinking eyes had not seen aright, and set up a most awful bark and growl, bringing Bridget out to see what was the matter. And Bridget's frightened cry brought Mrs. Jamieson and Jennie, and all three ran as fast as they could, trying in vain to catch up with Patty. They might all have been running yet but for a rusty nail on the pasture gate. This nail caught the trailing pink ribbon, and Patty and fly paper were prisoners. But this only served to frighten poor Patty the more. Now she began turning somersaults and hand springs, finishing with high leaps into the air. The cows, browsing near the gate, thought they had never seen the like, and, ducking their heads, ran off down the lane as fast as they could. Patty, pulling, tugging, meowing and crying, went on with her somersaults. Just then Mrs. Jamieson, panting and breathless, came up. Close behind was Bridget and Jennie. What a lot of chattering and talking and petting there was! Patty, now certain that the newcomers meant only kindness, allowed herself to be held and the fly paper removed. Such a dirty, bedraggled kitty she was! But a wiser kitty, too. For after she had been washed and scrubbed and rubbed and dried, she sat blinking in the sunshine, looking very sober and far from inquisitive or snoopy. And to this day Patty knows a kitty's place, and keeps it.—Ethel Lynn Andrews, Selected.

Good Night.

Some things go to sleep in such a funny way;
Little birds stand on one leg and tuck their heads away;
Chickens do the same, standing on their perch;
Little mice lie soft and still as if they were in church;
Kittens curl up close in such a funny ball;
Horses hang their sleepy heads and stand still in the stall;
Sometimes dogs stretch out, or curl up in a heap;
Cows lie down upon their sides when they would go to sleep.
But little babies dear are snugly tucked in beds,
Warm with blankets, all so soft, and pillows for their heads.
Bird and beast and babe—I wonder which of all
Dream the dearest dreams that down from dreamland fall.

—Child Lore.

The Bravest Little Soldier.

Donald Cameron was a little prince, who lived long, long years ago away up in the sunny hills of Scotland. His father was a great king, and owned many grand palaces and lands. Donald was just seven years old, but he had a little pony to ride, and he could shoot a bow and arrow. He wore a beautiful suit of clothes made of black, white and red plaid, and a little stiff hat with a tall feather in it.

One day, though, a sad thing happened. The enemy's army came and drove the king, the little Prince Donald and all the people away from the palace. The king was shot through the leg, so that he could not walk. They took him and Prince Donald to a safe cave away up in the hills. Then the king's army went away to drive the enemy from the land.

All day the king and Prince Donald hid in the cave without food or water. The next morning the king said, "I am afraid we will not live to get back to the palace, for we have nothing to eat."

The king was very sick from the wound in his leg, so he soon went off to sleep again. Prince Donald crept near the mouth of the cave and looked out. He was very much afraid some of the enemy's soldiers would get him, but he said to himself, "I must not let my father, the king, die. I will go out and hunt something to eat."

He had not gone far when he found some berries. He ate all he wanted, then filled his hat and carried them back to the king.

"Those were nice," exclaimed the king, "but I am so thirsty now."

"I'll get you some water," cried Prince Donald, running out of the cave again.

While he was searching through the woods for water he heard a hornpipe away down in the valley. He was so frightened he hid behind a big rock for a long time. Then he remembered about the water, and bravely started searching again.

Soon he heard a little brook singing as it went down the hill. He was so thirsty he drank and drank when he got there. But how was he to get the water to the king? He had no cup or dipper. He was about to go sadly back without it, when suddenly he clapped his hands for joy.

"The very thing," he laughed. "I'll use my hat."

So he dipped his hat down into the brook and went running back. Much of the water had spilled out before he got to the cave.

"You are very good and brave, my son. This water will save my life," said the king.

The little Prince Donald went back and forth all day bringing berries and water to his father.

Late in the afternoon he went down to the brook again. Away off through the trees he saw some men climbing up the hill. He ran and hid in some bushes near the stream. At last they came and drank from the brook, and Donald was delighted to see that they wore plaid suits like his. He knew they were his kin people and loved the king, his father. He jumped out from the bushes and ran toward them.

"Here is the little Prince Donald! The little Prince Donald!" they cried.

One tall Scotchman took him on his shoulders, and Donald showed them the way to the cave.

"The enemy has been driven from the country," the soldiers told the king.

"I am so glad, so glad!" exclaimed the king. He felt almost well now; he was so happy over the glad news.

They took the king and Prince Donald back to the palace. That night they had a great feast. The king let Prince Donald sit beside him at the table. When all the great people and soldiers of the land had come, the king said, "My soldiers have fought bravely, but Prince Donald is the bravest of them all. He kept me from dying by being brave enough to leave the cave and bring me berries and water."—Ruby Radford, in Exchange.

Tessie's Text.

"Bear ye one another's burdens."

Slowly Tessie read over the illuminated text that grandma had hung in her room. She thought it rather an inappropriate text for her room, because she was only seven, and you surely can't be expected to bear other people's burdens very well at seven. It would have been much better, she thought, to have it put on Aunt Mary's wall, or big brother Will's. Aunt Mary knew so much—oh, 'most everything there was to know—and brother Will was so strong. How easy it would be for them to bear the burdens of others. But she, Tessie, was little and weak and far from wise. What could she do?

A moment later, on her way down stairs, she heard grandpa say: "How I wish I had this letter mailed. But I do not feel as if I could walk five blocks in this hot sun."

"I'll mail it, grandpa," cried a joyous little voice, as Tessie flew for her hat. Here was a chance of bearing a burden for dear old grandfather, who was always so kind to her.

When the little girl returned from her errand she dropped into the hammock on the porch, and lay swinging to and fro in the shade of the vines, enjoying the delicious breeze that had sprung up. Inside, she heard mamma say to grandma: "Did you ever see a baby so fretful? I have never had such a weary time trying to sew. And this dress must be finished for tomorrow night!"

"Another chance to be a burden-bearer," thought Tessie. She leaned in at the window. "Just hand me baby, mamma. I believe he will go to sleep for me out here in the hammock. It is so nice and cool now in the shade."

So mamma passed the whining little bundle through the low window, and the little girl sang and swung him to sleep.

So Tessie, who had never thought much about such things before, found that even a little child may help to bear the burdens of the world.

That Word Picnic.

Did you know that the word picnic has a rather strange history? Of course, you all know what a picnic is! Dear me, the very word brings up happy memories of summer excursions, frolics in the park or in the forest, sailings on lake or pond or river, all morning long, ending up at noon, or at least pausing at noon for the lunch!

The lunch! Sandwiches, cakes, olives, pickles, deviled eggs, salad, lemonade, ice cream—whoop-oo-ee! What fun! Then games galore till home-coming time comes. And were you ever so tired in all your life as you are after a long day of picnicking?

The word seems to have had its start about a hundred years ago. How many boys and girls have gone on picnics since then, do you suppose? When this kind of entertainment first became popular, it was always customary, after a list of guests was decided upon, to plan for the kind of food to be taken along. Each guest at the party—then as now—brought his own luncheon, or at least a part of it—something special that was assigned to him. A list of the food was made, and each person was given a chance to look over the list, and say, "I'll bring this," or "I'll bring that." Each person, in other words, took the list of dainties and "picked" out one or more articles he or she would furnish for the out-of-door party, and "nicked" or checked them off the list. After this "picking" and "nicking" (which is the most satisfactory way to plan an affair of this kind, by the way), the party went forward in its own merry fashion, the place was chosen, the day set. Gradually, because of the "picking and nicking plan" of deciding upon the lunch, the word "picnic" came into being. Pretty good word, isn't it, for a coined word, and now just as good a word for a happy gathering as ever.—Selected.

Better Than Sir Walter Raleigh.

He was only a little lad, born in a slum, barefooted, his clothes dirty and ragged.

In the poorest quarter of the port of Liverpool there is a society which attends to the slum kidies. Little ones without boots, with clothes past repair and oft-time verminous, come here for help. They are given a meal, a hot bath, their old, dilapidated garments destroyed and a new set of warm, clean clothes provided.

One winter evening a number of children were in the corridor, waiting their turn for the bath. As one entered the bath-room, the others would move forward toward the door. One little girl hesitated to move forward, and the ragged boy soon discovered the reason. The unheated corridor has a cold cement floor and the kiddies were mostly barefooted. When they had stood for a little while on one spot the place became warm. So the girl hesitated to move from her own warmed spot and thus risked losing her place in the line.

The boy threw his little ragged cap on the floor, and, turning to the girl, said: "There, stand on that; you'll find it warmer."

He was finer than Sir Walter Raleigh—for Raleigh could buy another coat.—Presbyterian Advance.

Down at the Creek.

We children think it's lots of fun
To stay at the creek all day.
We put our oldest dresses on,
And splash about and play.

We wiggle the sand between our toes
And slide on the slippery rocks;
And if we happen to get a fall,
We laugh at our bumps and knocks.

For, oh, the creek is a dandy place
To play on a summer's day.
It's cooler by far than the old barn loft
With its stacks of straw and hay.

—M. Hunter.

Jimmy and His Brass Bed.

Jimmy had a room of his own, and a bed of his own; it was a good room and a good bed; but one day the small boy told his mother that he wished to sleep in the big brass bed in the spare bed-room. That was the bed and the bed-room kept for company; where friends and aunts and uncles and grandfathers and grandmothers slept when they came visiting. It was a beautiful room, too, with blue paper on the walls and soft white curtains at the windows and blue silk draperies both sides of the curtains. The bed was a big brass bed with big posts and spindles. It looked as if it were big enough for the big bear to sleep in, and much too big for a little boy.

Yet Jimmy always wished to sleep in that bed. He told his mother that he could not remember back to a time when he did not want to sleep in that bed. At first Jimmy's mother laughed, then she said:

"Where would we put our company when they came to stay all night?"

"I would go back and sleep in my own bed, then," answered Jimmy.

"It is like this, Jimmy," the little boy's mother went on; "that room is where every one can see it who comes to call on me, and I should be ashamed if it were not in order. I wish that bed to look always just so! I wish everything to be in its place in that bed-room, and there must not be anything left on the floor in that room!"

"I shall keep it in order if you will let me sleep in there!" promised Jimmy.

"Very well," agreed his mother, "you shall sleep in the big brass bed, Jimmy, after you have learned to keep your own little room in order, your playthings picked up, your hair combed and your face and hands clean."

After that it seemed to Jimmy that the time would never come when he could sleep in the big brass bed; it was hard to keep his little room in order and to keep his playthings picked up, and to have his own little room always looking as it should look if it were where his mother's callers would see it the first thing after they entered the parlor and began talking about the weather.

However, Jimmy never gave up, but tried and tried and tried to keep his room looking as his mother wished it to look, and to keep his hair combed and his face and hands clean. But Jimmy was in the second grade in school before ever he slept in the big brass bed, and then it was a surprise.

He had gone to bed one night and was asleep, when his mother went in to be sure that he was covered and to kiss him good-night. Then she saw that his train of cars had been put where it belonged and nothing was out of order in his little room; it looked like the room of a dainty girl that night, and Jimmy's mother was glad.

